A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
El Paso, Tex.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 3.40 o'clock p. m., in room 30, Sheldon Hotel, El Paso, Tex., in open session, Senator A. B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senators A. B. Fall and Marcus A. Smith and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. FREDERICK J. HERMAN.

Senator FALL. You are in the military service, Regular service?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And your title—what is your rank?

Capt. HERMAN. At the present time my rank is captain of the Eighth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in the military service?

Capt. HERMAN. I have been in the military service of the United States for 20 years and 9 months, and 10 years prior to that I was in the National Guard of Ohio.

Senator FALL. Where were you on or about August 27, 1918?

Capt. HERMAN. On the 27th of August, 1918, I was a lieutenant colonel of the Tenth Cavalry, commanding a troop stationed at Nogales and commanding the subdistrict of Nogales of the district of Arizona.

Senator FALL. The Tenth Cavalry is a colored regiment, is it?

Capt. HERMAN. Colored regiment; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did anything of any particular interest or out of the ordinary in peace times occur at Nogales on that date or about that date?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes, sir?

Senator FALL. Will you just state exactly, giving the story of what occurred, Capt. Herman, in your own words?

Capt. HERMAN. At 20 minutes after 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 27th of August, 1918, while riding into the city of Nogales from my camp I noticed a truck tearing at excessive speed in the direction of the camp. I stopped the driver instantly, because such speed was contrary to existing orders. I discovered from the driver, and by hearing firing when the noise of the truck ceased, that the American troops along the line, known as the line guard, and Mexicans across the international line were engaged in a rifle fire in the vicinity of the railroad station in Nogales, Ariz.

Senator FALL. Just a moment, Capt. Herman; let's get for the record the situation with reference to the international boundary there, if you will kindly state it?

Capt. HERMAN. The city of Nogales, Ariz., and the city of Nogales, Sonora, lie in a canyon, or sharp valley, extending northwardly and southwardly across the international line, which runs at right lines approximately with the canyon in which the two towns are located.

Senator FALL. How did the street, for instance, on the American side run with reference to the Mexican town; do the American streets end when they reach the boundary or continue on through the Mexican town?

Capt. HERMAN. They practically end at the international line, although streets that might be said to be a continuation of them extend on north and south. There are also east and west streets running in both towns in a general parallel direction. The valley is traversed north and south by the Southern Pacific Railroad and two main streets running northward from the international line.

Senator FALL. Those main streets run through both towns?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes; I don't recall, but they probably have different names on the Mexican side. The eastern one of the main street is known as Morley Avenue; I don't recall the name of the western street, close on either side of the railroad.

Senator FALL. Now, the railroad itself—I mean the station itself—the railroad runs north and south, running from, we will say, Tucson to Guaymas.

Capt. HERMAN. Yes.

Senator FALL. And the station—is there both an American and Mexican station?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes, sir. The American station consists of a well-built and commodious stone structure, the south end of which is approximately 60 feet from the international line. At a distance of about, I should say, 500 feet, to the best of my recollection, south from that is the Mexican station. If my memory serves me there, that is built of wood. When I stopped this truck driver and received the information just stated from him I also heard firing, and having anticipated this action for some time I went into the nearest place where there was a telephone, the office of the Nogales water works, and telephoned to my headquarters directing the Cavalry to come to arms and immediately proceed to the Bowman Hotel, in Nogales. I then called up subdistrict headquarters—I don't recall who answered the phone, but I think Field Clerk Sebastian—and notified the Infantry to assemble command and report to me near the railroad. I was driving a closed coupé, and my wife was with me. I turned the coupé and went back to camp, 2 miles, as fast as I dared drive through the traffic. When I got to camp the squadron of Cavalry had already mounted and formed in the street and had just wheeled into line. They had my horse and arms ready. I drove my wife to the house and left my private car standing and sprang into a Government car waiting for me and went back to Nogales, where I arrived just about the time the troops dismounted under cover to the north of the Bowman Hotel. I kept the troops where they were a few minutes while I went forward and made a reconnoissance of the situation, located the Mexican forces as near as I could, and then made the disposition of the troops that I thought was proper to meet the emergency. When I arrived on the line, which was not more than 20 minutes after the firing began, because I was moving very fast, firing was general from a sharp knoll or hill just south of Nogales, Ariz., on the Mexican side, and along International Avenue, from the buildings, alleyways, and doorways of the houses on the Mexican side; this extended westward along the international line. I found that a considerable force of Mexicans were located in and about the freight warehouses, railroad depots, and lines of freight cars drawn diagonally across the wide street.

The situation of the railroad cars, I had never seen there before. I also found considerable forces of Mexicans entrenched on a high hill commanding Nogales, Ariz., and to the Southwest across the international line. I found Mexicans in the windows of the house of Gen. Obregon, firing at our troops. I then made the necessary disposition of my men, and after a brief interval I found no cessation of firing, and apparently no chance to get anywhere with that kind of an arrangement, so I began to advance my line across the international boundary. The Cavalry troops on my left flank, under command of Capt. Joseph D. Hungerford, moved with instructions to clear the commanding position to the southeast of the town, held by Mexicans entrenched, and that force moved up to Reservoir Hill, and down in the cleft across the line, and started upward for the Mexicans' position; another troop, A of the Tenth Cavalry, I sent across International Avenue with instructions to clear the houses and drive all male Mexicans to the south that didn't have to be shot, and to be careful that no woman or child was injured. A message came back soon there were no women or children visible in that area, and that they had gotten to the back of the first block of houses, and could do nothing further there unless a rocky height due south of the town was taken possession of, which would command the entire town of Nogales, Sonora. I went forward, and just as I got to the international line for the purpose of giving the necessary directions, after verifying these statements, I was shot by some one in the second story of a building across the international line, and that man was instantly cleared up by several of my men who witnessed the affair. I didn't know I was severely hit; I thought I was struck in the leg by a stone and looked around for the bowlder. I kept on, checked up the positions, and gave the necessary orders for the troops to quiet it, which was done at once; and about that time my orderly advised me I had better get my leg attended to. I found I had a gunshot wound in the right thigh, and it hadn't penetrated through; the bullet was in there, and about that time I became painfully aware of it. The troops in the commanding position carried on the fight until 5.45 that afternoon, when Mr. Lawton, American consul, came to me at Dr. Chenoworth's, where I had gone to have first-aid dressing put on my leg, and told me that the Mexicans had raised the white flag over the customhouse, and that they wanted us to cease firing. At about the same time Sheriff Earhart, of Santa Cruz County, delivered a message from the Mexican consul in Nogales, Ariz., requesting us to raise a white flag and the Mexicans would stop firing. The reply was somewhat profane, and there was no white flag displayed.

Senator FALL. Have you any objection to repeating the reply?

Capt. HERMAN. Well, if the stenographer doesn't mind, I simply told him to go to hell; that American troops don't carry white flags and don't use them. I went with Mr. Lawton down Morley Avenue, through the firing of the troops, which came in unabated manner, looked over the situation, and I could see in the street across the line that the Mexicans had been rather severely punished. I thought I would go over and see what they wanted to do; I accompanied the American consul to his consulate on the Mexican side, and there we met a number of persons, including the commandante of the Mexican force. If I may refer to a memorandum of the names, I can give them. I was accompanied then by Mr. E. M. Lawton, United States consul, and was joined later by the customs collector, C. L. Hardy, and Lieut. Robert Scott Israel, representing United States Intelligence Division. Those awaiting us at the consulate were Capt. A. J. Abasolo, commandante of the Mexican troops in Nogales; Jesus M. Palma, and F. Sandoval, representing the Mexicans. These latter two gentlemen, if my recollection serves me right, were civil officials, one of whom occupied a position corresponding to our county attorney. We held a conference there and discussed ways and means of stopping all further disturbance and to arrange for an investigation of the causes which brought it about. During all of the time the Mexican firing continued, although I had given the command on the trumpet to cease firing, and the American troops, in obedience to orders, had ceased firing. It became necessary for the Mexican commandante to send buglers and orderlies out to the various points to stop the firing of the Mexican forces. I noticed that particularly because I thought this a very significant matter. The men he sent out were undoubtedly men who had had some military training, were evidently Mexican de facto soldiers; the men he sent out who appeared to be officers had the same earmarks. They were given specific directions immediately where to go; they went and got results and reported back in a military manner.

Senator FALL. They were not in uniform?

Capt. HERMAN. Not in uniform. No uniforms were visible on any Mexican person. The commandant of the Mexican forces in the very beginning of our conversation explained and insisted to my interpreter, and I understood him myself, because I understood Spanish to a fair extent, that the de facto troops were all cooped up in the cuartel, which was not true, because with powerful glasses we saw that the cuartel held only a few, and the fact that these men went out in the military manner, in which they did, directly to points they wouldn't have known anything of if the Mexican belligerents had been irresponsible citizens, as was alleged, made me believe firmly then, and I believe so yet, that the entire attack and the subsequent action was not only prearranged and premeditated but under the guidance and control of the de facto military authorities. The firing ceased about 7 o'clock, and I returned, and after some physical attention I established my headquarters at National Hotel, in Nogales, and issued the necessary orders for the rationing of the troops on the line, procuring of water, water and forage for the horses, and additional ammunition, and issued the necessary orders for the action of the American forces during the night. We had arranged to begin the investigation at 8 o'clock next morning, where I said I would either be present in person or some officer who might succeed me during the night would be there to represent the United States.

I was relieved at 5.30 in the morning by Gen. Cabell. During this time I remained constantly on duty, because I feared to leave. I had not a single officer with me of more than about a year's experience. I had three troops of the Tenth Cavalry, one of which—C Troop—had at Carrizal lost its captain, Capt. Boyd, and Lieut. Adair, and that day had lost another captain in the person of Capt. Hungerford. The men were vengeful and anxious to get at the Mexicans, and I knew they would get out of hand unless an officer who knew them well and had served years with them, as I had, would remain on the job and hold them to their duty. I was finally informed on the following day by a memorandum from the Intelligence Division that their investigations had proved that as early as noon on the 27th of August Mexican women and children in large numbers had begun to leave the town to the South. In the beginning of my statement, if you will note, I said I had suspected an occurrence of this kind.

Senator FALL. I noted that.

Capt. HERMAN. That is predicated upon the fact that we had had information through the Intelligence Division and by a letter written by a Mexican, who stated that he was signing an assumed name, that he had been a major under Villa, but had been disgusted with the inhumanity of warfare under that chief; that he had friends living in Nogales, Ariz., and that he himself was earning a livelihood there. That he wished to warn us that the Mexican forces were increasing in the vicinity of Nogales, Sonora; that they were being supplied by unknown forces, which he thought were Germans, with military supplies in the form of rifles and ammunition and some food. He said the majority of the soldiers were desperate, hadn't been paid for a long time, hadn't been fully fed, and they had been given stories of the vast wealth and loot that could be gotten in Nogales, Ariz. That he thought that in the latter part of August the city would be attacked by a largely superior force of Mexicans, who intended to take advantage of the leaving of the Thirty-fifth Infantry, then under orders to proceed to Camp Travis. The Intelligence Division made some investigation about this letter, and after gathering all the ends of their information together, positive and negative, we decided there was a good deal in that letter that deserved consideration, and rather than make any mistake we prepared for what might occur on the assumption that what did occur did occur.

I made an effort to get additional troops, including machine guns, and succeeded in part. The men had been carefully cautioned and prepared exactly what to do under an emergency like that, which finally came up, and when the firing began there was no delay in meeting it in the most energetic manner. The trouble started at the customs gate by an argument between a Mexican customs guard and some one trying to cross the line. The Mexican customs guard fired at short range, within a few feet, but missed the man fired at and wounded an American soldier, and then got ready to fire again, and simultaneously probably a score of armed Mexicans came out of the house across the international line and began to fire on the line guard; then five minutes after the first firing rifle fire came steadily and continuously from the entrenched height southeast and southwest of Nogales. During the action a machine gun from the tower of the Mexican customhouse inflicted considerable damage to our troops until I sent a platoon of riflemen to clear them out, which they promptly did. That machine gun was in position before the fight; it couldn't have gotten in after it began without being observed.

Senator FALL. What were the losses among your soldiers?

Capt. HERMAN. The ultimate loss, as determined later, was one captain of Cavalry and first lieutenant of Infantry killed, two American officers wounded, three enlisted men killed, two civilians killed, and five or six civilians wounded—none very seriously; 20 enlisted men of the Cavalry and Infantry forces were wounded.

Senator FALL. Have you any information as to the casualties on the Mexican side?

Capt. HERMAN. I never could get definite information on that subject. The information of the Intelligence Division reported, up to the 15th day of September, 129 Mexicans supposed to have died of gunshot wounds had been buried, in addition to which, among the dead of the first day's fight, were found two white men who appeared to be Germans from letters found on their person that were burned at that time. That, however, is hearsay evidence given me by the Intelligence Department, and isn't known to me as a fact personally; that is, from personal observation.

Senator FALL. However, you depend on the Intelligence Department?

Capt. HERMAN. I imagine it was right, because for a month after that—for two months after that—I was in Nogales before I was promoted and sent to the Thirteenth Cavalry, and we had abundant opportunity to hear all kinds of tales of what had occurred to the Mexicans, and while some of them were largely exaggerated, some of the reports indicated that the Intelligence Department figures were approximately correct.

Senator FALL. You were not demoted or reprimanded by the Government for your acts?

Capt. HERMAN. No, sir; I was commended by the department commander and by the district commander, Gen. Cabell, for my decision in the matter. Existing orders prohibited American troops from crossing the line or firing across, and we endeavored to carry out those orders as long as we could, until we knew that the continuance along those lines would mean death to citizens of the United States and our soldiers, and great loss and damage to our citizens, and to act in any other way would be to the eternal disgrace of the American Army. During that night the line was constantly patrolled by officers inspecting our position; not a shot was fired from the American side, only a few pistol shots were fired from the Mexican side, which were not replied to; but about 10 o'clock seven or eight coaches, passenger coaches, were rolled up from the south and the outpost reported that Mexican armed men, presumably soldiers from the garrison south of Sonora, were detained there. That didn't bother us much because during that night we had gotten a truck load of machine guns from Fort Huachuca, and it didn't make any difference to us how many Mexicans they would bring up.

Senator FALL. How far was Fort Huachuca from Nogales?

Capt. HERMAN. Seventy miles, sir.

Senator FALL. You casually mentioned that Gen. Obregon had a house there?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes, sir. His house is located very close to the international line.

Senator FALL. Did I understand you to say there was firing upon your forces from that house?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes, sir; I saw armed men in the windows of that house, and Lieut. Isreal, who was acting as aide for me, reported to me personally that he had seen men firing from that house. I must state, however, that the report was, at that time, and I think it was correct, that Gen. Obregon was not at home or in Nogales at that particular time. I am personally acquainted with that officer, having met him at Naco in 1913, and if he had been around Nogales, Sonora, I would probably have known it.

Senator FALL. Were you at Naco in the service in 1913?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes, sir; I was part of the Ninth Cavalry at that time. In command of C Troop of the Ninth, and I was present at both sieges of Naco, and the assault, and taking of Naco by Constitutional forces by Obregon in 1913.

Senator FALL. Were there any casualties at that time among the soldiers?

Capt. HERMAN. In 1913 very few. A trumpeter of my troop was shot through the shoulder as he was mounting. He was holding my horse, and one or two others were slightly wounded, but in 1914, October and November, during the long siege, a number of American soldiers were killed and wounded.

Senator FALL. Do you recall the number of American soldiers killed there?

Capt. HERMAN. I don't think there were over three or four men killed, but the total casualties, I imagine, were in the neighborhood of about a dozen. But there were between 50 and 55 persons, soldiers and civilians, shot while on American soil by rifle fire coming across the international line. A number of these were Mexicans, men, women, and children, whether American Mexicans or real Mexicans, I don't know. However, they were on the American side and presumably residents on that side.

Senator FALL. Did the military forces of the United States interfere with that shooting?

Capt. HERMAN. At Naco?

Senator FALL. Yes.

Capt. HERMAN. Not physically, although I think in January, 1915, when the American forces were there at full strength a number of field batteries were placed in firing position, and all preparations were made to resent physically with fire action any further casualties on the American side, or any fire that was directed so the bullets would strike on the American side, and when those batteries were placed in position, and the other troops stationed to meet that emergency, the Mexican authorities of both contending forces were duly notified and considered it prudent to desist.

Senator FALL. Prior to that time, in the long siege, in the fighting in 1913. as well as 1914, measures of that character not having been taken by American troops, the firing was almost continuous upon this side, as long as there was any firing at all between the factions?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes; they were firing at each other day and night, all hours of the day and night. In 1913, Obregon had some 800 Yaqui Indians on the line west of Naco. They dug themselves into the hillside, and would go to sleep awhile, then go to the top of the hill and fire at Naco, and then go back and smoke a cigarette, then shoot at Naco, then sleep awhile; they kept that up day and night for, I judge, a period of about 12 days.

Senator FALL. Do you know where the house of the Cananea Copper Co. is situated in Naco?

Capt. HERMAN. I don't believe I remember. If I knew I have forgotten.

Senator FALL. It is the largest house there, the most pretentious house. Do you know anything about shrapnel being used by the contending factions while you were there?

Capt. HERMAN. At Naco?

Senator FALL. Yes.

Capt. HERMAN. Oh, yes; they used several explosive projectiles. The Mexican federal troops, I think they were called at that time, held the town and the Constitutionals were trying to take possession of it. The federals had two small Howitzers of French manufacture; the caliber of which, I think, was something like 75 or 77 millimeters.

Senator FALL. Did you observe the accuracy of their fire?

Capt. HERMAN. No; because there wasn't any; but we saw them firing. We incidentally captured a lot of ammunition that came up on the El Paso & Southwestern Railroad to the Naco, Ariz, station. Mexicans seemed to be on hand to take charge of it, but our troops beat them to it and took charge themselves. On the last day of the siege, and final assault in 1913, they were running short of ammunition, and firing only about one shrapnel shell out of every five shots. So far as the effect on the Yaqui Indians and Constitutionals were concerned, it didn't make much difference, because they stopped just as promptly for the blank shots as those containing real ammunition, but the most formidable explosive handled there consisted of hand grenades, which were largely home made. The Constitutionals decided they were going to blow up the Federal cuartel one night, and advertised it quite extensively. Their process was to be to send an empty freight car full of dynamite down the gradient from the direction of Cananea. There is a gradient there about 2 miles long, and they were going to send that dynamite with a time fuse that would blow it up just as the carload got to the nearest point to the cuartel. That was about as close to our camp and houses as to the cuartel, so we were on the lookout for that, and apparently on schedule time that car was started. Of course, we didn't expect a very violent explosion, because we always divided the Mexican military effort by about 20 to get at the actual thing that would be pulled off.

The car was started, but when it got four or five hundred yards out of Naco it promptly ran off a couple of loose rails, and on the prairie, and the Federals slipped out and got the dynamite, not a great deal, and made hand grenades, which consisted of a piece of dynamite laid in a piece of raw or green cow hide, surrounded with nuts, nails, and some stones, and sewed in after, with an ordinary percussion cap, and a piece of common mine fuse stuck in. It was sewed up tight, and as the green hides contracted it made a hard knot, and they sent those forth with the aid of the ancient sling we used when we were boys to throw stones. Sometimes they went off too soon and blew up the fellow at the sling, and sometimes somebody else. The fuse was lighted ordinarily with a cigarette, and the Mexicans would whirl the sling and let it go. I saw one fellow make a mistake and sling it too long, but I did see one do some execution. It landed in a bunch of three or four Yaqui Indians behind an adobe wall and I think they were all destroyed.

Senator FALL. Shrapnel fell in the American town of Nogales during some of that fighting?

Capt. HERMAN. I can't state that positively. My impression is what fell in the American town was all small-arms fire from the Constitutionals who were to the south and southwest of the town, who were aiming at the town, and missed and shot into our lines. They had several 75-millimeter guns, not very serviceable. On quite a number of occasions they actually missed the town of Nogales, with this artillery fire, and some of those shells undoubtedly went over into the United States.

Senator FALL. Capt. Herman, who was the lieutenant killed in this fight at Nogales?

Capt. HERMAN. First Lieut. L. W. Loftus, Company G, Thirty-first Infantry.

Senator FALL. The captain; you gave his name?

Capt. HERMAN. Captain of Cavalry Joseph B. Hungerford, Troop D, Tenth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. You know whether the Mexican Government, or authorities, ever disciplined anyone, the military commandante, or any civil authorities or citizens of Nogales, for this attack?

Capt. HERMAN. I have never heard that anything occurred to any man connected with that.

Senator SMITH. Except what occurred on the ground?

Capt. HERMAN. Yes. I didn't mention it before, but it may be of interest to state that the mayor of Nogales, Sonora, was killed that day with a rifle in his hands.

Senator FALL. You have made a very full and interesting statement, Captain, and the committee is under obligations to you for your testimony; if there is nothing further you care to say, we will not detain you longer.

Capt. HERMAN. I was in command at various periods of the sub-district of Nogales prior to this engagement, and from time to time thefts of cattle were reported. In the investigation of those thefts it was discovered on several occasions that the cattle had been seen in the hands of the de facto soldiers of Mexico, and it was generally known that they furnished the beef for the Mexican detachment; that was a matter of general knowledge up and down the line. I don't know this personally. I do know, however, that a number of horses stolen at different times from American ranchmen were found in the possession of the Mexican troops, and upon representations from me or from some other subdistrict commander at different times these animals were in part returned to their owners.

Senator FALL. And you received some cooperation from the Mexican military authority?

Capt. HERMAN. Only to that extent, the return of a few horses.

Senator FALL. You spoke of the de facto Mexican forces, you have reference to the Carrancistas?

Capt. HERMAN. I refer to the soldiers of the existing Government. It was very difficult at any time to know whether a Mexican with a gun was a soldier or a civilian as they wore no uniform and had no distinctive marks and no uniform or equipment to indicate that they were regularly constituted military forces.

Senator FALL. You didn't hear that they had any rule there that upon entering an engagement they rolled up their left pantaloons legs above the knee and sleeves above the elbow so as to distinguish them from the ordinary civilian?

Capt. HERMAN. I never heard that before, and I have some doubts about that. If a thing like that occurred, I would have heard. That is such an absurd thing it would have attracted attention.

Senator FALL. The testimony here is, in the last engagement in Juarez in which our forces crossed the line and took part, that the chief of staff of the American forces in asking the commandante of the Carranza forces upon the other side how he would distinguish Carrancistas from Villistas, was told that upon entering upon an engagement the Carrancistas had orders to roll the left trousers leg above the knee and sleeves above the elbow, and he could distinguish them in that way from Villistas.

Capt. HERMAN. Nothing of that kind ever occurred on the western end of the line where I was in service.

Senator FALL. In fact, you didn't ask in this particular engagement for any distinguishing marks?

Capt. HERMAN. There was no time to do anything but shoot there.

Senator FALL. Capt. Herman, is that wound you received so serious as to permanently cripple you?

Capt. HERMAN. Why, I don't think so; I have suffered no particular inconvenience from it since. I don't know how the advancing years will affect it.

Senator FALL. At any rate it hasn't disabled you?

Capt. HERMAN. It didn't even disable me from constant supervision of the engagement at that time.

Senator FALL. Evidently not, upon which fact, I think, we are to be congratulated. Thank you very much, sir.

(The committee then, at 4.30 o'clock p. m., adjourned to 10.30 o'clock Thursday, February 12, 1920.)

Present: Senators A. B. Fall and Marcus A. Smith, and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF MR. NORMAN WALKER.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Where do you live, Mr. Walker?

Mr. WALKER. In El Paso.

Senator FALL. How long have you lived here?

Mr. WALKER. It will be 13 years the 1st of April.

Senator FALL. Were you here at the outbreak of the revolution known as the Madero revolution in Mexico?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What were you doing at the time?

Mr. WALKER. I was then a reporter on the El Paso Herald.

Senator FALL. As a reporter, I presume you were interested in watching the fight and in the distance engaged in it?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir; I was assigned to the Mexico business most of the time, and I devoted most all of my time to it.

Senator FALL. Do you remember what occurred in the city of El Paso about the firing of shots that interfered with the peace of the city?

Mr. WALKER. At what time, Senator?

Senator FALL. At the time of the Madero revolution.

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir; they were fighting two days and two nights and part of three days.

Senator FALL. That was what date?

Mr. WALKER. The 8th, 9th, and 10th day of May, 1911, the fight started about 9 o'clock and continued until about the same time on the morning of the 10th.

Senator FALL. I am not going to ask you what occurred in reference to the details of the fight, what occurred on the other side, but I would like to ask you if any parties were killed or wounded in this city from the firing?

Mr. WALKER. The Herald at that time printed a list. I will state offhand—I have not refreshed my memory—but there were 18 killed and wounded during those 3 days of fighting.

Senator FALL. Were the military forces of the United States here at that time?

Mr. WALKER. Only a small number compared to the number that has been here since then; as I recollect, the Fourth Cavalry was here, and a part of an Infantry regiment, I don't remember the number.

Senator FALL. They took no military steps to prevent firing on this side?

Mr. WALKER. No; simply patrolled the bridges to keep them from coming over, and patrolled the border.

Senator FALL. What became of the civilian population of the city of Juarez, Mexico, at that time?

Mr. WALKER. The civilians came over in great numbers and continued to come. The next morning, I remember, they were coming over during the fight at that time.

Senator FALL. When was the next fight at Juarez, if you know?

Mr. WALKER. There was a sort of an attack in 1912 by a force that was known then as the Red Flaggers, and afterwards joined with Orozco, or Orozco joined with them: there were only a few shots fired, one morning early, and the town capitulated without any resistance.

Senator FALL. What became of the civilian population at that time?

Mr. WALKER. Great numbers of them came over to this city at that time. The so-called Orozco revolution, or the Red Flaggers, were down the railroad and threatened to come in several times before they ever did; it was in command that time of a medical officer—I forget his name—educated in an American—St. Louis—medical school.

Senator FALL. You can not at present recollect his name?

Mr. WALKER. I can not recall his name; he was supposed to be in command; they advanced on Juarez and there were a few shots fired, and then the civilians came over to this side.

Senator FALL. Prior to the date of May 8, 9, and 10, had there been any attempt to attack in the neighborhood of Juarez?

Mr. WALKER. There had been several threats about it; nothing done. The rebels were up in the hills during the winter—I don't recollect the exact time, but some time during the winter of 1910—and they staid there in the hills outside of Juarez for some time; the town was threatened several times, but the actual attack did not occur until May 8.

Senator FALL. When the rebels came in, do you remember the occasion of what is known as the Battle of Bauche?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That was prior?

Mr. WALKER. I won't say whether it occurred before or after; but it started on a Sunday. There was a battle of Bauche when there was a real battle—when those troops were coming up from Casas Grandes for the relief of Juarez. The troops were under the command of Gen. Rabago, and were riding on a train to Juarez, and were attacked on the train at Bauche. During the day—Sunday—many El Paso people went down.

Senator FALL. During these different pretended or actual attacks where did the attacking forces procure their water, if you know?

Mr. WALKER. There was water at Flores Ranch, and they also came down to the river at the smelter ford, and that is as much as I know. I know that they had, comparatively speaking, always had plenty of water; they came down to the river quite often.

Senator FALL. The people of El Paso, were they able to see them when they came in?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir. I know I saw a number of them personally, both from this side and, of course, I went over.

Senator FALL. Let's go back. When did the next attack occur on Juarez, causing the population or any portion of it to come over to this side, if you know?

Mr. WALKER. There was a mutiny, as I recollect it; there was a sort of mutiny there in Juarez preceding this. To get at it chronologically, there was some unrest in the garrison at Chihuahua; they revolted on the Juarez garrison and that resulted, as I recall it, in the mutiny in Juarez, and they looted the stores and shot up the place; that was at the time Orozco definitely announced his revolution. That must have been prior to the taking of Juarez by the Orozco revolutionists, so called; and then the next—this is the only incident, or only particular situation on this border that I am not perfectly familiar with, but we have the files of our papers and they show that Villa took the town in November; I think November 17, 1913.

Senator FALL. Pancho Villa?

Mr. WALKER. Pancho Villa; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He made an armed attack on the town?

Mr. WALKER. He made an attack on the town and captured it according to the newspapers; I was not here at that time.

Senator FALL. Do you know what became of any portion of the population of Juarez at that time?

Mr. WALKER. As I read about it and know, they came to this side. I know the military commander did; in fact, the commander of the Juarez garrison is in town now; I saw him on the street yesterday; Gen. Francisco Castro.

Senator FALL. Who, if anyone, took the town away from Villa?

Mr. WALKER. Villa abandoned it. After Villa was defeated at the battle of Celaya later, he was more or less driven north to Juarez and came into Juarez, and then from Juarez his troops percolated into the Casas Grandes country and he more or less abandoned Juarez, leaving comparatively small forces there, and through arrangement with Andres Garcia made with them they joined the Carranza forces.

Senator FALL. What became of it later?

Mr. WALKER. Juarez?

Senator FALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALKER. It continued in the hands of Carranza, excepting, I think—continued in the hands of Carranza since then.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about the battle of Tierra Blanca?

Mr. WALKER. Yes; I know of the battle, but I was not here. Following the taking of Juarez in November, 1913, I was not here.

Senator FALL. Salazar and others came up from the South and Villa went out to the town and place known as Tierra Blanca?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That battle did not injure the lives of anyone here?

Mr. WALKER. As far as I read of it and know, it did not.

Senator FALL. Now, there has been various occasions upon which rumors of an attack upon Juarez have been made, but there were none actually made during these years—following these rumors what has been the action of the people of Juarez generally.

Mr. WALKER. Well, these rumors circulated in Juarez would cause a natural unrest and they would, a good many of them, come to the American side of the river.

Senator FALL. What would become of the banking paraphernalia and money?

Mr. WALKER. I personally know of one instance and have heard of others where they brought the money to the American side and deposited it in an American bank for safekeeping.

Senator FALL. Since the turning over, or the capitulation by Villa forces, there has been no direct attacks on Juarez until recently?

Mr. WALKER. No; as I recall offhand, no direct attack; many threatened attacks. Troops would come within a radius of a hundred miles of Juarez, but there has been no direct attack on Juarez until June 14, 1919.

Senator FALL. Very often raiders, or those opposed to the then occupants of Juarez, would come into the town of Guadalupe, or other places below?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In this last battle between Villa and Angeles forces on one hand and Carranza forces upon the other, of course, there were shots fired into this town and people injured? We have an account of that.

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you remember the occasion Villa was reported in 1915 below Juarez, coming this way with a large number of troops to attack Juarez and also to attack El Paso?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir; I recall the incident; that was probably the most alarming one El Paso ever experienced; that is the only time I sent my family out of Sunset Heights; they hung a lantern on the corner of my house, which they said they wanted to shoot by, and I did not think it was safe and I sent them out to East El Paso. The report was that Villa was down at Samalayuca with a trainload of artillery to be used in the attack on Juarez and El Paso, and our forces had practically no artillery here at that time.

Senator FALL. From time to time, then, during the last nine years there has been actual firing endangering the lives of the people in El Paso, and rumors of attacks upon Juarez and exodus of citizens of Juarez to this side, and preparation upon this side against attack?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir; repeatedly.

Senator FALL. So there have been such conditions existing in Juarez and along the border near El Paso as to keep the people of the city of El Paso subject to almost continuous rumors of a more or less alarming character?

Mr. WALKER. I would hardly say continuous, but at intervals there were.

Senator FALL. It has been necessary to keep the United States forces here to guard the city of El Paso and suburbs of El Paso and the boundary line?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And that condition still exists?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In your capacity as reporter, were you at the border town of Ojinaga at any time during the attack made upon that town?

Mr. WALKER. I was at Presidio in November, 1917; Ojinaga is almost directly across. Not across as Juarez is from El Paso, but Ojinaga is up the stream, I should say, about 4 miles distance from Presidio, but right near the border.

Senator FALL. What occurred there at that time?

Mr. WALKER. Villa, with 800 men, came in about this time, came in from what is called La Mula Pass on the morning of November 17, 1917, and attacked the town just before daylight of that morning; the fight lasted about an hour, started about 4 o'clock and lasted until a little after five, when the firing stopped until six. Villa was driven back out through the operation of machine guns by American Army deserters of the Eighth Cavalry. He staid out along the river bank all day and in the evening attacked about six and captured the town. In fact, the entire military garrison capitulated and came to the American side, and surrendered to Col. Langhorne's forces immediately after they crossed, about 8 o'clock.

Senator FALL. Do you remember something of a similar character about that time in Ojinaga when the garrison were driven out and came over to this side and surrendered?

Mr. WALKER. Yes; twice before, once I know being there in June of the same year, the same thing practically happened; I don't know that the force came across to the American side, but they abandoned the town to the civilian population and they immediately evacuated it. Villa took Juarez in November, 1913, and early in January, 1914, he took his forces and attacked Ojinaga, held by the Huerta federals under command of Gen. Salvador Mercado, who had marched from Chihuahua to Ojinaga and was making a last stand at Ojinaga with Orozco and some others who had joined his forces and Villa attacked there and that was the battle that lasted something like four or five days and ended on Saturday night, and the Huerta federals crossed to the American side to Marfa, I mean at Presidio, and they were brought to Marfa overland and from there to Fort Bliss where they were interned in camp, something like 3,000 of them.

Senator FALL. Of course, you remember the attack on Columbus?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Just west of El Paso?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In 1916? Have you been at Nogales, Ariz., during any fight?

Mr. WALKER. Yes; I was at Nogales on August 17, 1918; that is just a little over a year ago, at the time the Carranza officers in Nogales and the officers of the Tenth Cavalry clashed there, starting with an effort on the part of the Mexican civilians to run the border there. They had quite a skirmish in which a captain in command of the Tenth Cavalry was killed. A few days later, I counted forty-two fresh graves in the Nogales, Sonora, cemetery on the Sunday following. It was generally supposed there were 200 killed. Now, Nogales, Sonora, is backed by a series of very steep hills and I was told by Col. Herman that his troops drove the Mexicans back over the hills and killed a number of them that were not buried. I think the civilian population was largely buried in the cemetery.

Senator FALL. Do you remember the different occasions in which Agua Prieta and Naco, on the Mexican side, have been attacked?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you recollect whether on these occasions the American population on this side were injured?

Mr. WALKER. Yes; I recollect offhand twice that the people of Douglas were subjected to a fire and several killed or wounded; I don't remember the exact number, I was not entirely familiar with it. On the occasion of several attacks the revolutionists came in and attacked Agua Prieta and another time Villa attacked Agua Prieta, or tried to defend it, and also the town of Naco, Ariz., was attacked—was subjected to fire.

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Tucson, Ariz.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 8.30 o'clock p. m., in the Santa Rita Hotel, Tucson, Ariz., Senator A. B. Fall, presiding.

Present: Santors A. B. Fall and Marcus A. Smith, and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF MR. J. E. ANDERSON.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. What is your name?

Mr. ANDERSON. J. E. Anderson.

Senator FALL. What is your residence?

Mr. ANDERSON. Tucson, Ariz.

Senator FALL. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. ANDERSON. Brooklyn, N. Y.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. ANDERSON. Motor truck driver.

Senator FALL. Are you now engaged in business in Mexico, or have you been recently?

Mr. ANDERSON. Right now; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Whereabouts?

Mr. ANDERSON. San Xavier.

Senator FALL. Who are you with?

Mr. ANDERSON. J. W. Love & Co.

Senator FALL. How long have you been in business in Sonora?

Mr. ANDERSON. Since October, 1917.

Senator FALL. Were you operating by yourself, or did you have a business associate?

Mr. ANDERSON. By myself, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you had occasion to observe any outrages, murders, anything of that character?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What?

Mr. ANDERSON. The murder of Hazelton Stanley White, the date I forget, 1919; June, 1919.

Senator FALL. Was he an American citizen?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. From where?

Mr. ANDERSON. Los Angeles.

Senator FALL. Was he a man of family?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was his wife's name?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mrs. Florence White.

Senator FALL. What is her residence?

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't know where she is right now, I have her address at home; at that time she was living in Los Angeles, with his mother, and she had a little baby girl.

Senator FALL. A minor child?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. He was killed in June, 1918?

Mr. ANDERSON. 1919.

Senator FALL. Have you investigated the incidents concerning his death?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; only what we got from the Americans passing down there. White and I were in camp together; we left for La Colorada with one of my red trucks, to look for some steel wheels; when we got to the Colorada the wheels were not there, so Mr. White decided to turn around and go back to camp and I went on.

Senator FALL. When you say La Colorada, you mean the mines?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; La Colorada. The mines are at La Colorada. While I was on the train coming to Nogales I heard he was killed, if I remember right, Wednesday or Thursday, somewhere along there, about the middle of the week.

Senator FALL. What is your best information concerning his death?

Mr. ANDERSON. Why, the Mexican Government, or Mexican authorities, claim Mr. White was killed by Yaquis. White was killed at Secardo. He was shot from ambush, from the right-hand side of the road. Way back from this killing, on the right-hand side of the road, from the direction of the shooting were tracks of animals, horses and mules. Horses and burros, new prints showing they were shod; the horses and the burros were shod, which seems almost unknown for the Yaquis to have, also the prints of the men's shoes; they were not Yaqui prints; some were wearing shoes, and some were wearing zapatos, but not Yaqui zapatos. A Mexican driver by the name of Avila was following, my truck was in the lead. Anyway, they had passed this little abandoned ranch on the left-hand side of the road, and were going down through a wash, and after they got out of that they had to go through another, a second wash; my truck was in second gear. The first shot that was fired cut the magneto wire and my truck stopped, of course. White was shot through the head, and through the arm here, and another shot went in the body, and his body was stripped of clothing except his B. V. D.'s, and the Mexican helper who was with him, a fellow by the name of Garcia, his body was mutilated as if his head was banged on the wheel. His body was mutilated, but White's body was not, a little on the head but nothing to speak of.

Senator FALL. Did the Mexican helper have other wounds except the crushed skull?

Mr. ANDERSON. Bullet wounds in his crushed skull. Both evidently were killed before they had a chance to get out of the seat. There was a gas tank in the back of the cab. From the way Garcia was shot it looked as though they saw this obstruction, or something in the road, and White used to carry his gun in the back of the seat, but he evidently did not get a chance to shoot it from the way Garcia was shot. I suppose that Garcia reached up like that for the gun, and was shot through the head. This fellow Avila claimed he saw a Mexican, or some Mexicans. He stopped his truck in this wash, backed the truck up in the wash and went ahead, got stuck in the wash, backed it up again and then started back for Mazatlan. No shots were fired at that truck, and he had on a man passenger.

Senator FALL. An American man?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; a Mexican man. Now, they stole all the stuff in the automobile, flour and sugar; some flour they did not take. They cut the sacks open and threw the flour on the side of the road and took the sacks and left the flour lying there in a heap. When—this I got from hearsay, when the word was sent in to Mazatlan—they got word to the mine first, and the boys started out from the mine and they got to a place—there is a little station between Tepic and Mazatlan, the name I can not just recollect, there is a large ranch there, they kept from 12, 15, or 25 soldiers there all the time. That is the closest place where they kept Carranza soldiers to the place where Mr. White was killed.

Senator FALL. What is the distance?

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, it must have been 7 or 8 miles.

Senator FALL. Was any effort made to track these animals from the scene of this killing?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; they tracked them a little ways, and Mr. Williams, from the camp—when they got word into San Xavier, my other truck started out—a man by the name of Fred Williams was in La Colorada, of Nogales, Ariz. He is now at the hotel in Nogales, Bowman Hotel in Nogales. He was going to Col. Lancaster's ranch, and there was a man with him by the name of Harry Marcott. The soldiers stopped them, would not let them go any farther, saying it was dangerous, and after another truck came down there with the rest of the boys from camp, why they went on; in the meantime the soldiers had been there and trampled over and obliterated quite a number of the tracks, but Mr. Williams went out with a Mexican—he was an old trapper down there—and Mr. Williams swears it was not Yaquis; he followed the tracks as far as he could, he could not get very far because it was getting dark, but the tracks right in the vicinity of the killing were obliterated.

Senator FALL. What effort was made by the Mexican authorities to apprehend these assassins?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not any that I know of.

Senator FALL. Has any one ever been arrested or punished for this?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir. Some months ago, a few months ago, the claim was made that the murderers of Mr. White were killed, being Yaquis. They claimed they recognized the murderers from the fact that in one of the pockets of the khaki shirt the Yaqui had on was a letter of Mr. White, which is all foolishness. No Yaqui would keep a letter in a shirt for three or four months.

Senator FALL. Now, do you know of any other killing in Mexico, Mr. Anderson?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir; Mr. Hennessey, in September.

Senator FALL. What was his name?

Mr. ANDERSON. That, I don't know.

Senator FALL. Al Hennessey?

Mr. ANDERSON. I don't know his initials.

Senator FALL. When was he killed?

Mr. ANDERSON. In September.

Senator FALL. Of 1919?

Mr. ANDERSON. 1919.

Senator FALL. Whereabouts?

Mr. ANDERSON. It was about 11 or 12 miles from San Xavier.

Senator FALL. Do you know the circumstances of his killing?

Mr. ANDERSON. He was going out to work for W. C. Love, driving a Jeffery-Quad truck, accompanied by the same Mexican who was following Mr. White, Avila. Hennessey was sitting on the left-hand side of the truck and Avila was driving on the right-hand side. They had a guard of four soldiers—two Mayo Indians and two Yaquis. There were bullet holes in the radiator and bullet holes through the borders on the truck. One soldier was killed and one wounded. Avila never had a scratch. Poor Hennessey was very badly shot up, evidently as though they had made a mark of the American. We went out after that. Mr. Marcott drove the truck. A fellow named Barnes took my truck over there. When they got over there the truck had been robbed of everything on it that they could carry away. When he got back to camp with that Jeffery-Quad truck there was just the mail and one or two little minor packages; but there was a sack of coffee on there that was gone when the truck got back; and some few days afterwards the Mexican soldiers sold this stuff or tried to sell it to another man over in a little town down on the river, on the Yaqui River—I can not think of the name right now. When we got to the truck all the stuff was stolen except the powder. We had a load of powder. A bullet went right through the powder, grazed every stick as it went across, and did not blow the stuff up.

Senator FALL. You say there were Mexican soldiers around there?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mexican soldiers were on guard within a mile of where this killing took place. I will think of the name of the outpost in a few minutes. There was a sentry, though, if he had been on duty, in sight of the holdup of this Jeffery-Quad truck; and the night that this Jeffery-Quad truck was held up there was a detachment of 75 cavalymen at this particular camp, besides the guard that was around there, 12, 15, or 25 men.

Senator FALL. Was any effort made to track these assassins?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about whether these horses were shod or not?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FALL. Has anyone ever been arrested for that killing?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Senator FALL. Did you ever know of any effort by anyone to locate any of the personal belongings of Mr. White?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Whether they were found?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; not that I know of.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether Mr. Hennessey was an American citizen?

Mr. ANDERSON. He was drafted before he went—got this job with W. C. Love & Co. In fact, he belonged to the American Legion. I am positive he belonged to the American Legion in Nogales.

Senator FALL. Do you know where his relatives are?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; except I heard that his father was living in Phoenix; how true it is I don't know.

Senator FALL. Do you think of anything else that would be of benefit to the committee?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir; I would like to remember the names of those two camps, for the reason in July I was going back out to camp. I left for La Colorada in a little Ford truck with a Mexican boy and a one-armed Mexican, and we got to this Wash right at Secardo and broke down; I took the stuff off the truck and hid it out in the bushes and started a foot for this camp—I can not think of the name. When I got into the camp I was very glad to get some beans or whatever I could get, but the Mexican lieutenant or Mexican captain in charge of the soldiers invited me to his house. While I was in there I saw a carbide lamp that was taken off the truck that Mr. White was driving; it was mine. That was the only thing I could see without snooping around that did belong to me, but that was my lamp and it was in his house. Whether he took it after the killing or not I don't know. That lamp was there, but it was on my truck when it left La Colorada.

Senator FALL. This was in the commanding officer's house?

Mr. ANDERSON. Of the guard; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. This was within 30 days, approximately, after the death of Mr. White?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you think of anything else?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir.

(The committee then, at 9.30 o'clock p. m., adjourned to meet at the call of the chairman.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

SUNDAY, MARCH 7, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
TUCSON, ARIZ.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.30 o'clock a. m., at the Santa Rita Hotel, Tucson, Ariz., Senator A. B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senators A. B. Fall and Marcus A. Smith, and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF MR. BRACEY CURTIS.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Your name to the reporter, please.

Mr. CURTIS. Bracey Curtis.

Senator FALL. Mr. Curtis, you are, of course, a citizen of the United States?

Mr. CURTIS. I am.

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. CURTIS. Massachusetts.

Senator FALL. Where do you reside?

Mr. CURTIS. Nogales, Ariz.

Senator FALL. How long have you been living in Arizona?

Mr. CURTIS. About 20 years.

Senator FALL. Nogales how long?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, I suppose 17 years, in and out.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. CURTIS. Banking.

Senator FALL. Are you president of the First National Bank of Nogales?

Mr. CURTIS. I am.

Senator FALL. Are you also chairman of the chamber of commerce?

Mr. CURTIS. President of the chamber of commerce.

Senator FALL. Where does the principal business of the city of Nogales lie, in what country?

Mr. CURTIS. South, in Mexico.

Senator FALL. Nogales is a dual city, American side and Mexican side?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The international line runs through separating the two towns?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What banks in the State of Sonora are operating at the present time?

Mr. CURTIS. There is one bank in Hermosillo; I don't remember the name just now. There is only one bank in Sonora.

Senator FALL. There is a small bank in Cananea?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, yes; I beg your pardon, that is right.

Senator FALL. Up to 10 years ago where was the banking business of Sonora done?

Mr. CURTIS. In Sonora; we enjoyed some business, but nothing like we have now.

Senator FALL. There were banks also, established banks, in the State of Sonora at that time?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, yes.

Senator FALL. Which was the principal bank there? The Bank of Sonora and Hermosillo?

Mr. CURTIS. The Bank of Sonora and Banco Nacional, a branch of the Banco Nacional of Mexico City, and a branch of the Banco de Londres y Mexico.

Senator FALL. A branch of the Banco Central also?

Mr. CURTIS. No; the Banco Central did not have a branch there. The Banco Occidental of Guadalajara. The Banco Minero also had a branch there.

Senator FALL. That is a Chihuahua bank.

Mr. CURTIS. That is a Chihuahua bank.

Senator FALL. Were you familiar with the banking system of Mexico at that time?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. These different banks you have mentioned were members of an association of banks under the Banco Central, in the City of Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; in the last few years before they moved out.

Senator FALL. They were banks of issue?

Mr. CURTIS. The State banks, one bank in each State was a bank of issue, and the Banco Nacional in Mexico, and then the Banco Central, which was supposed to be a redeeming agency for all banks, kind of a clearing house.

Senator FALL. The Bank of Sonora was a bank of issue?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The Banco Nacional was a bank of issue?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In 1910, prior to the Madero revolution, what was the value of the currency of these banks of issue in Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. Practically two for one, might have been a few points below.

Senator FALL. That is in comparison with American gold?

Mr. CURTIS. With American gold.

Senator FALL. In other words, the currency of these banks and the national currency issued by the bank of the City of Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. That was not national currency, that was bank currency.

Senator FALL. They called it National currency because issued by National banks?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. It was circulated on a par with silver, was it not?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. A bank of Sonora bill was on a par with silver.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir. That was the basis.

Senator FALL. It was so maintained up to 1910?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You are familiar with the conditions as they have existed in Mexico, particularly along the west coast, since that time?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In 1910, prior to 1911 or 1912, how was the principal business of the west coast; that is, Sonora and Sinaloa and the present State of Nayarit: how was the principal export business done?

Mr. CURTIS. That is pretty hard for me to answer, Senator. There was a very large export business by water, also a large amount by rail through Nogales. After the—especially after the European war started the boats became scarce, and practically all the business in the last two years, maybe more, has been done through Nogales. Now new boat lines are started in there again, and, of course, they have a big oceanic frontage; in fact, they have a very large water transportation business for those three States.

Senator FALL. Prior to January, 1911, I might say until the middle of the year 1910, what were the conditions in and along the west coast States, including the State of Sonora, with reference to law and order, or violence?

Mr. CURTIS. That is, prior to 1910?

Senator FALL. Yes?

Mr. CURTIS. Very excellent.

Senator FALL. Had there been any revolution of any kind or character prior to that time since you had known the country?

Mr. CURTIS. That was at the time the revolution started?

Senator FALL. Yes; prior to that time, in the years prior to that time?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You were quoted in the papers as desiring to make a statement before the committee which might be of interest to the committee in reference to the conditions along the west coast of Mexico. You were correctly quoted in that, were you?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes. I was not particularly desiring to appear before the committee and testify any more than there was a statement—I don't know how it came about—may I be permitted to go ahead?

Senator FALL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Stating Nogales people were afraid to testify before the committee. How in the world it ever came about I don't know. In fact I did not see the article until an Associated Press man came in and wanted to know what position the Nogales people would want to take when they were accused of being afraid to testify. I said, "most certainly we would resent it," then he asked for a statement, and I made it: it was the friendliest kind of a spirit, any more than we did not like to be accused—I don't think any Arizonian likes to be accused of being afraid of doing his duty; that was the reason for the statement I put in the paper; we were not afraid to do our duty any time, and it is a pleasure to do whatever is considered our part as American citizens.

Senator FALL. Do you regard it as your duty to appear before this committee and give evidence as to the facts as you see them?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; I certainly do, I consider it a duty and pleasure to do whatever I can to shed light on the situation.

Senator FALL. Have you had your attention called to orders issued by the Foreign or what we would call the State Department of the Mexican Government, with reference to what would happen to witnesses who appeared before this committee?

Mr. CURTIS. I have seen it in the newspapers. As far as I am concerned personally, I do not consider it seriously because I don't believe it would affect me anyway. I don't believe the people in our section would be so antagonistic as to make any trouble for me doing what I consider is my right or my duty. I might be wrong, in that matter, Senator, but that is my personal opinion.

Senator FALL. Your opinion is based upon your personal judgment—

Mr. CURTIS. My personal relations.

Senator FALL. I mean your personal relations.

Mr. CURTIS. I had arrangements made to go South next Tuesday—

Senator FALL. So the committee learned.

Mr. CURTIS. I was very glad to receive your telegram; I had definite engagements all along the line. I was glad to come up here this morning, but I expect to go South on Tuesday; there can not be any reason why anybody would bother me; of course I might be wrong about that but I fear no trouble at all.

Senator FALL. After this statement of yours had been published, or what purports to be published in the press, the committee supposed, of course, you would hold yourself in readiness in the event the committee went to Nogales, to appear before it; upon the committee having information that you were expecting to go South today, it was thought best to subpoena you at once, for that reason a subpoena was telegraphed to you. Now, there is no spirit at all of any resentment because of any personal statement you might have made, but what I want to know is if you have read the order of the Mexican Government as issued by the subsecretary or acting secretary of foreign affairs of Mexico to the effect that no passport of any person appearing before this committee would be viséd so they might go into the City of Mexico or Republic of Mexico, without respect to the character of evidence they might give—a general order?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I don't think I have read any orders from any authorities; I have simply seen comments on it.

Senator FALL. At any rate you would not think it applied to you?

Mr. CURTIS. I would not think so.

Senator FALL. Did you notice in the public press that this Government has requested the Mexican Government that they rescind that order and allow the witnesses who appear before it to go into Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I saw that in the press.

Senator FALL. You noticed the answer of the Mexican Government in the particular case of Forrest? That is, that Forrest himself had testified against the Mexican Government?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I don't believe I saw that reply.

Senator FALL. What I was getting at, whether you understood that the order in reference to witnesses appearing before this committee was a general order of the Mexican Government that no witness appearing before this committee should be allowed to go back to Mexico, and whether you had your attention called to the fact that in the Forrest case, in answer to the protest of this Government, it had undertaken to make the distinction that Forrest had testified against the Mexican Government?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I understood that to be a general order, but I don't believe it could—I don't believe it was taken very seriously in our section. I don't believe Mexico would take the stand prohibiting people generally.

Senator FALL. Do you think any Mexican consul at Nogales or in the State of Arizona would visé the passport of any American who gave testimony before this committee publicly in reference to any damage which he had sustained, to person or property in Mexico, and allow that witness to return to Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know, if you have orders on that—I can not answer that, Senator.

Senator FALL. You don't know what their orders are?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know what their orders are.

Senator FALL. Of course, this committee may be misinformed; but orders were issued by the Department of State of Mexico to our State Department, and to each consul along the border.

Mr. CURTIS. That may be true.

Senator FALL. And also the consuls throughout the United States; and if there is a distinction being shown along the border in Arizona the committee would like to know it.

Mr. CURTIS. That is a question I can not answer. I don't know. I haven't heard of a single case where anybody has been refused in Nogales.

Senator FALL. There has been no hearings by the committee in Nogales.

Mr. CURTIS. I may be refused; I don't know; but I don't think so.

Senator FALL. You read Spanish, don't you?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't read it fluently.

Senator FALL. Well, read this order. [Here the witness read said general order.]

Mr. CURTIS. I have not read it all through. I see the purport of it; that is some order.

Senator FALL. This document which you have just been reading in Spanish is the order issued—the general order issued to the consuls along the border—in the matter of witnesses appearing before this committee. It has been taken up in specific cases with the United States. The Congress of the United States thought it had a right to appoint a committee of its Members to proceed within the boundaries of the United States to any investigation it might order; and when this committee was informed, at first privately, that the appearance before this committee of witnesses would be resented by the Mexican Government the committee took the matter up officially with the Department of State of the United States Government.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, Senator, I had read articles in the newspapers more or less along the line of that order, but I did not know—I could not believe that such would be the case, and I still do not take that fact seriously. I might be absolutely incorrect and foolhardy in it, but I do not think it would affect a person giving a fair statement, unless it was to bring up some old score in Mexico. I think there will be individual cases that will get in trouble.

Senator FALL. You say, "fair statement." You mean fair statement according to the foreign department of Mexico, or local Mexican consuls?

Mr. CURTIS. No; statement of facts.

Senator FALL. A statement of facts?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes. I might be wrong on that; I might be wrong on that, Senator.

Senator FALL. I have a telegram forwarded to this committee by the party to whom it was sent:

BROWNSVILLE, TEX., February 6, 1920.

This consulate is unable to visé your passport.

R. G. DOMINGUEZ, Consul.

The committee then wired Mr. Forrest, advising him to apply to the Eagle Pass consul to see whether his passport would be visé. We have the following telegram sent us:

LAREDO, TEX., February 6, 1920.

Mr. HENRY FORREST,

Eagle Pass, Tex.:

Your wire according to my department's instructions. Am unable to visé your passport to Mexico, you being considered undesirable.

CONSUL MELQUIADES GARCIA.

Mr. Forrest gave his testimony in public before the committee, which is part of the printed hearings of the committee. Now, of course, you would not be prepared to say that Mr. Forrest's testimony was not fair or was not the truth?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Then it must be left to the Mexican officials as to whether it is fair or not the truth. Therefore if they consider your testimony fair they will allow you to go back; if, in their judgment, they consider it unfair, you would be precluded from returning to Mexico under this order.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the condition.

Senator FALL. That being the condition, are you not inclined to think that some of the people along the border in Arizona might be deterred in giving testimony publicly before this committee?

Mr. CURTIS. Might be in many cases; yes. I am speaking, Senator, on generalities; that is, people as a class. I can not but feel that if you go to Nogales with your committee and request the people to testify—that might be some of my Yankee ideas—I can not conceive of a good American citizen not wanting to testify. I might be narrow minded or it might be my personal opinion, but that is my viewpoint.

Senator FALL. Your statement, as you say, is a general statement?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you consider the statement purporting to come from the chairman of this committee applying to cases in general or specific cases?

Mr. CURTIS. I considered it applied to the communities in general.

Senator FALL. And you thought that that general statement, attributed to the chairman of the committee, that witnesses would be deterred because of the Mexican order, you thought that was offensive to the people on the border?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I thought it was a reflection on the citizenship of Nogales.

Senator FALL. Do you think so now?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't think it was a good thing to get out a statement referring to Douglas and Nogales as the two places where they would not do their duty or would not testify; I don't think that was exactly a fair thing to do, Senator.

Senator FALL. That is exactly what we want, your idea about it.

Mr. CURTIS. I don't think it is good ground that the whole reputation or Americanism of the whole community should be reflected on. I think our people in Nogales have done their part well, and are trying to do their part well, and have taken pleasure in doing what was put up to them during the war, and in the Mexican situation. I think they are a fair people in general.

Senator FALL. The people of Nogales have often defended themselves or assisted in their defense against attacks of bandits or others from Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly. Bandits started troubles one time on the line, and then we have had several little skirmishes which usually have started from some unfortunate circumstances of some smugglers or some undesirable party coming across the line, and would evade the guard, then there would be a shot fired, and then be two, and then be a general mix-up on the line. It was very much regretted on both sides of the line when one of those unfortunate things came up in the last few years.

Senator FALL. This particular matter, as to the attitude of the committee or as to my personal attitude, and as to yours and Mr. Barnes's, we will take up a little bit later so it may be cleared up.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to say right here if I was discourteous in any way I did not intend to be. The article I put in the interview was simply resenting that Nogales people as a class should be reflected on as to their loyalty and patriotism in the sense of doing their duty as citizens. Absolutely no personal matter; your name was mentioned in the article, by the way.

Senator FALL. We will get back to that directly. I think it will all be perfectly satisfactory and ironed out before we get through with it, both to your satisfaction and mine. I want to say that the report published in Texas emanating from myself, as published and as quoted in one of the local papers in Nogales, is practically correct, is a practically correct report of the statement that I made, but we will not pursue that further at this time.

What have been the conditions with reference to law and order, or violence and disturbance, in the State of Sonora particularly, and generally on the west coast of Mexico during the last 8 or 10 years?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, of course, during the revolutionary period they were fighting, and they were not good, but now——

Senator FALL. What do you mean by revolutionary period?

Mr. CURTIS. Especially since 1910.

Senator FALL. Up to when?

Mr. CURTIS. I haven't the date in my mind; you might say up to the Madero revolution, practically. There has been no fighting down there to speak of, you know better than I do, but I should think three years.

Senator FALL. Mr. Madero was recognized immediately by this Government when he was elected as President, or declared elected President of Mexico. Madero's revolution, if you recollect, resulted in the resignation of Gen. Diaz, and by agreement, the substitution of Mr. de la Barra as President pro tempore, followed by an election resulting in the election of Francisco Madero. Mr. Madero was deposed or resigned, and, I believe, later was murdered, early in 1913. No government in Mexico was recognized by this Government then until October, 1915, when Mr. Carranza was recognized by this Government, formally recognized as the de facto head of the government in November, 1915. Now, the years prior to the recognition of Carranza you have reference to as the revolutionary period?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't remember the date, but the time we had the last trouble was at the time Villa came over to Sonora; I think I am correct in stating that was the last fighting we had in Sonora.

Senator FALL. That was early in 1916?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't remember the date, Senator; but, as a matter of fact, during the period there has been much less fighting, much less disturbance on what we call the west-coast States; that is principally Sinaloa and Sonora, than there has been in other parts of Mexico. Their troubles and disturbances have been prolonged. Ours have been very short. We speak of the west coast because that is practically the part of Mexico, to the west of the Sierra Madre Mountains, that we are interested in and we know very little about the interior of Mexico.

Senator FALL. Well, assuming the fact, as it is, that the last fighting you speak of was in the early part of 1916 when Obregon, bringing his troops through the United States, participated in the defeat of Villa—Pancho Villa—at Agua Prieta and Naco?

Mr. CURTIS. And Hermosillo.

Senator FALL. And Hermosillo. I was speaking of the border. Did those occurrences end the disturbed conditions in Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. I think that was about the end of the disturbed conditions; it has gradually been getting normalized and settled down.

Senator FALL. They have been greatly improved?

Mr. CURTIS. Greatly improved.

Senator FALL. At the present time what are they?

Mr. CURTIS. They are very good. They have their troubles of reconstruction, getting their country back in shape the same as we had in the Southern States after the Civil War. They are using very good efforts and are sincere, I believe, and doing their very best to get their States back in good condition.

Senator FALL. You are speaking of the State authorities?

Mr. CURTIS. State authorities; yes.

Senator FALL. The administration of Calles, followed by that of de la Huerta up to the last few days, has been satisfactory generally to the Americans in Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. I think there has been some preparation of strikes in the State, but there has been no actual occurrence; whether there will be strikes or not remains to be seen; but, as a matter of fact, it has been feared there would be trouble. I met Gen. de la Huerta and I have a great deal of faith in him; I believe he is trying to do the fair thing. He is anxious to get his State to producing; he surely talks sincerely and friendly with us; he has a lot of justice and fairness in his talk. He might talk to some one else differently, but that is our experience, just coming back from the trade excursion.

Senator FALL. Your experience has not been confined merely to this recent trade excursion down there?

Mr. CURTIS. No; but with de la Huerta, which is the first time I met him on this trip.

Senator FALL. Is he the present governor?

Mr. CURTIS. The present governor of the State of Sonora.

Senator FALL. You don't know whether he has been called to the City of Mexico from the governorship of Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I don't; I don't think that is official.

Senator FALL. You noticed the announcement in the paper?

Mr. CURTIS. A great many of these announcements in the paper we don't take very seriously.

Senator FALL. How is the business in the Yaqui Valley now—the agriculture?

Mr. CURTIS. On the other side it is very good, and improving; on this side of the river it is very dull on account of the Yaqui Indians.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about the recent negotiations between the State government and the Yaqui Indians in reference to peace and other matters?

Mr. CURTIS. Nothing definite, except what Gen. de la Huerta told me.

Senator FALL. Did you see any Yaqui Indians on your trade trip?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were they armed?

Mr. CURTIS. Apparently we saw a thousand from the car windows, and at Oro Station I don't know how many, some at the station and more out in the bushes; those that we saw at the station were armed, I think; besides there were a great many at Hermosillo that were there to negotiate peace terms.

Senator FALL. You don't know the result of the negotiations?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know; I don't think it is concluded.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any trouble of a violent character with the Yaqui Indians in the last month anywhere close to the border of Arizona?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't recollect about it.

Senator FALL. Do you know where the Mascareña ranch is?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. South of Lochiel, or in that direction?

Mr. CURTIS. It seems to me I heard something about it, but I was away. I think that was during the trade excursion; I did not read anything about it.

Senator FALL. You don't know whether it was true, as reported, that there were nine Mexican soldiers killed, as reported, by the Yaqui Indians within a half mile of the border?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not.

Senator FALL. You did hear something of it?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; I heard something of it, but nothing very definite.

Senator FALL. They are shipping a great many tomatoes out of Mexico now, are they not—out of Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; mostly out of Sinaloa.

Senator FALL. Coming through Nogales?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Reported about 1,400 cars?

Mr. CURTIS. I presume there has been at least that—not 1,400 cars; no; I don't think so; I don't know what the crop would be; I don't imagine the whole season would be less than 2,000 cars, I should imagine.

Senator FALL. No; I don't mean that there has been shipped; but what has been and would be shipped, approximately 1,400 cars?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The garvanzo business has been pretty good in Mexico in the last few years?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; it is a very important crop.

Senator FALL. There has been a great many shipments through Nogales of garvanzo?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; I don't remember the figures; I think the last year the market price was something like $45,000,000 worth of garvanzo that went through Nogales.

Senator FALL. They were in bond generally to what country?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, mostly consumed in Spain and Cuba and Porto Rico, and in all the Spanish countries. Some go to Italy and some go to France, and a few used in the United States.

Senator FALL. There is no friction, in so far as you know, between the American property owners in Sonora and the State government at Sonora pending at the present time?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; the Richardson Construction Co.—I would not say about the Government, Senator, but the Richardson Construction Co. has a case on with the Mexican Government in court being thrashed out in Mexico City now, a question of the difference of their opinion as to the value of their concession; that is, the judicial question that is in the court.

Senator FALL. Originating from an attempt to forfeit their concession?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; claiming that they did not comply with the terms of their concession.

Senator FALL. They are not only in trouble with reference to the national concession but also in some trouble with reference to the State attempting to take certain portions of the land?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't think the State has any—this is just off-hand—I don't know the conditions, of course; I have understood that the State did not have any of their lands now. I believe I have heard, Senator, there is some law whereby agricultural land on a ditch not being used, that under certain conditions people can work it. I am not familiar with that law, but I believe they have a law to compel people to cultivate their cultivable land.

Senator FALL. Have you had your attention called to what is known as the agrarian law of the State of Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you had any talk with Gov. de la Huerta concerning the enforcement of that law?

Mr. CURTIS. I told Gen. de la Huerta—we talked very friendly with Gen. de la Huerta, he talked friendly to us. We told him that the agrarian law was an unfortunate law for them to have on their books, for the reason it deterred people from coming and opening up their country, from considering it at all, for the reason that that law provided that the land should be cut up in small pieces, and it was impossible to carry out any large irrigation project with that law. He said that the law had never been put into effect, had never been enforced and did not have any idea that it would be; the probability is that it might be changed. He could not see why the people at large should take that law seriously. We told him that the reason we thought it would be was because it was on their statute now, and that it did keep back development.

Senator FALL. He thought it would not be enforced, and that it should not interfere with development?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; he thought it would be rescinded.

Senator FALL. It would be rescinded?

Mr. CURTIS. That is the way he felt; of course, he is not in control of the State congress. He is simply governor; they do what they think is their duty; he does what he thinks is his; I don't think he would dominate Congress as has been done in some other periods. He was not in sympathy with that law.

Senator FALL. Did he say anything to you concerning any protest by the United States Government?

Mr. CURTIS. He did not.

Senator FALL. He did not tell you?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. That he had had the matter up himself with the United States Government?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. I might call your attention to the fact that on December 5, 1918, the Department of State received from E. M. Lawton, American consul at Nogales, a telegram and report in reference to the then proposed agrarian law, and the labor laws of the State of Sonora that were then pending in Congress. That on March 20, 1919, the State Department of the United States, dealing directly with the consul at Nogales, instructed him to bring to the attention of the appropriate State authorities the fact that the American Embassy at Mexico City had been instructed to renew protest previously made against the proposed agrarian law, referring to advices given them pursuant to instructions contained in department's former telegram. Mr. de la Huerta, you say, did not call your attention to that?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. He did not call your attention to the protest of the American Government to the State government of Sonora concerning this law?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; he did not.

Senator FALL. You did not know that this Government had had the matter up before this law was passed protesting then?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. He did not, as you stated a little while ago, call your attention to the fact that the Government had had the matter up with him since the passage of the law, our Government?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Of course, he did not tell you that he had replied in an entirely different way directly over his own signature to our Government?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. I do not intend to place this matter in the record except for your information, to say to you that the committee has in its possession a letter, an official letter from Mr. de la Huerta upon this subject which is entirely contrary to the statement which he made personally to you in reference to the enforcement of this law, and that the American Government has renewed its protest against the enforcement of the law. For your private information, not for the public. (Here the witness read said letter.) You can not always tell from private conversation what may be going on officially?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. As a matter of fact the people—many of the people. I presume those at Nogales—have an idea that the protests of this Government to the Mexican Government in reference to their official action in matters of legislative decrees, etc., have been largely in reference to oil?

Mr. CURTIS. I think that is the general opinion; yes.

Senator FALL. You did not know this Government had up directly with the National Government and directly with the State government in reference to protests?

Mr. CURTIS. I knew Mr. Lawton had this matter up with the State Department at the time he had it up. I did not know about a formal protest.

Senator FALL. If this law was enforced in the State of Sonora how would it affect the interests of Americans as well as Mexicans owning land in the State?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't remember, Senator, how small the divisions were to be made, but—

Senator FALL. Assuming that the largest possible holdings could be 20 hectares, we will say, for grazing purposes, which would be approximately 50 acres, how would it affect the American owners?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, it would affect them adversely. I don't think there are very many American holdings over there except the grants.

Senator FALL. You know Mr. B. A. Packard?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; Mr. Packard's lands, it would affect them adversely—bad.

Senator FALL. How about this company you spoke about—the Richardson Construction Co.?

Mr. CURTIS. It would be very bad; they have approximately 550,000 acres, as I remember, in the Yaqui Valley.

Senator FALL. Which they have been attempting to redeem for agricultural purposes?

Mr. CURTIS. It is practically all agricultural land.

Senator FALL. Assuming that the total agricultural acreage would not be one-tenth of that I just spoke of, it would seriously affect it?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How about the Slaughter ranch?

Mr. CURTIS. I am not familiar with that.

Senator FALL. You are familiar with the number of cattle that usually graze upon a given area in Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. I suppose 1 to 12 or 15 acres.

Senator FALL. A fortunate owner who had the land would carry that now?

Mr. CURTIS. Or more than that.

Senator FALL. There are numbers of other Americans owning comparatively large farms in Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Those owning the amount of land which I suggested, and this amount I named as being the amount that the law provided, I simply put it at that large figure for the purpose of illustration; it would affect injuriously all those people?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, yes.

Senator FALL. Now, under the law itself, would they receive any benefit for the land so taken away from them?

Mr. CURTIS. I really don't know what the provisions would be under that law.

Senator FALL. Do you know what the bonded indebtedness of the State of Sonora is?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not; I don't know that they have bonds; I am not familiar with that.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether any bonds issued by the State or by the National Governments in Mexico at any time are being paid, or the interest thereon is being paid?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I think they are not.

Senator FALL. What would you regard as the value of an agrarian bond of the State of Sonora of the par value of $3 at the present time?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't think think it would be very good security.

Senator FALL. You would not like to sell your land and be compelled to accept agrarian bonds?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I would not.

Senator FALL. Do you think if the United States Government in its communication had made the statement that the purpose of paying for confiscated lands under said bonds—agrarian bonds of the State of Sonora—don't you think the position of the Government, that it would be practically confiscatory, would be correct?

Mr. CURTIS. You might call it confiscation. It is a plan of theirs to give bonds I would not consider as very—

Senator FALL. You, as a banker, would not consider a very desirable investment?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I would not consider it a safe bond.

Senator FALL. Then you think the United States would be correct in stating to the Mexican Government it would be practically confiscation?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Particularly in view of the fact they have no court to condemn the property, but simply a commission appointed to fix the value?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; but I have not heard of that action being taken, and in the second place they claim there is no appropriation for any commission to enforce that law. That is what they state, what they told us.

Senator FALL. That is very much like the provisions of the constitution of Mexico which prohibits any minister of any denomination holding services in Mexico, or preaching in any church or private house, unless he is a native-born citizen of Mexico, and the suspension of that by Mr. Carranza in some particular instance where he invited the preachers in and told them he would not enforce that provision of the constitution. This law in Sonora in reference to taking over this property is in that situation, it will not be enforced as long as Mr. de la Huerta is there?

Mr. CURTIS. Apparently that is the situation; yes; and to the best of my knowledge it has not been enforced.

Senator FALL. Your information is correct, it has not been enforced as far as we know.

Mr. CURTIS. We explained to them that the agrarian law was just as bad for them as anybody, due to the fact it kept capital out of their country. Article 27 keeps capital out of Mexico. They have been through a terrible experience in the revolution; they have had their established Government very much upset, and are trying to get on their feet with a new bunch of Government officials.

Senator FALL. You are speaking of the Government of Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. The whole Government of Mexico, the whole of Mexico putting in effect article 27, and this agrarian law, keeping out foreign capital. If a bank is going to loan money to you the last analysis is, could they go into court and get a judgment for the debt; if they could get a judgment could they get execution on your property and take it to satisfy the debt? Down there it is—if you were to use that analysis, you could get a judgment, no doubt, for your debt, you could get execution probably, but you could not take the property to satisfy that debt. Now, in any country we must have the last analysis for collecting your debt. They keep capital out of their country, and they need capital down there to reestablish and develop the country, just as much as we needed money to build railroads in the Middle West, when we had to go to Europe and sell our securities; they could have come in at that time and gotten judgment, and gotten execution, and taken our railroads if we had not paid our interest. Mexico at large is interested in seeing that the country is developed, and it is interested in having plenty of work for the poor people, and having a lot of people producing to reduce taxation. That was why Sonora and those people down there through Sonora should be made to stimulate production, get a lot of men producing, consequently taxation would not fall heavily on anyone.

Senator FALL. Did the people of the west coast appreciate your views?

Mr. CURTIS. Exactly; we talked to them like we were conferring with you; we had no hesitancy about criticizing, and sometimes we got a favorable or adverse reply to our suggestions. We went down there with a friendly feeling, and to stimulate better feeling, and I know, I remember at the time of our planning to go in that country, it was impossible for everybody to get passports, and while it is customary to get identification cards on the border we did not like to take in a lot of people so the State Department would say we abused that privilege, so to put it up fair, we telegraphed them asking if they would give the authorities permission to grant us identification cards for fellows to go in the last minute, to go on the excursion, which they declined. We took it up with our Senator, who was the last resort, and he went and explained the situation to the State Department and they gave us that permission; we telegraphed to them and explained to them we were going down there in good faith, to get in closer touch with the people down there to stimulate a better feeling, and better relations, and we were surprised the State Department would decline us that, because we felt if our people along the line would try and do some charitable work instead of criticizing them so much we might come to a good deal better understanding. The attitude of many of the people is simply to criticize and antagonize all the time instead of getting in and giving them your hand; we felt that we were going down there trying to cooperate with them, and be of some service if we could. They treated us very well and we tried to treat them just as well as they treated us.

Senator FALL. Mr. de la Huerta took your view officially?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know what you mean by officially, Senator.

Senator FALL. He was the official who spoke to you in reference to your statement of the effect, possible and probable effect, of this agrarian law, and gave you to understand it would not be enforced?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know why that would be. He said that it had not been enforced, and so why worry.

Senator FALL. And so why worry?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't remember that he said definitely it would not be, but he gave me the impression it was not a serious thing to foreigners, or anybody else to worry about.

Senator FALL. What else does it need to be enforced, except his putting it in force, his act as executive; it is the law if he proclaims it is in force.

Mr. CURTIS. I suppose nothing.

Senator FALL. If he is removed or resigns, and some one else saw it a little differently, and he became governor—for instance, if Gen. Dieguez should become governor, he could enforce it immediately?

Mr. CURTIS. I suppose so.

Senator FALL. So the continuation of the very pleasant relations which have grown up between the citizens here and citizens there depend very largely upon the will of who happens to be in office in Sonora; the same thing is true, to a large extent, in the entire Republic, is it not?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I suppose so.

Senator FALL. Did you know that the enforcement of article 27 of the constitution has not yet been adopted by the National Congress?

Mr. CURTIS. I did not; no, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you know that the protest of this Government against the enforcement clause of article 27 has been made against

Mr. Carranza's edict, and not against enforcement by any act of Congress?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I did not know that. I knew that our Government had protested; I did not know the technique of the objection.

Senator FALL. You have not had your attention called to the reply—any reply by Mr. Carranza to any position of our Government against the enforcement of confiscatory decrees?

Mr. CURTIS. Nothing in an authentic way, only what is in our papers.

Senator FALL. I might call your attention to an authentic declaration by Mr. Carranza on that subject. He stated that "If the difficulty could not be settled except by war or intervention he was sorry, but was prepared to confront this alternative." Apparently he did not like the reference in my former communication to the possibility that the United States Government would have to protect the property of its citizens. The alternative is war; if so, he was prepared for it. Do you think it is the duty of this Government to protect property of its citizens in Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. I do; that was in the plank of the last presidential campaign. I think it is the duty of all Governments to look after its citizens.

Senator FALL. You have always expressed yourself that way in reference to Mexico—that it is the duty of this Government to protect—

Mr. CURTIS. I do. I think it should have better diplomatic relations. It seems like the whole thing from beginning to end has been antagonistic—absolutely all antagonistic—instead of giving a helping hand. I don't know how the interior might be, but the people on the west coast are very glad to cooperate. I can not understand why the people of the interior should not be the same if they had the right men to treat with them.

Senator FALL. Suppose, Mr. Curtis, for a moment if some one else than Mr. de la Huerta, in whom you have confidence, became governor of Sonora and sought to enforce this agrarian law, do you think it is the duty of the Government of the United States to see that it is not enforced?

Mr. CURTIS. I do.

Senator FALL. Then, if this Government protests and says it will not allow it to be enforced, this Government is doing its duty that far?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And, with reference to the National Government, where it is not purely a State matter, if this Government has notified the Mexican Government that it will protect the rights of its citizens, then it is doing its duty that far?

Mr. CURTIS. Doing exactly what all others—

Senator FALL. All others are doing?

Mr. CURTIS. That is, the European countries are doing.

Senator FALL. If it is answered by the statement that that means war and "I am prepared for it," why, diplomacy has come to an end there?

Mr. CURTIS. It looks to me most extraordinary, and a surprising thing to me. I can not see how a man would be so undiplomatic as to make a statement like that.

Senator FALL. Yet Mr. de la Huerta has declined to make a statement to the United States in reference to the agrarian law such as he made to you privately?

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, that is a Federal law. That was his opinion. Isn't that a Federal law?

Senator FALL. No; the constitution of 1917 permits it.

Mr. CURTIS. Permits it; that is right.

Senator FALL. And the State has done it in this instance, and it is up to Mr. de la Huerta, as I stated there, to enforce it or not. The protest of this Government was first to the State government, and then to the National Government, and answered by the National Government, and later answered by the State government.

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, that does not say what the State congress will do with that again.

Senator FALL. The State congress has enacted the law.

Mr. CURTIS. I mean the law.

Senator FALL. Oh, a new congress may repeal it; we hope the influence of you gentlemen along the border, who are on friendly terms with them, will have some effect. Now, Mr. Curtis, was there an armed conflict in Nogales in August, 1918, between the Government soldiers on this side and some of the citizens and Mexican citizens and soldiers in Nogales, Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. I believe about that date.

Senator FALL. There were a good many people killed?

Mr. CURTIS. Several. That was in 1918?

Senator FALL. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I was not at Nogales at that time.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether the Chamber of Commerce at Nogales at that time appealed to the United States Government for additional troops? Whether they appealed through Senators of the United States Senate to send them artillery, etc.?

Mr. CURTIS. I think they did appeal; I don't remember about the date. I know we appealed to the Senators several times to give us more troops after those troubles.

Senator FALL. You don't think troops are needed there now, do you?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, I don't think—I think they ought to have some troops stationed along the border.

Senator FALL. Why?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, it is the frontier; you never can tell what might come up. I think we are entitled to a moderate number of troops. They are having trouble over in Texas all the time, raids along the border. We have a good many new laws now, to stop arms and ammunition, if you are going to have those laws—you can not expect the customs department to guard that line. It is a big, long line—then, I think it is proper to have soldiers along the border, anyway.

Senator FALL. The law in reference to arms and ammunition is a general law; it applies to the Canadian border as well as the Mexican border. It is not necessary for us to have troops along the Canadian border.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not know that; I thought it applied to the Mexican border.

Senator FALL. It is not necessary for the United States to maintain troops on the Canadian border, is it?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't think so.

Senator FALL. It is about as long as the Mexican border?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Senator FALL. That is because Canada is a peaceful country like the United States, is it not?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. So far as the Mexican border is concerned, why we are a peaceful people, and in Nogales, and on this side of the border, are we not?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. It is not necessary to keep troops here to protect the law-abiding citizens over here, is it?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Why is it necessary to keep troops along the border?

Mr. CURTIS. You have got a lot of bad conditions, such as Villa.

Senator FALL. Villa is not in Sonora.

Mr. CURTIS. He is on the other border, and whatever would happen on the other border would no doubt influence the whole policy of the United States and Mexico. You can not consider, so far as the policy of the United States goes, to any particular State in Mexico. It would be a policy toward the Republic of Mexico.

Senator FALL. Of course, you realize that since the reorganization of the United States Army the Army is very much depleted. We are asking for troops now to bring it up to its standard, to even 250,000 men. We haven't them, and we do need troops. If they are not needed at Nogales why they may be needed at other places. Now, do you think it is safe to withdraw the troops from Nogales?

Mr. CURTIS. I think there ought to be troops at Nogales; certainly as long as they have them along the border.

Senator FALL. Suppose they withdraw them from other borders, do you think it would be safe, and would you be satisfied?

Mr. CURTIS. If they withdrew them from Texas points, and New Mexico, I think we could—we would be satisfied to have them withdrawn as at any point.

Senator FALL. Let's speak frankly, Mr. Curtis. Are you willing to have troops—you are speaking now, you are a business man there, you are chairman of the chamber of commerce—would you be satisfied to have the American troops at Nogales withdrawn?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I think we would be satisfied to have them reduced to a smaller number.

Senator FALL. About what number do you think would be sufficient?

Mr. CURTIS. Suppose we reduce them down—I don't know what would be convenient—I suppose five or six hundred; something of that sort would be about as small a working unit as you could have.

Senator FALL. Do you think that they need troops at—a squad, say, of four or five men—at Ruby or Arivaca, west of Nogales?

Mr. CURTIS. I think it is a good thing to have them there; there are smuggling trails over there; there were a couple of fellows killed there the other day. I think it is very proper.

Senator FALL. Do you know that American troops on the border at Lochiel, immediately after this little occurrence which I asked you about south of the border, prevented Americans from going over there into Mexico because of the danger that might ensue to them, and would not allow them to go across unless they had some object?

Mr. CURTIS. I did not.

Senator FALL. Do you think a precaution of that kind was proper precaution for the American troops to take?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, they get excited after those fights. I think any precaution of that sort is very wise.

Senator FALL. The conditions had been good, but you found you needed not only what troops you had in Nogales in August, 1918, but you asked for more, didn't you?

Mr. CURTIS. I was not there, Senator, at that time. I believe that is true, though.

Senator FALL. And they have maintained practically the same number of troops there since?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. But you don't think they need them now?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't think they need as many; no, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you think probably 500 would be sufficient along at Nogales, immediately along that border?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know how they divide them up, Senator, but I presume at Lochiel, I don't know whether they have one or two troops, and at Arivaca one or two troops.

Senator FALL. They are appealing to this committee now to see if it can not get troops, and that is in Arizona.

Mr. CURTIS. I think they ought to have a troop or two of Cavalry out in those places; it is open country.

Senator FALL. When do you think conditions along the border will be such that the United States need no longer maintain troops at all in Arizona?

Mr. CURTIS. It will take a pretty good prophet to answer that question, I don't know.

Senator FALL. You have no reason, from your knowledge of Mexico, to anticipate there will be any armed disturbance in the State of Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. Why, of course, at every election they have talk of a revolution.

Senator FALL. You have heard such talk?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And the election will be held in June, this year?

Mr. CURTIS. I believe so; yes.

Senator FALL. Gen. Obregon, who is a citizen of Sonora, is a candidate for the presidency?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Gen. Pablo Gonzales, who has been in command of the Army around in the city of Mexico is also a candidate?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And there are various other candidates of whom we have all heard?

Mr. CURTIS. They have spoken of Bonillas, I don't think he has formally announced yet.

Senator FALL. There is talk that there may be revolutionary troubles in Sonora and along the border?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. At any rate, you think American troops should remain along the border?

Mr. CURTIS. I do. I think we should have a good force.

Senator FALL. Why should revolutionary troubles over the election endanger the lives of American citizens on our own soil?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, if some crazy fools come along and start something, that is the reason, Senator. That is the trouble that we have had. It is not the officers at Nogales, it is some stupid thing pulled off—not altogether stupid, but some overt act, such as ignoring the authorities, and an unfortunate incident starts trouble. That is the way they start, you know.

Senator FALL. Have those unfortunate incidents happening started on this side of the line?

Mr. CURTIS. I think usually; yes.

Senator FALL. By Americans?

Mr. CURTIS. I think—I don't want to be quoted as to the fact—if I remember correctly in that 1918 instance that was some Mexican ignored the American immigration man, and I think he was shot, and then somebody else shot.

Senator FALL. Then that was the fault of the Americans in Nogales?

Mr. CURTIS. You can not accuse them that way exactly, because the customs guard there was doing his duty, and he stopped the fellow that ignored him; but it was one of those unfortunate things that seem to be along the border, along the frontier, where people are not supposed to ignore your authority.

Senator FALL. Did the Mexicans on the Mexican side, from your information obtained after your return—were they prepared for any trouble?

Mr. CURTIS. I was not there; I understood they were.

Senator FALL. That they were prepared?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You know, as a matter of fact, that was the report of the United States Army?

Mr. CURTIS. I think that is true.

Senator FALL. That they were waiting for something of that kind to occur?

Mr. CURTIS. You can not say that. I think that might be true of all countries.

Senator FALL. The citizens of Nogales did not carry guns openly, and cartridges around with them, starting trouble, did they?

Mr. CURTIS. No; not with them; they did not on the other side, either. I have not observed that. I think very few people carry guns; I don't think you see them on the other side.

Senator FALL. Then the trouble at Nogales originated through some official on this side?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know about that; I understood that was what started it. I don't want to get mixed up. I was not there.

Senator FALL. I don't want to mix you up.

Mr. CURTIS. What I mean, I don't want to get mixed up on the facts.

Senator FALL. The committee is very much gratified to know, as it has known prior to your testimony, that conditions along the west coast of Mexico have grown much better. Personally, I would be exceedingly gratified to know that conditions throughout the Mexican Republic were very much better than they have been and are. The conditions, however, from 1916 up to 1918—August, 1918—in Sonora were good, were they not?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. From the time that Villa——

Mr. CURTIS. They always have been good, Senator. The Sonora people have never been troublesome people; they started out in the revolution; I think Mr. Bonillas was down there——

Senator FALL. The American people of Arizona neither have been troublesome people?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. They have never started any trouble with Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You never have known of any raiding party going across into Mexico committing robberies or murders?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. There has been no aggression to your knowledge, since you have been here along the border, on this side into Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. No acts of people on this side have placed in jeopardy the lives of the people of the town of Nogales, Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. Absolutely not.

Senator FALL. Can you say the acts of Obregon and Villa and others in the border town of Nogales, Sonora, have not placed in jeopardy the lives of the people of your town, on this side?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not say—when Obregon came in, of course, there were some stray shots came into Nogales, Ariz., but Obregon had no disposition to make any disturbance or any trouble on the American side; when he came into town he came in in a very nice, orderly way. I don't think you could put Obregon and Villa in the same category. I would say when Obregon came in unfortunately there were stray bullets that come to our side, but when Villa came in—Villa was a bad element; he started trouble right off.

Senator FALL. Villa was there before Obregon came in?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. It was when Villa was there that Obregon attacked the town, and Americans on this side were hurt?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. The same thing was true at Agua Prieta and at Douglas?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir; I think it was. In fact, I remember distinctly it was.

Senator FALL. You think Mr. Obregon has displayed very much more care in his protection of American lives along the border than Villa?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I do. Of course, if Villa was in town and the other party was attacking it was an unfortunate situation for the party attacking, but I don't think the disposition of Obregon was ever to molest or harm anybody on the American side.

Senator FALL. And you think at that time that the disposition of Villa was to attack Americans?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, I don't know. He did absolutely, at that time, fire in Nogales; of course, he did absolutely fire on the American troops.

Senator FALL. Who was in command of the American troops then?

Mr. CURTIS. I have forgotten; I think Col. Sage.

Senator FALL. Sage?

Mr. CURTIS. I think so.

Senator FALL. Did the Obregon troops fire at all across the line?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no.

Senator FALL. Didn't they come over the hill and fire into Nogales?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, of course, not deliberately fire into the United States. According to my understanding, I presume it was one of the Obregon men that shot Stephen D. Little, but that was purely accidental.

Senator FALL. Now, I want to say to you, Mr. Curtis, for your information and that of others, that this committee is not defending Mr. Obregon or Mr. Villa or attacking them. The committee plays no favorites at all in its investigation. We are trying to ascertain the facts—some are gratifying, and some are pessimistic.

Mr. CURTIS. We are optimistic ourselves, because we feel very happy and very encouraged over their condition.

Senator FALL. Despite official action and the laws they have?

Mr. CURTIS. They might do better on many laws, yet, on the other hand, many of our States in the United States make some very crazy laws. They haven't a monopoly on some of these foolish laws; they have been making them all over the United States.

Senator FALL. Then you think that the law-making bodies and enforcing bodies in Mexico are on a parity with those in the United States?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; I don't think so. I think they are doing their best, but I don't think they measure up to our standard. I think they are doing their best; sometimes I don't think we do our best.

Senator FALL. Mr. Curtis, in your business in Mexico during the war, particularly in the year 1918, do you know how the garvanzo crop of Mexico was handled, on the west coast?

Mr. CURTIS. What year was that?

Senator FALL. Say in 1918.

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know that I remember the particulars about it.

Senator FALL. Do you know who financed it?

Mr. CURTIS. That was a year ago that we handled a good many. I forget which it was in 1918; W. R. Grace & Co. handled a good many. Wasn't that the year?

Senator FALL. Yes; W. R. Grace & Co., of San Francisco and New York, an American firm?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you remember about the extent of their dealings, in American money?

Mr. CURTIS. Very large.

Senator FALL. It amounted to about $6,000,000?

Mr. CURTIS. Six or seven. There was not over five million last year. Might have been the high price brought it up to six.

Senator FALL. Where are those garvanzos shipped?

Mr. CURTIS. Shipped to New York, San Francisco, Cuba, and Spain.

Senator FALL. Are they used by the allied countries or are they used in Spain and Cuba?

Mr. CURTIS. Spain is a big market, Cuba is a large market, Porto Rico is a large market, Italy even some, and France even to a smaller amount.

Senator FALL. Do you think any of the garvanzo shipments reached France or Italy?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not say about that; I don't know. There were, however, a few sold in the United States.

Senator FALL. How were they paid for—in what currency?

Mr. CURTIS. American currency.

Senator FALL. Gold?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; a good many of them paid for in American gold.

Senator FALL. At that time was there a rule, regulation, or law against the exportation of gold in this country except by permission of the War Trade Board?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Permission of the War Trade Board was obtained for the shipment of gold, wasn't it, for handling the garvanzo crop?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. At that time the War Trade Board also gave permission to ship foodstuff from the United States to Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Handled by Gen. Obregon at that time, flour and lard?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know that you would say largely; he handled large amounts, of course. There were others handling it all the time.

Senator FALL. Then, while the United States were attempting to conserve for itself and its allies foodstuff they allowed gold to be exported into Mexico for the handling of a food crop, garvanzo?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And then—

Mr. CURTIS. And there were other things being produced, however, besides garvanzo.

Senator FALL. For which gold was exported under orders of the War Trade Board?

Mr. CURTIS. Gold was not exported for that.

Senator FALL. I am speaking of the exportation of gold which was prohibited?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Then foodstuff was being shipped out of Mexico in return for American gold?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Still there was a necessity for importation into Sonora of American foodstuff needed for the Allies and people of the United States?

Mr. CURTIS. In less amounts; yes.

Senator FALL. Yes; in a less amount. Now, Mr. Curtis—

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, that was all done, Senator, through Washington; that was not local. We did not know anything about that. That was arranged with the War Trade Board at Washington.

Senator FALL. I am not inclined to be at all critical of the Nogales people. I think we will go into that a little bit further for your satisfaction. What currency or medium of exchange is used in commercial dealings with Sonora and the people in Nogales.

Mr. CURTIS. American gold, American paper and silver.

Senator FALL. American paper passes as current there?

Mr. CURTIS. It passes very well now. We took the matter up with the Federal reserve board for Arizona and we told them that—we told the Federal reserve board that our experience in the last year's trade excursion was that American gold was very much at a premium, which made American paper money at a discount. The Federal reserve bank figured it was at a discount. We said no, it is not at a discount, but they have to have gold and they will have to pay anything for gold, and they have to get it. For instance, the Mexican Government saw that gold was made the basis for taxes, two for one, and did not receive paper money.

Senator FALL. They would not receive their own paper money?

Mr. CURTIS. They did not have any paper money and would not receive our paper money; they wanted taxes collected on a gold basis, and we asked the Federal reserve bank why they did not turn loose a lot of American gold and go down there and see if we could not stabilize that condition; the money exchanges down there were getting a tremendous premium for gold and we suggested that they just try out and see if that gold came back again in just about the amount that we sent out, and they said "All right, we will try it. You might be right, and you might be wrong." It brought paper money on a par with gold; it is a differential now. Our paper goes freely; they take it seriously and they take it just the same as they would gold, except in some cases where they have to pay taxes they have to have gold. We corresponded with the Federal reserve bank and they are very well satisfied. We found it was a good thing to do and not ship our supply of gold.

Senator FALL. I have no doubt of that. Of course, I am not a financier, but your explanation is entirely satisfactory to me. Now, as to the statement that you made that they had no paper.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I take that back; they have paper, the bank paper is still outstanding but they don't use it.

Senator FALL. How about the paper money which they have?

Mr. CURTIS. The infalsificables—they are being used too.

Senator FALL. They are being used; that is the national Mexican currency of the country; that is fiat money. Are they being accepted in Sonora in small transactions?

Mr. CURTIS. People buy them; anybody importing into Mexico buys them, as part of their customs regulation is that they have to pay so much with infalsificables.

Senator FALL. How much do they pay?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know; some certain percentage of the amount.

Senator FALL. I mean in buying it for the purpose of using it as you state they use it, how much do they pay on the open market for it?

Mr. CURTIS. A very small amount. I have not paid any attention to it; we do not handle it at all, and I really don't know.

Senator FALL. You don't handle it?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. You would not accept it in your business transactions?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, we did handle a fiat money for a while, but we got in a lot of mix-up and trouble about it, and we thought it was better for money brokers to handle it than for the banks.

Senator FALL. You handled, as a matter of fact, from time to time, their State money?

Mr. CURTIS. We did at the beginning of the issuance.

Senator FALL. You handled Villa money, and Madero money, and Carranza money?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; we handled anything that came along for awhile and then discontinued it.

Senator FALL. Any that you happened to have on hand at a certain period was worthless?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You presented me at one time with samples of various issues of currency?

Mr. CURTIS. It was not a good business for a bank; it brought about embarrassment for us.

Senator FALL. And, as a matter of fact, infalsificables are only received by the Mexican Government, then, as a bonus upon payments which must be made in gold; are they not?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And they are required to be paid in that way? In other words, for the purpose of getting it out of the way they require you to pay a peso in infalsificables for $1 in gold, although $1 in gold is the same?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That is their method of redeeming their outstanding currency?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, that is about the idea.

Senator FALL. Do you know what outstanding currency of the Vera Cruz issue was taken up in Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I haven't any idea.

Senator FALL. Is there any Mexican gold in any appreciable amount on the West coast?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That, of course, is received at its bullion or coin value?

Mr. CURTIS. No; it is received as a dollar on the basis of—

Senator FALL. Silver?

Mr. CURTIS. No; they are supposed to be on a gold basis.

Senator FALL. Well, that is because in 1905 Diaz put Mexico on a gold basis, didn't he?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You say that one of the banks, and a bank of issue, which had branches over the Republic and doing business prior to the Madero revolution, was the Bank of Sonora, I understood you to testify to that?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Is that institution in existence now, the Bank of Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. I think it is; yes.

Senator FALL. Where is it doing business?

Mr. CURTIS. It don't do business at all, but it is in existence.

Senator FALL. Has it an office and a representative?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; they have had one in Nogales but they have not been doing business in Nogales.

Senator FALL. Who is their representative down there, Mr. Winegar?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't really know whether Brower or Winegar. Mr. Brower has been down in Mexico, I suppose Mr. Brower will be the bank's representative, he has been down there a good deal lately.

Senator FALL. They are no longer conducting a banking business in the State of Sonora?

Mr. CURTIS. No; with the exception, I suppose, they are collecting their notes.

Senator FALL. Now, I want to ask you a hypothetical question: I base it on a case such as actually has occurred. Suppose that an American citizen on this side of the line would come before this committee and testify that he has recently lost property on this side of the line by theft or robbery at the hands of officials of the Government of Mexico, supposedly stationed within the State of Sonora, and were to give facts to the committee; after reading this general order issued by the Mexican Government to its consuls as to vising passports, do you believe that American could go across into Mexico legally, that is, that his passport would not be viséd.

Mr. CURTIS. Where, at Sonora?

Senator FALL. By the consuls?

Mr. CURTIS. I believe they would, I might be absolutely wrong. This order you showed me is absolutely new to me, as an official document.

Senator FALL. I am speaking now of a witness who might not think so well of some of the officials or people in Mexico with whom he might do business as you might with whom you do business.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Senator FALL. Suppose he were to give evidence reflecting upon the conduct of officers of the National Government of Mexico as against himself personally, do you think that under this order and under the conditions that exist his passport would be viséd, and he would be allowed to go over there?

Mr. CURTIS. I tell you Senator, that is a long guess; the order says absolutely "no"; I am talking about the whole Republic of Mexico.

Senator FALL. I am talking about Arizona, and a case pretty close to Nogales.

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know; if they had orders to stop them, they would refuse to issue the visé; but I have not heard of cases where they have been. There have been a lot of Americans made complaint to the Society for the Protection of American rights and through our State Department. You know that a lot of them have made complaints, and many of those people go right down there, back and forth, all the time. They have not reported to the Senator, but they have reported to the State Department and they are silent.

Senator FALL. Have you seen publicity given to such reports by the State Department?

Mr. CURTIS. No; they don't make them public.

Senator FALL. Then the Mexican Government would have no method of knowing it?

Mr. CURTIS. No; that is true. But we used to have a society down there; it was not a big one, Society for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico, that several of us joined, it was on the same idea, and we did not put personally in any complaint, but I know several were put in by friends of mine and they would be sent to the State Department, and the State Department would send them over to the Mexican ambassador, and then they would go down to Mexico City and back to the governor of the State, and then the governor of the State would be peeved and make it more or less disagreeable for the fellows and ask them why they did not come directly to him. We would always go directly to the State authorities and we would tell them just what we thought about it, and they would adjust it in a very satisfactory manner to us. I am speaking of my own individual interests and others; it might take several weeks or a month to get it adjusted on a satisfactory basis.

Senator FALL. You have referred to certain instances in which certain citizens have appealed to their own Government against acts of injustice and their protests were given to the Mexican Government and the Mexican Government would in turn send them to the State authorities or to the border authorities of Mexico, and the authorities of the State would be peeved at the American citizens?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You have referred to cases of that kind?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir. Instead of that process we go right straight to the State authorities and we get very good satisfaction.

Senator FALL. For something happening on this side of the line?

Mr. CURTIS. No.

Senator FALL. Whom would you go to?

Mr. CURTIS. I did not understand happening on this side of the line.

Senator FALL. Suppose you had a ranch on this side of the line and the people on the opposite side of the border the officials, Army men, came across right into your pasture and took your stock out and carried it into Mexico and you wanted a return of the property, what would you do?

Mr. CURTIS. Go to the American Government.

Senator FALL. Suppose the American Government made protest to the Mexican Government, and the Mexican Government sent that protest to the very men who had committed the depredation?

Mr. CURTIS. That is different; in that case I would go right to the American Government. Over here conditions are different from what those other fellows have over in Texas.

Senator FALL. No; I am talking about Arizona.

Mr. CURTIS. Arizona?

Senator FALL. Arizona, yes; and New Mexico and Arizona in the immediate vicinity of Nogales.

Mr. CURTIS. I have not heard of any of those, except some of those cow men all the time have had trouble for many years, cattle driven across the line and getting mixed up. I have thought more particularly about the business of Americans in Mexico.

Senator FALL. Do thieves come across the line from Mexico into Arizona from time to time?

Mr. CURTIS. I guess they do; I don't know; they claim they do.

Senator FALL. Have you ever known in the last two years of the Mexican authorities ever deporting or turning over to the American authorities any man accused of an offense on this side?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know of any specific instance. I know that Col. Carnahan since he has been in Nogales has been in very close touch with the Mexican authorities very frequently.

Senator FALL. You are talking about the military law. We are not under military law; I am speaking of the enforcement of the every day law.

Mr. CURTIS. I can not say about specific instances of cattle offenders, but I know——

Senator FALL. I don't mean for the extradition of a cow. There is no extradition treaty in reference to the return of a cow; but I am talking about the return of a man charged with an offense against the law on this side of the line. Have you ever known of the Mexican authorities in the State of Sonora in the last seven or eight years ever returning a man who was wanted here for the violation of the law?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't remember any specific instance but I know this, since I have been on the council in Nogales with our mayor, we are in harmony with the peace officers on the Mexican side. They work together, they cooperate, I don't know about the specific extradition of any individuals, but I know that they help each other and those fellows over there are very decent with us in trying to find pilferers on the American side who escaped across the Mexican line and send them back.

Senator FALL. Do you remember any instance?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't remember any instance, you can get that from Mr. Lowe. He will tell you that we are getting along very nicely and that they work together. You could not ask for any better cooperation than we have had there.

Senator FALL. That is a fact in reference to the military also?

Mr. CURTIS. I know that Col. Carnahan, who is the commanding officer in our district, has got along very well with the military men on the Mexican side and they have frequent conferences and they get along very well and they are disposed to help us in running down these bad actors along the line.

Senator FALL. I asked you if you could relate any particular instance where they have returned to this side any man wanted on this side?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't remember, Senator.

Senator FALL. The cooperation which you have spoken of has extended to the immigration department and to the collector's department also?

Mr. CURTIS. I am not familiar with that, Senator. I don't know how that works out. The best evidence of that would be the representatives of those departments, that would be my opinion; I don't know about that.

Senator FALL. You are aware of the fact, I presume, that this committee which is now sitting here is the committee of the United States Senate formed from the membership of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you read the Congressional Record?

Mr. CURTIS. I do at times, Senator, I do not read it right along.

Senator FALL. Have you ever been informed as to how this committee was appointed, Mr. Curtis?

Mr. CURTIS. Appointed by the President, I understood, I am not familiar with it though.

Senator FALL. Do you know what instructions were given to the committee here?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. And your impression has been it was appointed by the President?

Mr. CURTIS. That is what I understood; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Mr. Secretary, get me a copy of the resolutions under which this committee is acting. I will read to you the resolutions under which this committee is acting:

SENATE RESOLUTION 106.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the matter of damages and outrages suffered by citizens of the United States in the Republic of Mexico, including the number of citizens of the United States who have been killed or have suffered personal outrages in Mexico, and the amount of paper indemnities for such murders and outrages; the quantity of damages suffered on account of the destruction, confiscation, and larceny of personal property and the confiscation and deprivation of the use of lands and destruction of improvements thereon; the number of citizens of the United States residing in Mexico at the time Porfirio Diaz retired from the Presidency of Mexico, and the number of citizens of the United States at present residing in Mexico, and the nature and amount of their present holdings and properties in said country; and, in general, any and all acts of the Government of Mexico and its citizens in derogation of the rights of the United States or of its citizens; and for this purpose to sit at any time or place during the session of Congress or during recess, and with authority to subpoena such witnesses and documents as may be necessary, and to make a report of its findings in the premises to the Senate; and the said committee shall further investigate and report to the Senate what, if any, measures should be taken to prevent a recurrence of such outrages.

The committee is appointed by the Senate itself, under the authority given in the resolution which I have read, and under the directions and instructions—resolution 163 was reported out of subcommittee and adopted, and is as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 163.

Resolved, That the Subcommittee on Foreign Relations, appointed under authority of Senate resolution No. 106 to investigate Mexican affairs, be, and it is hereby, authorized to send for persons, books, and papers; to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses; to administer oaths; to conduct hearings; to travel to and from any points where a sitting of the committee may be necessary; to employ interpreters, stenographers, clerks, and any other necessary assistants; and to provide for the care and preservation of testimony, papers, and documents.

The expenses of said subcommittee and its necessary assistants in discharging its duties under the provisions of said resolution No. 106 and of this present resolution to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the subcommittee.

Now, Mr. Curtis, have you any reason to think that this committee, from anything that you have heard of the proceedings, in any way has exceeded the authority or gone beyond the directions given it in the resolutions which appointed it?

MR. CURTIS. No, sir; I do not. Reading that, Senator, it seems to me to read as though it was to find out the dark side more—to find the damages to be paid and outrages that have been committed, not so much as to get the true side. How does that read to you?

SENATOR FALL. No; you are mistaken entirely, I read and emphasized the last direction—and the said committee shall further investigate and report to the Senate what, if any, measures should be taken to prevent a recurrence of such outrages.

In other words, this committee must report upon the facts as it finds them, not only the specific facts of the amount of damage, or the specific acts under which the damage was done, but what, if any, measures shall be taken by the Government of the United States to prevent a recurrence of such acts.

MR. CURTIS. I understand.

SENATOR FALL. Now, in doing so the committee has opened its hearings with a general invitation everywhere it has had its hearings, from Washington to Tucson, general invitation for everybody who wished to come forth to come before this committee and make a statement in reference to the condition of affairs in Mexico, so that we can conscientiously perform our duty as we see it in making report to the United States through the Senate. The meetings are open except where, at the request of the witnesses themselves, they are held in executive session. We hold no executive session except where especially requested; where such is the case we do hold executive sessions, as we are authorized to do.

This resolution was offered in the United States Senate by Senator King, of Utah, and referred in the ordinary course to the Foreign Relations Committee, the Foreign Relations Committee unanimously adopted same and directed me to make a report to the Senate. I did so, and the resolution was then amended in the United States Senate, and as amended was adopted as it stands now without a dissenting voice; every Senator present voted for it. The next resolution in reference to its powers, and giving the committee the right to use any amount of funds in its discretion necessary, I was directed to report out of the Foreign Relations Committee by a unanimous vote of that committee, and it was adopted by unanimous vote of the United States Senate. The first act of the committee was officially to take up with the different departments of the United States, administrative departments, furnish them with a copy of the resolution, and take up with the different departments the matter of cooperation between the War Department, State Department, and the Treasury Department, and the Department of Justice of the United States, the question of close cooperation between those departments and this committee. The committee is exceedingly gratified to say to you and takes this opportunity to state to the public that this cooperation up to date has been very close.

The committee has been able, I think, to give to the departments information which was not furnished their offices. It has received, without any hesitancy, from the departments such information, official and otherwise, as it has requested. It is not a political committee; the majority of the committee are of one party. It is constituted of three members, Senator Smith, of Arizona, Senator Brandegee, of Connecticut, and myself; I am chairman of the committee. Under these directions we are in close cooperation with the different departments of the Government; we are directed sincerely to carry out the directions given us by Congress in good faith, with no animosity toward anyone, without bias or prejudice for or against anyone. I think I can say that, having 39 years intimate knowledge of Mexico and the Mexican people, irrespective of my own views founded upon intimate knowledge of Mexican people and officials of Mexico, there has not been a word of bias or prejudice or condemnation uttered by any member of the committee in reference to any Mexican faction, revolutionary or otherwise, or in reference to any individual holding office in Mexico. In the course of its investigation the committee were confronted at San Antonio, Tex., with this condition: A great many witnesses were subpoenaed from Brownsville, the Big Bend District, and towns west, at San Antonio. Through its private sources of information the committee ascertained that Consul de la Mata at San Antonio wired his state department and wired the ambassador for instructions as to how witnesses appearing before this committee should be treated by himself and other consuls.

The committee at once took the matter up with the State Department in Washington. Shortly thereafter appeared this general circular issued by the Mexican Government. Immediately secret sessions of this committee were forced to be held because witnesses who had business in Mexico stated that they could not go back to Mexico. In El Paso, Tex., one witness who appeared before the committee went back with his passport, which had been honored at the Port of Nogales, desiring to return, asked that his passport be visé; he was not allowed to go into Mexico. In the case of the sheriff of one of our counties on the Rio Grande, having constant business across the border, he testified before this committee under subpoena that visé of his passport was refused. In the case of one—two prosecuting attorneys, the Mexican authorities refused to visé their passports. They were American citizens and under compulsory process to attend the meetings. Those of you who know the border understand conditions here; we know conditions in Nogales; we know that four-fifths of your business is done with Mexicans. We know that people along this border have had very severe times in the last few years, those who have been doing business with Mexico, and that now, due to present conditions along the west coast, they have an opportunity to do business with Mexico without such immediate fear of loss as they have been compelled to face in the past.

This committee has associated with it several investigators. It has associated with it the regular intelligence officers of the United States Army. It has associated with it some of the officials of other departments of the Government; they make reports constantly to it, and they have preceded the committee wherever it has gone; they have been in Nogales; they have interviewed citizens and have interviewed merchants, and they have absolutely requested all of those who have been interviewed that no publicity should be given to their names nor to any evidence which they might give, and they have testified only because they were served with process, and they have made these requests of this committee. The chairman of this committee, in a letter to one of the officials of this committee in Washington recently in reference to other matters, explained that certain conditions existed along the border which would hamper the work of the committee; this was in relation to the return of the committee to Washington, that its work had been delayed due to just exactly the conditions which I have just stated—that is, to the order of the Mexican Government that no witness appearing before this committee should be allowed to return to Mexico. This order which you have read. That that has been given general publicity and that the work of the committee was hampered. That a deplorable condition existed in various places along the border. The reason that Douglas and Nogales happened to be mentioned was because the committee had concluded its business at other points along the border and was coming here next. Then, one reason the names of those two places happened to be mentioned, the writer of the letter himself deplored conditions as they have existed.

Now, the reason I have made this statement to you is because of the statement purporting to be signed by yourself and Mr. Barnes, yourself as chairman or president of the Chamber of Commerce, and Mr. Barnes as chairman of the Young Men's Business Association, I believe, and because of the use of the language as reported in the paper: "The business men of Nogales emphatically resent reflection cast upon them by Senator Fall. In no matter pertaining to America has Nogales ever shown the white feather. The business men of Nogales are not afraid to testify before the Fall committee, and desire the opportunity to present certain facts about Mexico, particularly the West coast, which might be enlightening to that body." The committee is grateful to you for the views which you have presented to this committee, which are enlightening to this body in reference to the present conditions. "Nogales business men do not see how a policy founded on low passion and hatred can benefit us as a liberty-loving country or Mexico struggling to settle her internal difficulties." Now, what did you have reference to in the statement, "policy founded on low passion and hatred"?

MR. CURTIS. All this stuff the papers were putting out—now, the newspapers were just full—for instance, the Los Angeles Times, they are not intended to bring about friendship between the two countries.

SENATOR FALL. Now, what do you refer to?

MR. CURTIS. Hardly a day the papers don't come out and say something tending to antagonize.

SENATOR FALL. That is a rather broad statement, let's see; can you point out some specific instance?

MR. CURTIS. I don't know that I can, Senator. But it seems to be the spirit of a whole lot of the newspapers to criticize all the time. They very seldom say anything good, or attempt to bring about better relations. Our policy in Nogales has been to bring about better relations instead of criticizing all of their people, and not criticize ourselves. They don't pretend to be perfect. Our policy has been to cooperate and encourage instead of criticize.

Senator FALL. Have you reference to the activities of the Association for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I did not refer to that.

Senator FALL. You referred to the activities of the Los Angeles Times?

Mr. CURTIS. Not specifically the Los Angeles Times; all papers seem to be getting out articles to antagonize and attack the Mexicans in general. That is our feeling. That was not intended for this committee so far as that goes. I think there was a whole lot of unjust criticism going out in the press, that is what we were criticizing. Senator Smith was down in Nogales the other day, he said in an address that this committee was impartial, and glad to get evidence on both sides, so I considered this committee just as you said, that it is—up to that time I had thought it wanted only one side, after Senator Smith said that—Senator FALL. But it was after Senator Smith's address that you gave publicity to this statement?

Mr. CURTIS. I don't consider that applies to your commission. That is an attack on the unjust criticism floating around through a large section of the country.

Senator FALL. Can you give us one instance of that unjust criticism?

Mr. CURTIS. It is the disposition of a whole lot of people to take a crack at Mexico every time they get a chance; I don't know of any particular instance, Senator.

Senator FALL. Well, there have been statements of that kind, and other charges of that kind, same being made through the public press. You have not, of course, paid any attention to the printed hearings of this committee?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; I have not been here.

Senator FALL. I mean for the last four months this committee has been holding hearings and sending them out?

Mr. CURTIS. I have read several, not very many.

Senator FALL. Mr. Curtis, the charge was made, and made by a committee—a subcommittee of some committee in New York, the general committee, I have forgotten the name of it, composed of good people, of course; a certain subcommittee, dealing with Mexican affairs, with whom Dr. Inman was a prominent member, and a man by the name of McDonald, chairman, I believe, made exactly such charges as you just stated, but more particularly with reference to the activities of the Society for the Protection of American Rights; that they were filling up the papers with these charges against Mexico and the Mexican people; that this association and this committee was sending out subject matter for all the newspapers and asking publicity for it. They voluntarily came before the committee and stated their offer to appear had been rejected by the House committee which had been investigating affairs. These gentlemen were asked, like you, to particularize; they undertook to do so in reference to two instances, one article published in a San Francisco paper and another published in a Washington paper. They charged that the Society for the Protection of American Rights in Mexico had secured these articles and that they were untrue and were calculated to inflame opinion; they were making a defense of the Carranza government, issuing these special articles and sending them out for free publication. I would be glad for you to read the testimony of Mr. McDonald, Mr. de Bekker, and Dr. Inman on that subject.

Mr. CURTIS. I would be glad to.

Senator FALL. Then a director of the Association for the Protection of American Rights was called before this committee and was examined and cross-examined as to the foundation for these two stories, which, it was charged, were published for the purpose of inflaming opinion against Mexico. One was checked up with Gen. Churchill behind it, in command of the Intelligence Department of the United States Army. The other was also checked up, showing that they were not guilty of seeking publicity or doing anything which they could not prove and which was not founded in fact. When we hear that general charges are made that papers are trying to inflame public opinion, why, we try to particularize, and in no case have we been able to find anyone that can do so better than you now.

Mr. CURTIS. I say it is generalities. I can not state; it is just my feeling that they are; and it is the feeling of a great many.

Senator FALL. Don't you think that feeling is—possibly that feeling is encouraged by some of the publications, and the publications to the contrary, which charge this committee and certain interests in the United States with seeking intervention in Mexico for their own personal interest?

Mr. CURTIS. It might be. Now, let's go down to this thing. As far as Senator Smith goes I have known him ever since I came to Arizona. He is a Democrat and I am a Republican; I have voted for him several times. If I had thought he was a man of low passion it is a cinch I would not have voted for him; and so far as you are concerned I have known you a long time; I have the utmost respect for you as being a man of good character, so far as that goes, either one of you two gentlemen, as being men of good character, and I would be sorry if you thought I was making a slam at you, because that was not in my mind. I think you men are fair-minded and are endeavoring to get the truth of this thing, and I would be very, very sorry for you to get the interpretation that I was making a slam at you personally, because that was not in my mind.

Senator FALL. So far as that goes, so far as I am concerned, I am accustomed to criticism of a very much more virulent character than that contained in your statement; even if you had intended it I don't care anything about it, but any statement made by you American citizens, tending to reflect upon the activities of this committee, does a very great injustice and injury to your own country.

Mr. CURTIS. I agree with you.

Senator FALL. If you have reasons to believe that this committee is guided with some ulterior motive—I am perfectly aware of the fact that it is reported here in Tucson that I am guided in my activities in regard to Mexico because of my personal pecuniary interests. I don't care. The facts can easily be ascertained if they want to ascertain them.

Senator SMITH. They are charging that you and I are representing the money interests of Mexico; that is the propaganda that they are circulating. It is ridiculous. I want to say in this connection that Senator Fall's letter, of which you complain, may have been somewhat due to me. I don't know; I never asked the Senator about it, but I spoke to him about holding meetings at Douglas and Nogales. I told him that the business men told me that if they were to be called upon to testify that they would be subjected to the absolute loss of all their property that they had in Mexico, or their trade with Mexico, if they made a public statement before the committee, to their ruin, and there was no criticism of the very high spirit that Senator Fall and I both recognized in both the people of Douglas and Nogales, and that instead of casting any reflection on them, it was the contrary, whereas, knowing the condition of this, that a man would not be able to go into Mexico; it was not directed to Nogales or Douglas people, as to their attitude, because it would apply to all, but that was our purpose in stating the trouble to get testimony, because we had noticed the attitude of the witnesses who went before the committee; they had refused to visé the passport of witnesses who had been before the committee. It is hardly fair to put those men in that hole, and the committee can not afford very well to do so. It was not a slur on the patriotism of those people.

Mr. CURTIS. I am frank to say that when that statement came out it kind of got under my hide. It did not consider I was a good enough American to do my duty, I was afraid to do my duty. I was very sorry it should come out to cast reflection on us. I did not think it was hardly fair. I think it is unfortunate.

Senator FALL. I have no apologies to make for it. It stated the absolute truth in reference to Nogales, and with reference to Douglas. I am not at liberty to give the names of the witnesses to have been present who have made the same request; I am not at liberty to give the names of your own citizens and business men who have made that request of this committee, who have positively stated it would mean ruin to them if they testified in public. I must guard them just as we try to guard the interests of any American citizens, and as we would guard any Mexican that came before the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. What you refer to, Senator Fall, about the information you had from people in Nogales, I realize that you have sources of information, I have no doubt, confidential, and very likely better than I have. I am not criticizing you.

Senator FALL. You did criticize us.

Mr. CURTIS. I did; but I can see now your side of it, that many people very likely have—

Senator FALL. I have been in Nogales since Christmas myself, you did not know that.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not know that. There are two sides to the thing, your information might not be—there might have been conditions that people might not have been free to come to me as they were to you, knowing that the information was going with absolute confidence.

Senator FALL. Now, we had testimony given publicly here yesterday afternoon of a witness, and we presume that every witness taking the oath here to testify to the truth, is testifying to the truth, and we are prepared to defend him against any insinuations to the contrary, until the facts are submitted to prove that he was not—the witness testified openly here yesterday afternoon that certain murders and outrages committed down in Mexico, in reference to one particularly, it was attributed to the Yaqui Indians, while, as a matter of fact, it was committed by Carranza soldiers. Do you feel that man's passport would be viséd if he attempted to go back?

Mr. CURTIS. That is a hard question, I don't know whether it would or not. Under that order, of course—that order is broad, straight right off the shoulder, that they would be prohibited from going into Mexico.

Senator FALL. And on account of your very pleasant associations with the officials, the Mexican Government along the border, will you ascertain immediately upon your return to Nogales whether this order has been received by the consul in reference to viséing passports of Americans?

Mr. CURTIS. I would be very glad to. Can I get the date of that, please?

Senator FALL. That is the first question, and second, whether, in the event he has received this order, he will obey the instructions of the order.

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know that he would tell me, I can ask him.

Senator FALL. I am very free to say to you, Mr. Curtis, I have no doubt in the world but what your passport will be viséd and you will be allowed to go backward and forward.

Mr. CURTIS. I don't know, sir; but I hope so. Well, sir, I will do my best.

Senator FALL. I would like to know by telegram, if possible, so I might reassure witnesses from Nogales.

Senator SMITH. We don't want to get them into any trouble if we can help it.

Senator FALL. You don't know whether there were any handbills circulated in the streets of Tucson here containing instructions that witnesses should not be permitted to return?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Then you have only looked at this from one viewpoint—that is your own willingness to come before the committee and testify without fear of the results?

Mr. CURTIS. Well, I am not looking for trouble, but it is inconsistent with my views of citizenship that I or any other citizen would not do my duty; that is what gets me. I might be a fool in this thing, I don't know; I feel it my duty; I don't see how anybody could criticize me for it—what I think is doing right—tell the truth; still some other fellow might do different.

Senator FALL. The committee has very consistently refrained from asking you in reference to specific injuries either to American citizens or to American properties in Mexico, and it has been very largely for the purpose of protecting you.

Mr. CURTIS. Thank you.

Senator FALL. Unless you desire to make some further statement of your own will, Mr. Curtis, we thank you very much for your attendance; you have given evidence confirmatory of other that we have had, that present conditions in Sonora at this immediate time are comparatively peaceful.

Mr. CURTIS. And Sinaloa. Well, I thank you.

(The following letters, received by the chairman the day following from Mr. Curtis, are made part of the record by instructions of the chairman:)

FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
UNITED STATES DEPOSITORY.
Nogales, Ariz., March 8, 1920.

HON. ALBERT FALL,
Santa Rita Hotel, Tucson, Ariz.

MY DEAR SENATOR: For your information I will state that in order that there would be no misunderstanding upon the part of either the Mexican Consul or through him, the Mexican Government, I called upon the Mexican Consul, Hon. E. Tamez, and informed him that I had testified before your committee and desired to know whether or not that would have any bearing upon my going into Mexico or coming out. He informed me that he is authorized to use his own discretion in the matter of whose passports shall be viséd or refused visé. He very kindly informed me that there would be absolutely no objection to viséing my passport under the circumstances.

Yours, very truly,

BRACEY CURTIS.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
UNITED STATES DEPOSITORY.
Nogales, Ariz., March 8, 1920.

HON. ALBERT FALL,
Santa Rita Hotel, Tucson, Ariz.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Since returning to Nogales, after appearing before your committee, it has occurred to me that in my testimony regarding the part of my interview "Low passion," I desire to explain my position clearly, and will thank you to correct your records in case it does not conform to this letter.

The mistake which I made was in the choice of words, and not of sentiment, but neither the words nor sentiment expressed were intended directly or indirectly against your committee.

Taking the statement as it is, my thought was to condemn those always willing and looking for an opportunity to agitate and promote intervention, international misunderstanding, and in general promote trouble along the border between Mexicans and Americans, especially as applies to Sonora and Sinaloa.

Our policy in Nogales has been to cultivate friendly relations between Mexicans and Americans, feeling that the required patience and encouragement in their reconstruction rather than wholesale criticism. They fully realize that they have difficult problems to work out the same as most other countries in the world, especially at this time, and resent obstacles and interference by any foreigners the same as the American Government in cases of deporting undesirable foreigners. Their contention is that they will go half way and be reasonable.

The Chamber of Commerce of Nogales are arranging to have a governor's day in Nogales on April 12, 1920, at which time Gov. de la Huerta, of Sonora, Mexico, and Gov. Campbell, of Arizona, will meet.

We feel by such exchange of idea and courtesies, the two people better understand each other and work more in harmony, and that this class of work, as well as trade excursion, is constructive and to be encouraged by all Americans; and Nogales is working on these lines, which we consider a proper, constructive, and neighborly policy, and thus condemn those agitating and urging intervention, conflict, or misunderstanding between Mexicans and American people.

Respectfully, yours,

BRACEY CURTIS.

TESTIMONY OF MR. A. C. BARNES.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. BARNES. I am a native of the State of Alabama.

Senator FALL. Where have you lived during the last few years?

Mr. BARNES. What do you term the last few years?

Senator FALL. During the last eight years.

Mr. BARNES. During the last eight years I have lived in the States of Colorado and New Mexico and Arizona.

Senator FALL. How long have you been living in Arizona?

Mr. BARNES. I have been living in Arizona approximately 10 months.

Senator FALL. Where?

Mr. BARNES. Nogales.

Senator FALL. You are chairman of the Young Men's Business Association, of Nogales, are you?

Mr. BARNES. Well, under the term of president.

Senator FALL. You joined Mr. Curtis in his statement which has been referred to in his statement—in his testimony—here?

Mr. BARNES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You heard the statement of Mr. Curtis made in reference to that statement; you have also heard the statement made by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BARNES. Chairman of which committee?

Senator FALL. This committee.

Mr. BARNES. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you anything to add to the statement made by Mr. Curtis as to the conditions, etc.?

Mr. BARNES. No, sir; I have not. I would be glad to answer any specific questions that I can.

Senator FALL. Upon what information do you base your statement that the chairman of this committee was in error—to put it mildly—in stating that the citizens of Douglas, Ariz., and along the border were loath to appear before this committee or deterred from doing so by the order of the Mexican Government?

Mr. BARNES. Why, nothing; but it reflected upon, as Mr. Curtis stated, upon the patriotism of the citizens of Nogales.

Senator FALL. Did you interview especially the citizens of Nogales who might be called before this committee to ascertain what their views upon the subject were?

Mr. BARNES. I did not know we would likely be called upon, but several of them interviewed me.

Senator FALL. Among whom?

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Gil Rankin, Mr. Curtis, Mr. William Haley, and several others.

Senator FALL. They all expressed a willingness to appear before this committee and give evidence?

Mr. BARNES. No, sir; they did not express any willingness.

Senator FALL. But simply indignant at the statement made by the chairman of the committee that witnesses were deterred from appearing before the committee?

Mr. BARNES. Mostly regarding the question of patriotism that we owed to our country.

Senator FALL. The use of the word "patriotism" or equivalent term—I believe the term you referred to, "patriotism" in the letter of the chairman of the committee, was that which caused your statement to be made, was it?

Mr. BARNES. Yes, sir; that and that alone, that was the interpretation which we intended, I think.

Senator FALL. If you considered the use of the word, reading it with the context, if you considered the use of that word by myself in the letter to reflect upon the willingness of the citizens of Nogales to come to the assistance of their country in time of peril you were in error. If you, on the other hand, construed it to mean that these citizens, in doing what I considered their duty in giving evidence which might enable the committee to perform its duty, they were deterred because of their financial interest you were correct, and I know the hardships that they were liable to.

Mr. BARNES. Well, personally, I don't consider it a hardship, I feel most willingly to testify to anything that would assist this committee in getting correct information, which I believe they are seeking.

Senator FALL. The chairman of this committee in this letter deplores the conditions existing which prevent American citizens or deters American citizens from giving evidence except in pledged secrecy, that their names will not be disclosed. Those conditions exist, and those gentlemen should know it, if you don't you can ascertain it, and for your private information I will correspond and take it up with the officials and citizens of your town and ask them, if you think it will throw any light upon the subject, as to their willingness to appear before this committee and take the consequences. I am not reflecting upon their patriotism either, but deplore the conditions that exist that deter them in their mind in coming before the committee and testify. Do you know anything about the conditions in Sonora of your own knowledge?

Mr. BARNES. Only my experience based upon visiting Nogales, Sonora, quite frequently within the past 10 months, possibly three or four times a day, and crossing the line about the 1st of February accompanying the trade excursion through the States of Sonora and Sinaloa.

Senator FALL. You know nothing about specific instances of deprivation of property, murder of American miners, American citizens in Mexico, and hardships worked upon them during the last few years?

Mr. BARNES. I know nothing personally; no. Of course, like every citizen of the United States, we read it is bad; that is transmitted through the Associated Press.

Senator FALL. Who is the Associated Press correspondent, if you know, there?

Mr. BARNES. I don't know, but I understand it is the representative of the Herald.

Senator FALL. Do you read the Associated Press dispatches published in the American papers coming through Douglas? I just call your attention to a specific instance.

Mr. BARNES. I presume the El Paso papers come through there.

Senator FALL. In reference to the Associated Press dispatches, for your information, I call your attention to a letter from the superintendent of the Associated Press at San Francisco, in which he uses this language, for instance:

I regret very much that any member should have published this, and especially that they should have credited it to the Associated Press. Denver advises that the story was killed by that office as unverified. Neither the clipping nor your letter gives any clue to the paper that published the story. It was distinctly wrong for this paper to have used the story after the Associated Press had sent the kill. Please let me know the name of the paper, so I may write direct.

I won't read all the balance. Another, addressed to myself:

I have the honor to transmit to you a clipping from this morning's issue of the El Paso Morning Times, containing a correction of a dispatch from Douglas, Ariz., credited to the Associated Press and printed in the Times of February 6.

CORRECTION.

In an article from Douglas, Ariz., dated February 5, credited to the Associated Press, and published in the El Paso Morning Times of February 6, 1920, there were set forth charges, attributed to Orientacion, a Hermosillo, Sonora, newspaper, that United Senators Albert B. Fall, of New Mexico, and Marcus A. Smith, of Arizona, had exercised "extraordinary pressure" against Mexicans in San Antonio, Tex., to coerce them to testify before the Senate subcommittee investigating Mexican affairs, of which committee the two Senators are members.

The publication of this dispatch was an inadvertent error on the part of the Times, since the Associated Press sent a correction requesting all editors not to publish the story, since it was "obviously untrue."

And that Orientacion untrue story came from your Hermosillo, Sonora, paper, attacking the members of this committee.

Mr. BARNES. That is not my paper.

Senator FALL. Of course, I referred simply, in connection with your testimony. I asked who the Associated Press correspondent was because I have a desire to know, and, of course, I will ascertain.

Mr. BARNES. I believe I am correct; I am not sure.

Senator FALL. Do you know the editor of your paper, there in Nogales, the Oasis?

Mr. BARNES. I believe Mr. Bird. I am not sure. He is connected with that paper, I don't know whether editor or owner; possibly both.

Senator FALL. I notice one of the very recent issues of that paper, possibly the issue before the last, quotes a long article in reference to this very matter, which we have been talking about. Did you read that article?

Mr. BARNES. I don't know that I did. I would like to see it, and perhaps I would tell you if I read it.

Senator FALL. In regard to the west coast of Mexico, the committee is perfectly satisfied that no business man in Nogales fears to come before this committee and testify that at present conditions are very much better in Sonora than they have been, particularly prior to the battle between American soldiers and the Mexican soldiers at Nogales in the streets and around Nogales in August, 1918; we have no doubt that business men of Nogales generally will testify to that.

Mr. BARNES. I don't know anything about that; did not at the time.

Senator FALL. And it was not the intention of the chairman of the committee to say that any business man of Douglas had any need to fear that if he came before this committee and testified to the fact that conditions have improved, as they undoubtedly have, that he had no need to fear coming before this committee and giving testimony in secrecy; nor did the letter of the chairman of this committee bear or warrant any such construction. This article continues:

But their testimony would not be the kind for which Senator Fall is looking. Perhaps that is one reason why the Fall committee has not come to Nogales to take testimony.

Mr. BARNES. I don't believe——

Senator FALL. Do you believe that represents the sentiment of the community?

Mr. BARNES. I don't believe the Young Men's Business Association or chamber of commerce made any statement like that.

Senator FALL. This is an article from Mr. Bird's paper.

Mr. BARNES. Oh, I see.

Senator FALL (reading):

The testimony they would get here would tend to discredit that they have been taking down the Rio Grande and would not cause the other to look well if printed in the same report.

Is that the sentiment that the young business men entertain there as to the activities of this committee?

Mr. BARNES. No, sir; that is not the sentiment among the young business men. Our young business men mostly consist of—well, I will say we have forty or fifty ex-service men.

Senator FALL. Oh, well, it is unnecessary to say that personally I know perfectly well there are no more loyal people in the world than the people of Arizona, certainly not any more loyal than the young men, business men, who have been in the service; they have shown that, and no possible construction could have been placed upon my letter whatever of any such thing. Do you happen to know Mr. Bird personally?

Mr. BARNES. I do.

Senator FALL. Do you know anything about his paper?

Mr. BARNES. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether it has any circulation in the State of Sonora?

Mr. BARNES. I think so.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether 175 copies are bought and paid for by the Mexican authorities of the State of Sonora?

Mr. BARNES. I do not know.

Senator FALL. Now, Mr. Barnes, if you have any statement you want to make, the committee would be glad to hear it; if not, why, we thank you very much.

Mr. BARNES. Yes, sir.

(The committee then, at 1.45 o'clock p. m. took a recess until 4 o'clock Sunday afternoon, March 7, 1920.)

The committee met pursuant to adjournment at 4 o'clock p. m. Sunday, March 7, 1920; all members present as in the morning session.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. HARRY WHEELER.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Captain, of what State are you a native?

Capt. WHEELER. I was born in Florida.

Senator FALL. Where do you reside?

Capt. WHEELER. In Tombstone, Ariz.

Senator FALL. How long have you been residing in Arizona?

Capt. WHEELER. Since 1901.

Senator FALL. What is your business now, Captain?

Capt. WHEELER. At the present time I am employed by Toore & Co.

Senator FALL. Cattle and stock business?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What official positions, if any, have you held in the State of Arizona?

Capt. WHEELER. I was sergeant, lieutenant, and captain of the Arizona Rangers from 1903 until, I believe, 1909, when they were abolished by the legislature; sheriff of Cochise County, Ariz., from 1912 to shortly after the outbreak or entrance of the United States into the war, when I resigned and joined the Army.

Senator FALL. You saw service abroad?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Had you seen any military service prior to this time—United States service?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir. I was a member of Troop H, First Cavalry, from 1897 to 1900; then a member of Troop M, Fourteenth Cavalry from 1900 to 1902.

Senator FALL. Were you in the service during the Spanish-American War?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. During your service in the Rangers, with the Arizona Rangers, also particularly during your position as sheriff of your county, your duties called you to the international border between the United States and Mexico?

Capt. WHEELER. Frequently.

Senator FALL. At what points, generally?

Capt. WHEELER. Nogales, Naco, and Douglas; in the country adjoining the Slaughter's ranch, about 17 miles east of Douglas.

Senator FALL. Where were you in June, 1906, if you recollect, Captain? Do you remember the occasion of what was called the Cananea riot?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where were you at that time?

Capt. WHEELER. I was at Benson at that time—lieutenant of rangers.

Senator FALL. Did you go to the border at that time?

Capt. WHEELER. I went to Naco from Benson, and arrived just in time to meet the returning bodies of Americans.

Senator FALL. Under Capt. Reining?

Capt. WHEELER. Capt. Reining.

Senator FALL. Capt. Reining was in command of the Arizona Rangers then?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Then returning from where?

Capt. WHEELER. From Cananea.

Senator FALL. They had gone there on account of the riot and threatened danger to Americans?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Captain, were you in Douglas or Naco during any of the armed conflicts between the Mexican factions at or near those places?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You were not in Douglas, were you, in 1911, during "Red" Lopez's attack on Agua Prieta; or do you recollect?

Capt. WHEELER. I was absent during this attack.

Senator FALL. When were you a witness to the first conflict between Mexican factions at or near any point on the international border?

Capt. WHEELER. I believe a month later. I think the Lopez attack was about April, 1913; a month from that time the second attack, by Gen. Blanco, on Agua Prieta.

Senator FALL. Was this attack on Agua Prieta by Blanco forces successful?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. During this attack, were the lives of the Americans on this side of the line endangered?

Capt. WHEELER. Not during that attack. The Federal troops, under Diaz, went out of town and met the Blanco forces outside of town about two miles, and distributed.

Senator FALL. Then the Diaz forces were distributed out of town, where they would not endanger the American lives?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you in or around Douglas at any other time when an attack was made?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When was the next, approximately?

Capt. WHEELER. I wonder if I have gotten mixed up. The first attack, I remember, was the Blanco attack; and the Lopez attack must have been subsequent to that, because the next engagement, I remember, was the Federals attacking the rebels. I have got the cart before the horse. I don't remember how long that was after Lopez had taken the town, but Gen. Medina Barron, I understand, with Gen. Felix Diaz and Gen. Chapa, of the Federals, to my recollection, made the next attack on Agua Prieta, and occupied it.

Senator FALL. During this attack, were any shots fired across the border?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were American lives on this side endangered?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were any Americans on this side injured, that you recollect?

Capt. WHEELER. I did not see any, but it was rumored that several had been shot, one man at the Gadsden Hotel.

Senator FALL. In what capacity were you there at that time—as a ranger, or was that prior to your service as ranger?

Capt. WHEELER. I believe I was in the customs service at that time.

Senator FALL. Do you recollect the issuance of any orders by the United States Government, through the commanding officers along the line, communicated to the Mexican contending factions in reference to shooting across the line?

Capt. WHEELER. Not at that time; I do not.

Senator FALL. Later you remember that such orders were issued?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Do you remember the occasion of the successful attack by the Madero forces upon the city of Juarez opposite El Paso?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Shortly prior to that there had been an attack made by the followers of Madero upon Agua Prieta?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. It was upon this occasion of the attack upon Agua Prieta by the Madero followers that I intended to question you about, in reference to any orders issued to American soldiers guarding the border, supposed to be communicated to the contending factions?

Capt. WHEELER. I did not hear at that time of any orders.

Senator FALL. Now, after this attack by Chapa and the other officers upon Agua Prieta, when was the next attack, if any, that you recollect?

Capt. WHEELER. The next attack, as I remember, was when Villa attacked.

Senator FALL. In 1916?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; opposite Douglas.

Senator FALL. Were you there at the time of that attack?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In what capacity?

Capt. WHEELER. Sheriff of Cochise County.

Senator FALL. Did you meet or interview any of the members of the contending factions?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Who?

Capt. WHEELER. I met the advance guard of Gen. Villa several miles east of Douglas, right at the line; wire fence separating us, I, and one of my deputies in the early morning of the day of the attack; my deputy was named Charlie Cross.

Senator FALL. What was the condition of the advance guard of the Villa forces you encountered there; physical condition?

Capt. WHEELER. Excellent.

Senator FALL. Did you have a conversation with them?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; they rode up to the fence and addressed us; I was struck by their appearance. They were well disciplined; I had been in the extension of a little gully, a little draw, which they thoroughly, in a military method explored; after they had advanced several hundred yards they returned to where we were. One of them thought that we were in Texas and seemed surprised when he learned it was not Texas.

Senator FALL. Was your conference with these men of a friendly character?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did they ask you any questions about the disposition of the other forces at Agua Prieta?

Capt. WHEELER. They did.

Senator FALL. Did you give any advice in reference to it?

Capt. WHEELER. I did, Senator, I wished to avoid any more fighting. I had seen my people killed, and wounded in those various skirmishes: I did not intend to lie or take sides, but I wanted to avoid a conflict at Agua Prieta if I could do it; I told them the truth, 7,000, I believe that number of troops had been permitted to cross the United States to reinforce that garrison, and I hoped by telling them the truth it would avoid a conflict.

Senator FALL. Did you convince them that you were telling the truth, or did they doubt it?

Capt. WHEELER. They left me as I started in telling about it, they did not appear to believe me; they said that Gen. Scott, I believe it was, in whom they seemed to have great faith, told them that the United States would not permit troops of the other side to pass through the United States.

Senator FALL. These Villa troops themselves had marched across the country entirely within the boundaries of Mexico?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes; so I understood.

Senator FALL. Did they have any artillery with them?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How did they transport their artillery, do you know; did you see any of it?

Capt. WHEELER. I saw it after it was placed; I did not see it in actual transit.

Senator FALL. It is a pretty rough country. You know something about the country they had to cross?

Capt. WHEELER. Very rough; they had trouble, no doubt.

Senator FALL. Then later ensued the battle between the attacking forces and those under Calles and Obregon?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. How long did the fight last?

Capt. WHEELER. To the best of my recollection, two days.

Senator FALL. Did it endanger the lives and safety of the American citizens on this side?

Capt. WHEELER. One soldier was killed.

Senator FALL. One American soldier?

Capt. WHEELER. One American soldier; his name was Jones; the camp there is named after him. There was firing into the United States, but not with the volume or extent that usually accompanies those battles.

Senator FALL. Did Villa make such disposition of his forces as to evidence an intention not to fire into the United States, or did he fire from the south where necessarily he would fire into the United States?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir; he attacked—I can not say south, but throughout the engagement I noticed the fact that there was very little firing entering out side. He attacked from the east.

Senator FALL. Parallel with the border?

Capt. WHEELER. And to some extent from the west, and I heard he did attempt to attack from the south, but I did not see that.

Senator FALL. Were the American troops in Douglas along the line at this time?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; great numbers.

Senator FALL. During any of the previous attacks to which you have referred, or the armed conflicts along the line about Douglas or Agua Prieta, were there American troops there?

Capt. WHEELER. There were patrols; this was the first time they paralleled the line in any force; they took possession of that great ditch that bounds Douglas on the south, for drainage purposes. They formed an entrenchment out of them and had advance posts fully two or three miles east of Douglas.

Senator FALL. Did you know Mr. Rutherford who was in the employ of the smelting company?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Captain, were you present at any other point along the line when conflicts took place between any contending factions?

Capt. WHEELER. I was at Naco.

Senator FALL. When?

Capt. WHEELER. In 1913, I believe, and I believe—not sure as to that time—1913, I was there.

Senator FALL. Do you remember who the leaders of the contending factions were at that time?

Capt. WHEELER. Gen. Ojeda was in command during the first attack, I remember, at Naco; they were attacked by Gen. Obregon and Calles for a period of five or six weeks. It finally culminated in the Ojeda forces being driven out of town, and the place being occupied by Obregon, Calles, and the Yaqui Indians.

Senator FALL. During this five or six weeks of fighting, were the lives and safety of the American citizens in danger?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were there any casualties among them?

Capt. WHEELER. There were a few at that time.

Senator FALL. Were there American soldiers there?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir: the Ninth Cavalry.

Senator FALL. Under whose command?

Capt. WHEELER. At that time I believe Col. Guilfoyle.

Senator FALL. Were you there during any subsequent attack?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Or conflicts? Were American soldiers on the border?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Under whose command?

Capt. WHEELER. I believe at this time Col. Hatfield of the Ninth Cavalry was in command.

Senator FALL. How long did the fighting last at that time?

Capt. WHEELER. That was at the time Gen. Maytorena fought Calles and Gen. Hill into Naco. I understood there were about 15,000 men all told involved in that; that, to my recollection, lasted 80 or 90 days.

Senator FALL. Was there firing across the border at this time?

Capt. WHEELER. Continuously.

Senator FALL. Were the lives and safety of American citizens on this side endangered at that time?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were there any casualties occurring on the American side at that time?

Capt. WHEELER. Seventy-one, Senator, at that time. Eighteen soldiers were killed and wounded. The majority of them wounded, and among the refugees, and citizens something like 30.

Senator FALL. You were sheriff of what county in Arizona?

Capt. WHEELER. Cochise.

Senator FALL. Naco is in Cochise County?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were you in Naco at any time during this fighting in the performance of your official duties?

Capt. WHEELER. I was there all the time.

Senator FALL. What were you engaged in doing there?

Capt. WHEELER. I was attempting to protect my people.

Senator FALL. Were your efforts successful?

Capt. WHEELER. Only partially.

Senator FALL. Well, what means did you take to endeavor to protect the people of Arizona?

Capt. WHEELER. I requested the Federal troops to actively protect my people; which apparently, through some source, they were prevented from doing much against the wishes of the troops.

The troops were willing, as were the officers. I called upon the governor of the State for help, but fearing a conflict of possible conflict between the State troops and the Federal troops I then requested Gov. Hunt not to send the troops.

Senator FALL. You say Federal troops; you mean United States troops?

Capt. WHEELER. United States troops.

Senator FALL. What reason did you have to fear a conflict between the United States and the State troops?

Capt. WHEELER. There were so many people being killed and wounded. One particular day after repeated requests that the firing be stopped I noticed a machine gun that had recently been located in such position that its fire fell into the heart of our town at regular intervals during the day; most of the firing from this gun would fall in our main street. One day a bullet from this gun struck in the street and passed through the window of the Hotel Naco. There was a girl in the office; a young girl I had known from babyhood almost; and entered her piano. I heard her scream and I ran into office and found her face slightly bleeding from broken glass. It made me believe that the thing had to end one way or another. I requested one of the Maytorena agents who was at this hotel continuously to take some steps to end the firing of this gun, and he refused, and I told him then that I would appeal to the troops to drive this faction out of the trench, he said I could appeal all I wished. I told him then if the troops did not do it I would call a posse as sheriff of that county and enfilade his trenches and drive this man out myself, he said that would not be permitted. I went immediately to the colonel and on his reply about the matter I told him what I intended to do, and was told if I did it would be his painful duty, as much as he regretted it, to arrest me and my posse. I said: "There is no martial law, no declaration of war; it is my belief that I am the supreme authority here." He said: "My orders as a soldier will compel me to take the action I have indicated to you," and tears came in the old gentleman's eyes when he told me; and having been a soldier myself I did not question him further; but I had requested aid of the governor, and upon being told by this Army officer that I would be prevented, even arrested if I attempted to protect my own people, and not wishing to embarrass him, or to in anyway cause further embarrassment I requested the Governor not to send his troops.

I did ask the colonel if it was not true then that instead of being there to protect our people he merely occupied the position of being there to prevent us from protecting ourselves, and he said that was about the size of the thing.

Senator FALL. It looked like war to you?

Capt. WHEELER. It looked like war; I knew that was no declaration of war. I could not understand it for this reason, that had a ranch been attacked a mile east or west of this town by bandits I would have proceeded there and protected that ranch.

Senator FALL. But within the territory actually covered by the United States troops on this side you were prevented under orders from protecting the citizens living in their houses?

Capt. WHEELER. Absolutely.

Senator FALL. Americans could not proceed about their business in the streets of an American town?

Capt. WHEELER. They went about the streets at their own peril; I saw a little girl shot in the neck when she was going home with her little arms full of bundles.

Senator FALL. How far were the American troops from the place where this little girl was shot?

Capt. WHEELER. They must have been pretty well back at this time. They had moved into a safer locality; they were about half a mile from the line in their camp. They had certain outposts up near the line part of the time, but they had moved, at that time, to safer quarters.

Senator FALL. Even at the expense of leaving the people, citizens of an Arizona town, at the mercy of these people, who were firing indiscriminately across the line. Was that the status?

Capt. WHEELER. Senator, I can not make any reflection on the troops.

Senator FALL. I don't mean any reflection on the troops.

Capt. WHEELER. I do not wish to answer in any way that would reflect on the troops because both officers and men felt the humiliation and embarrassment to the extent that many times I have seen tears in their eyes over the situation. They were helpless under some one's orders above them.

Senator FALL. Of course we know that.

Capt. WHEELER. I wish to answer fully, only not to—

Senator FALL. Did this action and the occurrences to which you have referred at Naco influence you in the performance of any of your official duties thereafter?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; I became a very humble personage, and supplicated the authorities on the other side for protection.

Senator FALL. What means did you use when you say supplicated?

Capt. WHEELER. I asked Gen. Calles—their trench faced the west, the Maytorena trench, 600 yards west of the Calles trenches, faced the town. Of course there was a great volume of firing from those two trenches, back and forth, and evidently this gun of the Maytorena faction, machine gun, from the southwest section of this trench, was firing at the gun on the north—on the northern end of the Calles trench, which brought the extreme fire through Naco, Ariz. I asked Gen. Calles to have his trench cease firing to give me an opportunity to attempt to enter the Maytorena trench with a white flag on a stick. He consented, and did cease firing. I took my deputy, William Brakefield, to the monument west of town, beyond a few feet of the Maytorena trench, left him there, meaning at that monument, and went over to the Maytorena trench with a handkerchief on a stick. They saw me approaching, and they began to cease firing, and also permitted me to come into their trench. I held a conference with them there in a body for about an hour and proceeded then to find this gun, and change its direction of fire.

Senator FALL. During that fight, this period, there was a total of approximately 48 casualties between the American troops and citizens and refugees in the town of Naco?

Capt. WHEELER. I heard at that time 52; I don't know the exact number.

Senator FALL. Do you know the house commonly known as the Greene Cattle Co. house on the American side of the line there at Naco?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you ever have your attention called to the condition of that house after the battle of Naco?

Capt. WHEELER. That house that was struck by shrapnel?

Senator FALL. Yes, sir.

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was the condition of the house?

Capt. WHEELER. The shrapnel had entered the corner of that house from the west, had come through a room or two—I mean through the roof—and evidently exploded as it entered the kitchen and destroyed the kitchen and stove and nearly everything in the room.

Senator FALL. And perforated the wall on the inside?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; it entered and exploded; the shrapnel shell was all over the room.

Senator FALL. This house was situated on the American side, was it?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; across the line on the American soil.

Senator FALL. Did the shrapnel strike this house during the time when American troops were at or near the border?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Now, Captain, in the performance of any of your official duties, aside from those performed by you immediately upon the border, were you influenced thereafter by what had occurred at Naco between yourself and the Federal forces, by our Federal troops?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; I was.

Senator FALL. You were in charge of the protection of the people of Bisbee, Ariz., in 1917, as sheriff of that county?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In the discharge of your duties there in preserving order did you think it necessary to call for outside assistance?

Capt. WHEELER. Twice.

Senator FALL. Upon whom did you call?

Capt. WHEELER. First upon the governor of the State and then the Government at Washington through the governor of the State.

Senator FALL. What response did you receive from there?

Capt. WHEELER. From the governor of the State the response was, "We haven't any troops," and I never received any response from Washington.

Senator FALL. Did you regard the position at that time in the town of Bisbee, and in that vicinity, as warranting you in calling upon the Federal Government for assistance in the preservation of peace?

Capt. WHEELER. I did.

Senator FALL. In connection with your activities and the performance of your duties as peace officer, were your actions thereafter investigated by any commission or department of the Government of the United States?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. By whom were your acts investigated aside from any subsequent court proceedings?

Capt. WHEELER. Secretary of Labor Wilson and a man by the name of Frankfurter—Felix Frankfurter, I believe—Marsh, and I forget the other name.

Senator FALL. Walker?

Capt. WHEELER. Walker, and one other man.

Senator FALL. They constituted what was known as the mediation committee appointed by the President of the United States, were they not?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. This mediation committee proceeded to Bisbee to investigate occurrences, some of which occurrences you were connected with in your official capacity?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did the commission have you before it?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Did they question you as to why you had not called upon the National Government for assistance?

Capt. WHEELER. They did not question me; I offered that information to them.

Senator FALL. You did make a statement?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Practically what was the purport of that statement?

Capt. WHEELER. I told them I had called on both the Federal and State Governments for assistance in my extremity, that my appeals had not been answered; that the treatment I had received as sheriff in previous times gave me thoroughly to understand, especially since my last appeal went unanswered, that I was upon my own initiative, and I took the only course left to me.

Senator FALL. You referred to the facts you have repeated to the committee as to the action of the Federal troops at Naco?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. In connection with this occurrence at Bisbee to which we have just been referring, did you come in contact with any citizens of Old Mexico?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Were such Mexicans involved in these occurrences at Bisbee?

Capt. WHEELER. A great many.

Senator FALL. What did you learn from these Mexicans, if anything in reference to their action, and proposed action as to the causes leading them to pursue the course which they were pursuing?

Capt. WHEELER. You understand, Senator, that a sheriff will frequently have stories related to him, both correct and incorrect, many of which he is unable personally to run down, but I was frequently told that the Mexicans of the Villa army had cached arms and ammunition in the mountains of Sonora, upon their retreat from Sonora; that many of these Mexicans were former Villa soldiers, and knew where these caches were and intended to secure them at the proper time. I personally heard one Mexican—if you will remember a few weeks before that, or a month or two, the Mexicans ran the Americans out of Cananea, Sonora.

Senator FALL. Drove them out?

Capt. WHEELER. Drove them out.

Senator FALL. The Americans took refuge on the American side.

Capt. WHEELER. Most of them at Bisbee. After six weeks or two months, when peace was restored in Cananea, a great many of the Mexicans came into Bisbee. I heard one Mexican distinctly, heard him remark to an American workman going up the hill with his lunch pail: "We run you out of Cananea a short while ago; we will run you out of here." That is one of the remarks I heard.

Senator FALL. Did you hear what character of arms and ammunition had been cached by the Villistas in the mountains?

Capt. WHEELER. I heard that he had left most of his artillery in the mountains, but the arms spoken of at that time were their rifles. Most of his men were armed with Mausers.

Senator FALL. From information which you obtained through your deputies, and which you regarded as a reliable source, was the purpose disclosed of using those arms in connection with trouble at Bisbee?

Capt. WHEELER. When the proper moment arose.

Senator FALL. Did you ever hear of the plan of San Diego. Captain?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where did you first hear of it, do you know?

Capt. WHEELER. I heard of it in various places. The time I remember best of all was in Tombstone. I heard a Mexican speak of it, and say that the time would soon arrive when this country would be restored to Mexico, and the Mexicans would take their proper station; they would receive what was due them.

Senator FALL. That was the first time you heard of the plan of San Diego?

Capt. WHEELER. I don't know that it was the first time; it was the time most distinct in my memory; I remember the Mexican and his looks; he was a stranger in town.

Senator FALL. By this country being restored to Mexico he meant Arizona?

Capt. WHEELER. Arizona and these border States.

Senator FALL. The border States which had formerly been a part of Mexico; and at Bisbee you heard at least one Mexican say that in a short time—they had run these American miners out of Cananea—in a short time they would run them out of Bisbee?

Capt. WHEELER. "We ran you out of Cananea; we will run you out of here."

Senator FALL. How many—about how many Mexican miners were there in Bisbee during these disturbances?

Capt. WHEELER. Oh, that would be hard to say; I have seen about—extending probably four or five hundred yards in length, column of twos, each day marching up to the I. W. W. headquarters to receive their rations. The I. W. W. was feeding them, all of them on strike.

Senator FALL. These were Mexicans?

Capt. WHEELER. Mexicans; and, of course, a great many Mexicans did not cease work, and there were many Mexicans in camp not interested one way or another.

Senator FALL. Now, who were these Mexicans who were being fed by the I. W. W., as near as you could ascertain; where were they from?

Capt. WHEELER. I believed, and still believe, the majority of them were former Villistas.

Senator FALL. Soldiers in Villa's army?

Capt. WHEELER. Ex-soldiers.

Senator FALL. And you had reasons to believe that more than one of them knew of the arms which had been left by Villa?

Capt. WHEELER. Absolutely.

Senator FALL. Did you have any reason to fear that some arms might be used by these Mexicans in connection with threatened disturbances at Bisbee?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; I did.

Senator FALL. Was this one of the reasons that guided you in pursuing the course which you did with reference to the lawless element at Bisbee?

Capt. WHEELER. It was.

Senator FALL. Then there were several hundred Mexicans, who, as near as you could ascertain—the largest proportion of whom, as near as you could ascertain, had been with Villa, who were in Bisbee being fed by the I. W. W.?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And who were causing the disturbance there?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Now, do you know of any statement being made by the I. W. W. who were there to the Mexicans with reference to their purpose—how it would affect the Mexicans themselves?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What statement do you know of?

Capt. WHEELER. I had arrested A. E. Embree, I believe under indictment now in the Federal court, one of the leaders of the I. W. W. He was brought to Tucson and tried in this court and acquitted by a jury; I believe eight of the jury were Mexicans, but during that trial the statement was sworn to by a Mexican whose name was Peralta—Antonio Peralta—saying that the Mexicans were induced to quit work. This was subsequent, all having been told by these head men in Bisbee, that it was to their interest that Germany should win the war; it was to the interest of the Mexicans and to Mexico that Germany should win the war. That was the inducement to them to cease work by the head men. That testimony can be corroborated because it is in the court records here in Tucson.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether the Mexican citizens passed backward and forward with comparative freedom across the line between Cananea and Bisbee about this time? You spoke of some.

Capt. WHEELER. It is much more difficult now than it was in those days. In those days anyone could go a mile east or west of these ports and cross.

Senator FALL. Captain, what has happened down along the international boundary with reference to the safety of American citizens on this side of the boundary unless protected by forces or troops, for several years past, if you know?

Capt. WHEELER. Why, I can only speak for my own county. Outside of those attacks on those towns we have been singularly free from occurrences. I remember only one instance where I was called upon to allay any excitement or trouble among the Americans or Mexicans in my county. That was over here at Johnson's the whites had taken their women and children into the little school house and the Mexicans had separated and gone up in the mountains, each side feared the other; I never learned the cause, but it was of such a nature I was able to go alone among them and pacify both parties; that is the only trouble I ever had.

Senator FALL. The country is not very thickly settled?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. And there is no canal or river such as exists below El Paso on the international boundary?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. The boundary line between Arizona and Old Mexico generally, particularly that portion within your jurisdiction, simply is an imaginary line, marked by monuments, and in some places by wire fences?

Mr. WHEELER. By wire fences; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you ever known of any attempt by citizens on this side of the line to commit any act of outrage or aggression or attack upon the lives or property of Mexicans on the other side of the line during these years; I mean citizens?

Capt. WHEELER. Not of American citizens, except that time I referred to, I referred to when that unfortunate conflict took place when these people went across and rescued the officers at Amarillo.

Senator FALL. That you have not referred to in testimony, but in conversation between you and me. What was that occurrence?

Capt. WHEELER. Of course, Senator, this is what I have been told; I was not there and did not see it.

Senator FALL. Yes.

Capt. WHEELER. But there was a law in force on the Mexican side at that time which prohibited any one from going into Mexico at any time with firearms. They were duck hunting in some water close to the line, but in Mexico, within a short distance of where a troop of Cavalry was stationed on our side. As I was told, the officers went across the line with shotguns to hunt ducks and were arrested by the Mexican fiscal guard or gendarme rural, as they call them.

Senator FALL. Acting under Mexican law and orders?

Capt. WHEELER. Acting under Mexican law and orders. These troopers went over and rescued their officers, and in doing so killed several of the Mexican guard.

Senator FALL. You thought and I thought that the action of those troopers was to be criticized.

Capt. WHEELER. I could not help but think that.

Senator FALL. The Mexicans were performing their duty under their orders in arresting officers who had gone across there with arms?

Capt. WHEELER. I believe any soldier should obey his orders. I have always regarded those men as having died in obedience of the orders they were acting under in having arrested these officers. I want to be just in any statement I make to you.

Senator FALL. Now, Captain, to refer back a moment to what was known as the Bisbee trouble, resulting later in what was known as the Bisbee deportation cases, you took action upon your own initiative finally after appealing to both the State and the National Government, which was investigated by this committee of which you have spoken?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That action resulted in the driving out, or escorting out of Bisbee of quite a large number of people whom you regarded as threatening to disturb the peace of other law-abiding citizens of Bisbee?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; and in the interest of the country, which at that time was in war.

Senator FALL. And threatening to cut off the production of copper, which was necessary to this country in carrying on the war?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You took the action which you did under those conditions and under that belief.

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir. I will state had it been in time of peace that action would not have been taken.

Senator FALL. Was the gravity of the situation there, in your judgment, increased by the fact that there were a large number of Mexicans over there from the other side, and the fact that it was claimed that they knew where there were at least a thousand rifles cached which they could avail themselves of at the proper time, when that time might arise. Did those facts increase the gravity of the situation as you understood it?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; as I said before it was a factor in summing up the situation.

Senator FALL. Did you know of arms which could be supplied from any other particular source?

Capt. WHEELER. Senator, these men, the majority of them, were strangers. We did not know where they came from. We did not know what they had. While I did not see arms on them exactly, they would not work around in their shirt sleeves with arms. although they may have had arms in their domicile, or out in the hills in caches.

Senator FALL. Did you have information leading you to believe there were any large caches of arms available outside of these which you have mentioned, as available to the Mexicans who were among those strikers?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Did you, from what you have learned, and your observation, did you believe—is it your opinion that any number of Mexicans around through the State, Bisbee or elsewhere, Tombstone or elsewhere in Arizona, actually believed that the proper moment would arrive when, through the activities of Mexicans, assisted by others, that a successful attempt might be made to restore Arizona to Mexico?

Capt. WHEELER. We did not think it would be successful.

Senator FALL. No; but did you learn—entertain the idea—that the Mexicans themselves believed it?

Capt. WHEELER. Oh, yes, sir.

Senator FALL. That they were confident that such an opportunity would arise?

Capt. WHEELER. They even went to the extent of organizing; a working nucleus of organization was called into existence.

Senator FALL. In accordance with the general plan of San Diego?

Capt. WHEELER. And we had rifle clubs in this country formed. At one time we feared they were going to take things into their own hands, but that was prevented by this deportation.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any appeal made to the Government about that time, or later, to assist in arming the citizens here with Government arms? Under the general law of allowing rifle clubs to be furnished with arms from the National Government?

Capt. WHEELER. No; we requested arms, and, according to my recollection, were denied them.

Senator FALL. Do you remember upon what theory you were denied those arms at the time?

Capt. WHEELER. Oh, that I understood that we were irresponsible and might take matters in our own hands peremptorily; that was my understanding. Arms were not to be brought within a mile of the line; that was the reason we were denied arms. They got the idea we were not considered capable of handling them, but we had arms of our own.

Senator FALL. The authorities who denied the request made by the citizens here apparently were not aware of the fact that the average American citizen along the border has arms of his own generally. I asked you if you knew of it because Senator Smith and myself both had some little experience, I think, in the matter of this request, which was transmitted to us in some instances. I remember the fact that Senator Smith's colleague in the United States Senate very severely criticized the Secretary of War for refusing to send arms out here at his request.

Capt. WHEELER. We wanted them.

Senator FALL. You felt you needed them?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes; we thought at that time we needed them.

Senator FALL. Your purpose was to obtain generally, arms of the same caliber?

Capt. WHEELER. That would use the same ammunition.

Senator FALL. Otherwise you did not need them because you had arms of your own?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes.

Senator FALL. But not of the same character or using the same ammunition. Captain, your experience along the border with American troops generally led you to believe that the acts of Col. Hatfield and his statement to you as to his orders represented the general attitude of the soldiers of the United States along the border. That is, that they were there for the purpose rather of preventing aggression from the United States upon Mexico than to protect the Americans against aggression from the other side.

Capt. WHEELER. That became the general belief.

Senator FALL. That has been very generally the belief of the people along the border with whom you are acquainted?

Capt. WHEELER. At the time of the engagement at Nogales of Col Sage, and recently Gen. Irwin, I believed a change of policy had been arrived at. That was the general opinion along the border.

Senator FALL. Captain, although we have asked you in detail questions which we desired to have you answer, generally, we would be glad to have any statement which you make, if you choose to make any further, concerning conditions along the border generally. We would be very glad to hear any statement you have to make, if you choose to make any. I will ask you one more question: Do you think it was a mistake in the policy of the Government of the United States to issue orders—of those responsible for the issuance of such orders as Col. Hatfield was compelled to observe at Naco?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; I do.

Senator FALL. In your judgment if he had been instructed to protect American citizens, even if necessary to drive out both contending factions from their entrenchments at Naco, would he have been able to do so?

Capt. WHEELER. Oh, yes.

Senator FALL. Had he taken such action under proper orders, would the result have been, in your judgment, beneficial or the contrary to the peace of the United States along the border?

Capt. WHEELER. I believe had a firm stand been taken in the beginning, and the factions on the other side been given to understand that drastic action would follow any injury that they inflicted, it would have avoided all that trouble, just as it did avoid trouble in El Paso since that last trouble.

Senator FALL. Or in Nogales in 1918?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes; they knew we were weak; they knew we did not intend what we said; and our troops were forbidden by some authority over them from taking any active part against them. I saw that demonstrated in Naco. Col. Guilfoyle, at the end of an engagement, brought out his color squad, and banner with its beautiful gold fringe; I saw it, and marched up within a few feet of the monument, when a few straggling shots went over, and he ordered the bugler to sound "cease firing" immediately; at the ceasing of that call a volume of fire reopened tenfold, and some of the shots struck that monument; and with these beautiful colors, turned and went back to camp, and nothing further was done. Now, he was unable to put into force, had he desired to put into force, what he said. I may add another instance. Capt. White, of the Ninth Cavalry, now colonel, was with me near the international line; a father and son named Bautista, both Mexicans, were residing on our side, and claimed to be Americans; whether they were or not I don't know; they went over to a little store they had across the line, and put up two American flags to signify their place was under American protection. These troops suddenly returned and detoured the town from the west and cut off many people, thinking they had left town and went over there. They took a great many prisoners.

The father and son were within a few feet of the line. I heard a shot about 10 yards over on the other side. I was at the monument, and I looked up just in time to see the boy fall and this man that shot him. The lad went like that; fell cramped over on his side; I saw him fire the second shot, and the father fell. The boy was unconscious for a few seconds and began screaming for his mother; when he again lost consciousness; the old father raised himself, looked at his murdered son, and fell over on his face. They immediately formed a skirmish line, facing our side, with drawn carbines—the cavalrymen of Ojeda—as though they anticipated an attack or trouble from us; it was a cold-blooded murder; the man that murdered them was named Miranda; he was afterwards taken prisoner, but I attempted to get him. He was ferreted away; I never saw him again. I intended to give him to those people. That leads up to another proposition which I mentioned: Col. White was with his troop and saw it, and we were all indignant; he went over to the line and requested Ojeda's permission to bring the bodies over here, which, in the course of half an hour, was given. They brought those bodies over and took them to their homes, where they were surrounded by their families. That murder was done because they had stuck American flags up on their place of business, which these troops tore down when they reentered the town.

Senator SMITH. Then, instead of the flag of the United States being a protection for the man, it seemed to have led to his death?

Capt. WHEELER. Led to their death—father and son. They were little, tiny flags. They thought that flag being placed on their place of business would protect their place from pilfering.

Senator FALL. Captain, was not there originally a mistake made in the outbreak of the Madero revolution, when, in the attack at Agua Prieta, the President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the Army communicated across the line, through the officers of the Army there, to the Mexican forces that they must not fire a shot across the line so it would injure American lives, and the same order was communicated at El Paso, Tex., to the contending factions at Juarez that they must not fire a shot which would injure American lives, and then the fact that after the communication of such warning from this country to the contending factions the soldiers were not allowed to protect the American citizens on the line?

Capt. WHEELER. Why, of course. I remember at Naco, Senator, after the time I have spoken of but while the same regiment was there. Col. Hatfield, reenforcement was sent of artillery and infantry, so we had troops there at Naco to the number of two or three thousand. Orders were sent across the line "if there is any more shooting into the town of Naco, the United States would act," and we began to think something would be done; they continued to fire over just the same, and nothing was done. The Mexicans called our hands every time, and got away with it.

Senator FALL. We made the bluffs and never backed them up?

Capt. WHEELER. Bluffs.

Senator FALL. And got the bluffs called every time and never made good?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes; but that was not the fault of the troops.

Senator FALL. No; the troops have made good whenever they were allowed an opportunity. Now, Captain, have you anything further to state?

Capt. WHEELER. Why, Senator, there is one thing I might mention; it might not amount to anything. I am not a diplomat, and not any too highly educated, but I believe a great portion of us feel that the trouble existing along this line is due to a great extent to misunderstanding, and in some cases injustice; the Mexicans are not to blame in some cases. I call your attention to our extradition laws, for example. No matter what crime is committed in Sonora, the fugitives escape to this side and they are safe, unless they are kidnaped. That puts you in this position—

Senator FALL. Now, why is that, Captain; there is an extradition treaty between the United States and Mexico?

Capt. WHEELER. It is a faulty one. I have never known of a man having been extradited in all the years I have been an officer, no matter what crime he is guilty of, from our side to theirs, although I have received many murderers from them for crimes committed on our side; but I personally have been compelled to release murderer after murderer that I apprehended after holding them 40 days. They have even admitted to me in jail that they committed these crimes, that they expected to go free, and they did go free.

Senator FALL. Why, in what respect is the treaty so defective that the Arizona courts, or Arizona border authorities—

Capt. WHEELER. Technicalities. Sometimes our Government will claim that we are prevented from recognition of the Mexican Government, or it is the contention that our Government does not wish to extend recognition.

Senator FALL. Has that been the case since the Mexican Government, or during the period when the Mexican Government was recognized by this Government?

Capt. WHEELER. It has been that way always since I have been on this border. I received from them some 15 or 20 men guilty of capital offenses on our side, some of them citizens and Mexicans. Gen. Calles apprehended a man, a Mexican citizen, that killed my deputy in Bisbee; he delivered that man to me at Agua Prieta, and he is now in the penitentiary.

Senator FALL. I am glad to know that.

Capt. WHEELER. Gen. Calles has been a man of that description, but here, when he has a cold-blooded murder committed, and the offender escapes over here, and I apprehend them, he asks me for them, I am up against it. I have to show the ingratitude of the people over here, or I must kidnap him and give them to him in the night time, which naturally makes me guilty of the crime of turning him loose; that is just one instance.

Senator FALL. Have you some particular instance in mind?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Now, in that instance was requisition made on the governor of Arizona for the return of those men?

Capt. WHEELER. In some instances they were made, but the Mexicans know how it is useless, and they—no matter the criminal you apprehend for them, knowing it is useless they no longer attempt to get them. They remain in jail 40 days, you open the door and turn them out. The last man that I caught, the man that murdered two of Calles' guard right opposite our soldiers, he got angry and shot them down in cold blood, came on our side, I caught him, put him in jail in Tombstone; they made every effort, I was informed, to legally extradite that man; when the 40 days were up I was compelled to turn him loose.

Senator FALL. I would like to go a little further with that case. You say he made every effort; did he make requisition upon the proper authorities. Of course, you understand in extraditions, it can not be left to the discrimination of the sheriff or peace officers along the border. As you say Calles sent the extradition in in the case you mentioned, as governor of the State?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; governor general.

Senator FALL. Did Mr. Calles make an effort to secure the extradition of this man from the governor of this State?

Capt. WHEELER. I will say that they informed me they had taken every legal step; of course, I don't know what goes on between the authorities.

Senator FALL. Who was the governor at that time of this State?

Capt. WHEELER. I believe Gov. Hunt. Gov. Hunt was.

Senator FALL. All you know was that you held the man for 40 days under the terms of the treaty and was compelled to turn him loose?

Capt. WHEELER. Repeatedly.

Senator FALL. I have reference to this one instance.

Capt. WHEELER. This is one instance; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You had no intimation from the governor of the State that he was considering the case, or that the courts were lenient with him?

Capt. WHEELER. No.

Senator FALL. Was a writ of habeas corpus sued out by counsel for the prisoner in either of these cases?

Capt. WHEELER. They would have done so had I retained possession of the men longer than 40 days; they were ready to do so; of course, I could not do that.

Senator FALL. But they did not appeal to the courts of Arizona during the 40 days?

Capt. WHEELER. No.

Senator FALL. They could have done so?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes; they could have done so; that is, the lawyers for the defense.

Senator FALL. Yes.

Capt. WHEELER. No; no action was taken.

Senator FALL. They did not suspend the writ of habeas corpus in the United States—have not done so since the close of the Civil War, so the courts were always open to the citizens of Arizona who considered themselves illegally detained.

Capt. WHEELER. Well, these Mexicans, they are safe when they come over the line; they don't worry.

Senator FALL. Their counsel, or at least one of them, had counsel, and the counsel informed you he had pursued every legal method. You had not been called upon to bring him in court?

Capt. WHEELER. Oh, I am speaking of the Mexican Government; it had taken all steps to secure extradition.

Senator FALL. They did not attempt to secure counsel on this side?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. Well, they formerly did. The Mexican consuls along the border formerly obtained or secured counsel in other States and Territories and took steps to secure the extradition and return of parties charged with an offense against the law.

Capt. WHEELER. I have never known of a man to be extradited from my country, and I have had quite a few.

Senator FALL. In my State, not long ago, I took an appeal from the court to the governor, and department at Washington, the Secretary of State, in an extradition matter; I fought it through the courts, and through the executive department, and to the National Government at Washington; the Mexican consul had an array of opposing counsel, employed by the Government of Mexico; they represented that Government, both in the courts, before the legal authorities, before the governor of New Mexico, and before the Secretary of State of the United States.

Capt. WHEELER. I don't think, Senator, that you will find a case in any county in this State where a man has been extradited for any crime he committed in Mexico. It is a haven of refuge for every cold-blooded murderer in Mexico; if he gets to that line he is safe, unless he is kidnapped.

Senator FALL. Are you confining your evidence to the period when there was a recognized Government in Mexico? There was an interim when there was no Government recognized in Mexico, and during that interim cases may have arisen such as you have referred to, but we have an extradition treaty which is yet in force, and I personally know of various instances in which it has been appealed to by both countries.

Capt. WHEELER. Isn't it part of the treaty that the matter may be taken up with the governors of the adjoining States?

Senator FALL. Yes; they have jurisdiction. The governors of the border States, under the treaty, both in Mexico and the United States and Mexico, have jurisdiction in extradition proceedings. The Territories had original jurisdiction subject to an appeal to the department at Washington, but the States have original jurisdiction, and the governor can refuse, in his discretion, any extradition.

Capt. WHEELER. Another illustration I have to offer you. A case of where four or five Mexicans, concocted a scheme in Douglas to rob—

Senator FALL. You refer to the Huerta-Leyva case?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes; and they did rob a major and four officials of the Mexican Government while these officials were engaged in a lawful execution of their office. They returned to this side and it was not long before our officers found out who they were. Some were placed in jail and were immediately gotten out by the lawyers there on uncontested habeas corpus. Every one now was guilty of this cold-blooded murder, and I saw $3,000 gold dug up at Huerta's back door; I was with the police when they dug it up, with a spade, in money sacks, and some one kidnaped Huerta and one or two others and drove them across the line. I am glad I don't know who did it, but it was done. Now, those things are not calculated——

Senator FALL. They were immediately hung at night without trial?

Capt. WHEELER. Hung at night or day, I don't know which.

Senator FALL. You never heard any of the circumstances?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir; I heard that they had confessed to their guilt, however, all but this man Huerta. I found the money dug up at his back door. That is just one illustration.

Senator FALL. It has been reported to some of the departments of this Government, and it is in evidence before this committee, I am sure, that Huerta was guarded on this side of the line by Mexican soldiers. Was that true, Captain?

Capt. WHEELER. I can not say as to that.

Senator FALL. It was reported that Mexican soldiers were allowed to come across the line into Douglas and guarded the house of this man Huerta; that those guards were allowed to be changed, and it has been reported that the question arose later as to whether those men were in the uniform of the Mexican Army, those guards, and, I believe, agreed upon by the parties that they were in about as much uniform as the other soldiers in the Mexican Army were. Do you know whether those facts are correct?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir; I was there Sunday. I was still an officer in the Army at that time, and could not take an active part in this matter, and did not, but my old training led me to go with other officers and form my own opinion. That day one of the officials of the town of Agua Prieta was in the company of the police; he had gotten information from some one they captured on the other side that this money was buried in this yard, and came over and we found it. There were, what appeared to me at that time, Mexican policemen, I think they were, dressed in civilian clothes, standing outside of the yard in the street.

Senator FALL. That is on the American side?

Capt. WHEELER. On the American side. Beyond that I don't know anything of it. I returned to Tombstone and went directly to Nogales where I was stationed.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether the arrest of this man Huerta had been made prior to the time that you saw this gold dug up?

Capt. WHEELER. I believe he was arrested; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. By the authorities?

Capt. WHEELER. On a warrant in Douglas, I don't know though.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether an application for a warrant was ever made?

Capt. WHEELER. I believe there was. I think I was told there was one made.

Senator FALL. I have been informed, or the committee has been informed by witnesses, that search of the record disclosed the fact that no complaint could be found on the records.

Capt. WHEELER. We had one man in Tombstone for a long time. There must have been a warrant in his case; his case was tried and he was gotten out by a lawyer named Doane.

Senator FALL. Was he one of the men hung?

Capt. WHEELER. No, sir; he is at liberty now in California, although he was probably one of the instigators.

Senator FALL. You don't know, then, that there was no requisition made upon the governor or any attempt made to appeal to the civil authorities to see that the ordinary course of the law was pursued in an attempt to secure the delivery of those people to the other side?

Capt. WHEELER. Now, we are getting at it, the facts in all these previous years, every attempt that I ever had any information of through our officials—

Senator FALL. What previous years do you know of?

Capt. WHEELER. I was ranger nearly six years there; I was sheriff six years; I may say, during that time I don't remember one single instance of lawful extradition.

Senator FALL. Do you refer now to any period prior to 1910 or 1911?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir; I refer to times dating back to at least 1903.

Senator FALL. Have you in mind any instance when an attempt was made in trying to secure the extradition of any fugitive from justice from Mexico in 1910 or 1911, when such an attempt failed?

Capt. WHEELER. I can not remember any specific case, instance, of their attempting, because, as I have stated before, the officials did not know of what steps were being made by higher officials. We merely did our duty as officers to place these men in custody; of course, we were not always aware of what steps were being taken. We merely have a remembrance of arresting numerous criminals and having to turn them loose.

Senator FALL. You know, of course, we have laws—supposed to have laws—and have courts to enforce them, and representatives supposed to enforce the law, and juries, and that you must proceed according to the regular course of the law, unless you are excusable in some specific instance by force of circumstances in pursuing some other course than that legally laid down. For instance—for example, in the matter of the deportation at Bisbee you appealed to the law; you appealed to the authorities for assistance in handling the conditions there, which required strenuous action, in your judgment, in view of the failure of the authorities to extend you such assistance as you thought the case demanded, you considered yourself justified, and considered—and your course has been considered justified by many thoroughly law-abiding citizens, not only of this State but of others, but in the ordinary course of an extradition proceeding such action, or action outside of the law, ought not to be necessary, should it? That does not involve the peace of an entire community; that is a specific case. Now, the law lays down a procedure which should be followed; you, of course, believe that the law should be followed?

Capt. WHEELER. I do.

Senator FALL. Now, in the event of the failure in that specific instance, or in the event, on account of the acuteness or activity of counsel for the defense, if the defendant or the prisoner is released, you don't think that justifies arbitrary action by citizens of another country, do you?

Capt. WHEELER. Well, now, I will put it to you this way: The safety of our own citizens on isolated ranches depends, as you know, upon the certainty of punishment, for any outrages perpetrated upon them, and in nearly every instance in the old days when crime was rampant here, the culprit would make for the international border, and frequently—well, 9 times out of 10 would beat the officers to the line; therefore your only hope of punishing them was through the officers on the other side; when they responded in good faith, made every effort to apprehend these people, which they invariably did in those days and returned them to you for punishment, and then when the occasion was reversed, and they suffered depredations, and you failed, it became a matter of time when they ceased to interest themselves in those committing depredations over here escaping into their territory, and in a measure, our officers, in every instance, where they have illegally delivered culprits to the other side, I am certain was done in the hope that when the occasion demanded they would be able to apprehend and bring back for trial those who committed depredations against their own laws. I regret very much that this state should exist. You understand what I mean, don't you?

Senator FALL. Yes; I think I follow you, but I don't understand that the governor of this State—I regret to think that the governor of this State, upon a proper case presented to them would allow the time to expire under the treaty or would refuse to deliver a culprit to the State seeking or demanding his extradition.

Senator SMITH. Captain, do you know of your own personal knowledge of any criminal coming to the United States from Mexico being refused delivery to Mexico on a requisition properly made by the legal authorities of Mexico on us or our authorities?

Capt. WHEELER. Why, Senator, as I before stated, I was given to understand by the Mexican authorities that representations had been made to obtain the extradition for various criminals, yet I don't know.

Senator SMITH. You don't know of any case exactly as I have stated this, presumably where the authorities of Mexico have made out a proper demand for the extradition of a prisoner guilty of a crime in Mexico, or our refusal on proper demand to return the prisoner; do you personally know that such a procedure has ever been had and the prisoner allowed to remain in jail 40 days?

Capt. WHEELER. Only what I have been told.

Senator SMITH. Do you personally know?

Capt. WHEELER. No; I could not personally know unless—

Senator SMITH. Unless you saw the papers and talked to the governors of both States, and they admitted what had been—

Capt. WHEELER. This may throw light on what I mean; this is from Gov. Hunt. to me:

Senator FALL. What year?

Capt. WHEELER. I don't know; it is not here.

Capt. HARRY C. WHEELER,
Sheriff Cochise County, Naco, Ariz.:

Since receiving your telegram of this morning I have been in communication with Maj. Geo. W. Read, of the Federal troops stationed at Naco, and have been informed by him that due notice of attack has been assured by the leaders of the Constitutionals about to besiege Naco, Sonora, Mexico. Maj. Read has expressed confidence also of the ability of the United States troops to secure proper protection for American citizens residing in and near Naco, Ariz. I would suggest, therefore, that you get in touch with Maj. Read with a view to keeping informed on the progress of events affecting the safety of American citizens and cooperating for their protection so far as may become expedient. I appreciate your prompt action in this matter and would willingly address the governor of Sonora in my official capacity, as you request, were it not for the fact that international relations between the United States and Mexico at this time are such that I should not in my opinion, advisedly extend official recognition to the representatives of either the Huerta régime or the Constitutionals. Should the situation in Naco be altered materially I would appreciate receiving telegraphic advices thereof from you.

GEO. W. P. HUNT,
Governor of Arizona.

Senator FALL. What was the date of that?

Capt. WHEELER. No year. That was at the time—it must have been 1913.

Senator FALL. That was subsequent to February, 1913, and prior to November, 1915. Between those dates?

Capt. WHEELER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And when there was no government recognized in Mexico, and when the action of the governor of Arizona in his official capacity might have been construed by the National Government of the United States, or by some foreign Government, or by Mexican Government as a recognition by the United States authorities in control of a supposed State government in Sonora, and cause international complications of a serious character. You will recollect that on August 27, 1913, the President of the United States addressed to Congress a communication in which he stated that there was no recognized government in Mexico, and that he did not change the status as he, and he alone, had the right to do, between the States of the United States and the States of Mexico, so-called Republic, until subsequent to October 9, 1915.

Capt. WHEELER. Would that have any bearing upon the constituted authorities of a State?

Senator FALL. Oh, yes; the constituted authorities of this State of Arizona have no right to enter into any relations with any foreign Government until the latter has been recognized by the Central Government; that is, the administration of the United States.

Capt. WHEELER. He designated the governor of Sonora?

Senator FALL. He may have made a mistake in that designation, but he would have made a very much graver mistake had he recognized the official government of Sonora.

Capt. WHEELER. Here is a little telegram right on that other instance; he evidently returned and found my wire to him, asking for aid, then I wired him again not to send troops on account of friction.

Senator FALL. Yes; that was after you had had a conversation with Col. Hatfield, and Hatfield had told you he could not permit the State troops to interfere with the fight between the factions.

Capt. WHEELER. This telegram reads:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., October 13.

Capt. HARRY C. WHEELER,
Sheriff Cochise County, Naco, Ariz.:

On my arrival here this morning I find your telegram of last evening awaiting me. Acting on telegraphic protest from citizens of Naco, I wired the Secretary of State last Sunday night urging him in the strongest terms to afford additional protection and to notify me immediately of any steps taken to protect Naco citizens and property.

The Secretary of State in his answer, which was received last evening, advised me that my telegram had been referred to the War Department for necessary action. From the War Department directly I have received no definite advices, but am sending another urgent wire this morning conveying the information that such companies of Arizona militia as can be immediately utilized for protection of Naco's citizens have been directed to prepare for transportation to Naco at once in the event that no adequate measures are adopted authorizing Federal troops along Arizona's border to pursue a vigorous policy of protection for Americans. Capt. Seely of Company K, at Tucson, has been ordered to have his company in readiness for transportation to Naco at any time and has been directed to take the next train to the scene of the trouble and remain there in cooperation with you until the adjutant general, who returns this evening, can relieve him. The two Phoenix companies of militia also are being ordered to prepare for transportation. Similar orders will be issued to other available companies during the day. While, as you and the citizens of Naco will realize, the ability of the militia to afford additional protection will depend to a great extent upon the War Department's attitude, I am determined, in the absence of any definite assurances from the Secretary of War, to use the National Guard so far as the Federal troops at Naco will permit me to do so in protecting life and property in that city.

GEO. W. P. HUNT,
Governor of Arizona.

Senator FALL. Have you anything further to say?

Capt. WHEELER. The fact that we believed that the Mexicans had armed was one fact that led to their deportation. Another was that we found out we could not depend upon the representatives of the Federal Government there, so one night, in the presence of several good American witnesses, a man, said to be a Russian, made this remark: "That the I. W. W.'s have destroyed the Russian Government, and will destroy this one." Well, I arrested that man and turned him over to a deputy, and in turn delivered him to the United States deputy marshal, who is at present sheriff of Cochise County. In a few days he was walking the streets again, a free man. Now, when the Federal commission arrived, A. E. Embree, the I. W. W. leader, who first officially notified me of the pending trouble in Bisbee, and who was deported with the rest, subsequently returned and was arrested by me on the charge of inciting a riot, and was held at Tombstone, 30 miles from Bisbee. Embree made a request of me that he be permitted to appear before the Federal commission. I took him to Bisbee and made request of the commission that Embree be allowed to appear before them, without result. The wife of Embree made similar request then upon the commission that her husband be allowed to testify, without result. I held the man in Bisbee two days; seeing that the commission would not permit this man to appear before it, I returned him to Tombstone. We understand that the commission in its report stated that it found no evidence of I. W. W. in that district. This is not surprising when they refused to permit evidence of that nature to be brought before them.

(The committee then at 6.30 o'clock p. m. Sunday, March 7, 1920, adjourned to meet at the call of the chairman.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Tucson, Ariz.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 2.30 o'clock, p. m., in the Santa Rita Hotel, Tucson, Ariz., Senator A. B. Fall, presiding.

Present: Senators A. B. Fall and Marcus A. Smith, and Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee.

TESTIMONY OF MR. H. J. KARNS.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., clerk of the subcommittee, duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Of what State are you a native, Mr. Karns?

Mr. KARNS. New York State; born there.

Senator FALL. Where do you reside?

Mr. KARNS. Nogales, Ariz.

Senator FALL. How long have you resided in Nogales?

Mr. KARNS. Since 1907.

Senator FALL. How long have you resided in the Southwestern country?

Mr. KARNS. That same year.

Senator FALL. What is your business?

Mr. KARNS. Exportation mostly into Mexico, automobile, implements, automobile accessories, hardware, and some other commodities.

Senator FALL. Do you speak Spanish?

Mr. KARNS. I do.

Senator FALL. Do you go into Mexico, yourself?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. You meet there Americans as well as Mexicans?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What has been, up to within the last year or two conditions in Mexico in reference to disturbances, violence, and the safety of lives and property among the Americans residing or doing business there?

Mr. KARNS. As far as ourselves, our employees, and branch houses are concerned we have never experienced any difficulty whatever in carrying on commercial relations with Mexico. We have been operating during all the revolutionary periods, and at times we were shut out ourselves from—never forbidden but we thought it wise at times not to go down there, particularly when battles were going on in the neighborhood of the border or close to the border. As soon as one faction was in power we immediately resumed commercial relations.

Senator FALL. Do you know of any Americans there that experienced any other or different treatment from that which you received?

Mr. KARNS. Only through hearsay, not of my personal knowledge.

Senator FALL. How often during the years—from the years 1911 or 1912 until within the last two years has business been closed, from time to time?

Mr. KARNS. Just during the time the factions—possibly two or three times it was closed up for a few days' time, week, or 10 days.

Senator FALL. How many conflicts, if any, have there been between Americans or American soldiers on this side, and Mexicans, representatives of one or another faction on the other side, since you have been there?

Mr. KARNS. Two that I remember distinctly, in Nogales.

Senator FALL. Upon how many occasions have there been conflicts in or around Nogales between factions of the Mexicans themselves, which have injured life or property of Americans on this side, if any?

Mr. KARNS. Only one fight among themselves alone without our entering into the fight, three occasions altogether where we were a party to it.

Senator FALL. Aside from these conflicts occurring immediately at the border, there have been various occasions upon which the factions have interrupted traffic on the railroad south of the border, have there not?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. There has been fighting at Guaymas, has there not?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; also at Hermosillo and Mazatlan.

Senator FALL. During those occasions traffic was interrupted?

Mr. KARNS. Such houses as our own did not attempt to send any agents out or exports, until one faction or another was in power, or controlled the railroad.

Senator FALL. How long since the railroad running from Nogales to Guaymas has been in the hands of its owners and operated by them, do you know?

Mr. KARNS. I don't just remember now; it has been two years, possibly three.

Senator FALL. Prior to that, for some period of time, it was in the hands of one or the other Mexican faction?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Attempted to be operated by them?

Mr. KARNS. Not in all cases operated by the factions, after awhile operated by one contending faction, but at another time operated by Southern Pacific of Mexico officials.

Senator FALL. Your experience, particularly in the last two or three years with the local authorities in the State, has been pleasant, I presume?

Mr. KARNS. Absolutely pleasant in every respect.

Senator FALL. Without any friction?

Mr. KARNS. None whatever. I may say we operate a large branch store at Hermosillo, had it down there two years; we had other agencies as far south as Mazatlan, and we have never been disturbed in any way. We always try to comply with their laws.

Senator FALL. Are you operating a store in Hermosillo now?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Are there any other troops there other than state troops or national troops?

Mr. KARNS. None whatever.

Senator FALL. Information has been conveyed to us that the Yaquis have been attempting to make a treaty or agreement of some kind with the Mexican officials, and one band of Yaquis under arms is in the capital city of Sonora, that is, Hermosillo, at this time.

Mr. KARNS. I don't think that is a fact, sir. There was an armed band 30 days ago when we came in, that was resting on their arms at a place called Corral, near Hermosillo. I have not been down there since, but I was given to understand from people coming up at Corral, as well as my representative, that the Yaqui situation is clearing very fast, and that the Yaquis are being moved to a place in Sinaloa on a reservation; that, however, I can not verify.

Senator FALL. Was it your information that this was the result of any agreement reached between the Yaquis and Mexican authorities?

Mr. KARNS. That is my understanding.

Senator FALL. Then the Yaquis are no longer camped along the road in any numbers?

Mr. KARNS. Not that I have heard of for several days.

Senator FALL. They moved after the recent trade excursion from Nogales south?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; I have been given to understand they surrendered most of their arms. I don't believe there was any armed band in Hermosillo under neutrality, if there was I did not know it.

Senator FALL. Do you think you would know it? I don't want to be insistent, but I want to know what the character of your information is? You are doing business there?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; extensively.

Senator FALL. You think you would have known it if they had been there?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. There is reference almost constantly made to the Bronco Indian or Yaqui, what do they mean by the term "bronco?"

Mr. KARNS. Wild.

Senator FALL. Are all the Yaqui Indians Bronco Indians or not?

Mr. KARNS. They are not.

Senator FALL. Who are the soldiers in the Mexican Army in the State of Sonora?

Mr. KARNS. Why, of Indian origin—possibly Yaquis or possibly Mayos—I have been given to understand mostly Mayos.

Senator FALL. You understand mostly Mayos. What is the difference between the Mayos and Yaquis?

Mr. KARNS. They come from a different part of the country.

Senator FALL. Of the same general tribe, are they not?

Mr. KARNS. No; I would not say that. I have never made a study between the Indians, but there is as much distinction as between our Papagoes and Yumas.

Senator FALL. How are soldiers now in the State of Sonora recruited; do you know?

Mr. KARNS. I don't know, but I think volunteers.

Senator FALL. Then you think Yaqui Indians, or Mayo Indians volunteering in Carranza's army are efficient soldiers, and would fight Indians of their same blood that might be opposed to the Government?

Mr. KARNS. I am not in a position to answer that question, but we have seen Indians in the United States used to quell other Indian disturbances, and they could be depended upon. The same thing might apply there; it might be part of these Yaquis could be depended upon, and part could not. I don't think myself it is the very best policy, although not knowing their loyalty I would not want to state.

Senator FALL. Just the idea in my mind, as a member of the committee. I have some little familiarity with the American Indians, to whom you have just referred, as well as the Indians of Mexico. Some Indians in Mexico might be excellent soldiers, but they might not at all times want to fight their blood brothers.

Mr. KARNS. That is very true.

Senator FALL. For that reason I was asking you, from your familiarity with that country there, if you had any opinion on the subject. Do you know what the course of the Mexican officials generally has been, aside from that of the State authorities, with the Americans during the last two or three years; has it been of a friendly character?

Mr. KARNS. Absolutely so. With most of the Americans I know personally operating there I have heard no complaint of any inconvenience being put upon Americans by Federal troops.

Senator FALL. How are the collectors and consuls of Mexico in their intercourse with Americans, always pleasant?

Mr. KARNS. Always been very pleasant, particularly in the last four or five years. There have been times when Mexican consuls, whether they were recognized or not, at Nogales, Ariz., have not been most friendly inclined; in those cases we have taken it upon ourselves to try and have them removed, and in some cases have been successful.

Senator FALL. Can you remember any particular instance where the Americans tried to have a consul removed there?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; I can not remember the exact year or date, but there was a consul there by the name of Padriz; he was not liked by the Americans, and the Americans took the matter up with Gen. Obregon, and Gen. Obregon succeeded in having him removed, and removed very quick.

Senator FALL. What was the particular reason, if any, that the Americans had for objecting to the presence of Mr. Padriz?

Mr. KARNS. By his attitude and his defiance and his declaration of immunity—you might say egotism—and from the fact that he was accused of being a participant to the stealing of an automobile, or of acquiring one on the American side and taking it to the Mexican side; although he denied all knowledge of it, yet the Americans thought he was a participant. And another time a letter was found on a Mexican killed in Nogales, Ariz., by an American, and that letter was supposed to have been written by this Consul Padriz upon American soil, and the Americans took exception to the contents of that letter and brought it to the attention of Gen. Obregon, and Gen. Obregon removed him or had him removed.

Senator FALL. In what capacity was Gen. Obregon in office at that time?

Mr. KARNS. I think he was general; I don't remember, but I think he was yet general of the Mexican Army. He was visiting Nogales, although he may possibly have been in the Carranza cabinet at that time. I would not say for sure.

Senator FALL. It was about that time?

Mr. KARNS. Yes; he was in or close to Nogales at that time. I know Gen. Obregon appeared in Douglas or Nogales very shortly after the theft of the automobile from the American side, and that he authorized the payment for the full payment of the value of the machine in American money and the incident was closed.

Senator FALL. This instance you referred to where this letter was found upon some man, was that in connection with the kidnaping of a man by the name of Simpson?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where was Simpson kidnaped from and by whom, do you know?

Mr. KARNS. I don't know who kidnaped him, but he was kidnaped some place in the district around Sahuarito, south of Sanford.

Senator FALL. What was the purpose of his being kidnaped?

Mr. KARNS. He was arrested, I understand, by the Mexican officials and was held.

Senator FALL. Was there any demand made for ransom?

Mr. KARNS. I understood that the Mexicans, these officials who were supposed to hold him, had made demand upon him for a ransom. I was told that he had agreed with this captain to go to Nogales and get the ransom, and the captain came to Nogales with him, Nogales, Ariz.

Senator FALL. What occurred when they reached Nogales, Ariz.?

Mr. KARNS. They were in Nogales, Ariz., a few hours when they started to walk across the railroad track, for what purpose I don't just at this moment recollect; anyhow, when they were behind the electric-light plant and the Mexican was between Mr. Simpson and the electric-light plant Mr. Simpson killed him.

Senator FALL. Upon whom was this letter supposed to be found from the Mexican consul?

Mr. KARNS. Found on the dead body of this Mexican.

Senator FALL. Did you read the letter—translate it?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; I read it both in Spanish and in English. I did not speak and read Spanish as fluently then as I do now, but the interpretation was made by people who did speak good Spanish.

Senator FALL. It purported to be from this consul at that time?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. What was the effect of it? I do not ask you to undertake to repeat it exactly.

Mr. KARNS. It seems that the Mexican consul was acquainted with the fact that Mr. Haas and Mr. Simpson were being held by this Mexican band, of which this Mexican who was supposed to be a captain—his name was Trigo—was in command, and the letter stated in substance if he was not in authority there to hold Haas and Simpson and the fact that he should frighten them or threaten them with execution, but in any event hold them; and then the letter went on further to state, making mention of one or two Mexicans they had captured around there, or arrested, that they were to be executed as an example to others of the same caliber.

Senator FALL. This letter being found under the circumstances—this letter being discovered under the conditions you mentioned, naturally aroused the indignation of American citizens upon this side?

Mr. KARNS. It did; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. And Gen. Obregon was notified, as I understand it, and through his efforts this consul was removed?

Mr. KARNS. He was; yes, sir; within a very few days, possibly two or three days, as I remember.

Senator FALL. What became of the man; do you know?

Mr. KARNS. I don't know. However, I met him in Mexico—Hermosillo—within the last year, or possibly two years. Time flies, I can not remember the exact time.

Senator FALL. Is he in business there, do you know?

Mr. KARNS. I don't think he is.

Senator FALL. Do you know whether he has been punished by the Mexican Government in any way for his activities?

Mr. KARNS. I don't know; no, sir.

Senator FALL. Gen. Obregon is generally recognized as friendly to the Americans?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; in my estimation he is; yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Of course, that is the general opinion held by the Americans so far as you know?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; by the people in Nogales. I have never heard any person in Nogales speak derogatory of him.

Senator FALL. He is also popular among the Mexicans of the State of Sonora and west coast generally?

Mr. KARNS. Very much so.

Senator FALL. He is one of the candidates at the coming election for President of Mexico?

Mr. KARNS. So I have been given to understand.

Senator FALL. Business with the west coast of Mexico in all lines is very largely done through Nogales, and over the railroad south of there?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; but there is a small amount that is shipped by boats now since the European war, but to no great extent; most of it comes through the Port of Nogales.

Senator FALL. By railroad?

Mr. KARNS. By railroad.

Senator FALL. Prior to the European war, or prior to the revolutionary disturbances, at any rate, in Mexico, a very large portion of the business was done by boat?

Mr. KARNS. I would not say a large portion, but I think it was equally divided.

Senator FALL. Have you any reason, from your knowledge of the conditions there, to apprehend any further violence or disorder along the west coast at any time in the near future?

Mr. KARNS. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FALL. Do you know where the present governor of Sonora is now, De la Huerta?

Mr. KARNS. Why, the last I heard he was in Hermosillo; he was a few days ago.

Senator FALL. Who is in military command now in the State of Sonora, if you know?

Mr. KARNS. I can not possibly state that; I understood that Gen. Dieguez has come into the State of Sonora, whether he is coming for supreme in command or not I have not been notified. Prior to that time, up to a few months ago, Gen. Torres was in command. I have been given to understand he has since been relieved and sent to some other part of the Republic and Gen. Ruiz had taken command.

Senator FALL. Now, it is reported Gen. Dieguez has taken command?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; I think I can state that authentically.

Senator FALL. Had you known Gen. Dieguez prior to his coming into Sonora recently?

Mr. KARNS. I met Gen. Dieguez several years ago, had several conversations with him when he was in the Sonora campaign against Villa. Gen. Dieguez whipped Villa at Hermosillo.

Senator FALL. Subsequent to that time Gen. Dieguez had been absent in other parts of the Republic?

Mr. KARNS. Yes; I did not know anything about him up to this time.

Senator FALL. You know by general reputation he has not been in Sonora until very recently?

Mr. KARNS. No; he has not been in Sonora until the last several weeks.

Senator FALL. Gen. Obregon is not now in command of troops in Carranza's Army?

Mr. KARNS. Not that I know of; I know positively he has not been since his last—

Senator FALL. Gen. Dieguez has been and is now in command of a brigade in Carranza's army?

Mr. KARNS. I would not say that I know that positively; but seeing it in the American papers, and from other sources, I have formed that opinion.

Senator SMITH. How often has the railroad been put out of commission south of Nogales in the last five or six years?

Mr. KARNS. Through revolutionary actions?

Senator SMITH. I mean how often has it been out of commission so trains would not run; I do not speak of a particular number, but often or seldom?

Mr. KARNS. Why, the railroad traffic has been stopped several times in the last two years, but due to floods.

Senator SMITH. I am not talking about natural conditions at all; how often, between Guaymas and Nogales, has it been put out of commission by men?

Mr. KARNS. I understand; that is the reason I asked that question—revolutionary troubles. It has been out on several occasions, but I can not state just the times or how long they were, Senator.

Senator SMITH. What put them out of commission?

Mr. KARNS. Burning of bridges.

Senator SMITH. Who burned them?

Mr. KARNS. I don't know.

Senator SMITH. How many miles of track were torn up on that railroad at any time?

Mr. KARNS. I don't know.

Senator SMITH. Was any of it torn up?

Mr. KARNS. I can not answer that, either. I never went into Sonora personally during any of those times when the railroad was not open.

Senator SMITH. Do you know the amount of damage sustained by the railroad between those points by reason of burning bridges or otherwise destroying them, or interrupting the passage of trains across them?

Mr. KARNS. I can not answer that question; I don't know, Senator, at all. I don't think I ever discussed it with the railroad officials. I have conversations with them very often, but not along those lines.

Senator SMITH. Then for the last five or six years, as you understand it, there has been, as you understand it, very slight interruption of traffic by reason of any damage done to the railroad in the last five or six years?

Mr. KARNS. Very little, sir, in the last four or five years.

Senator SMITH. Where does the railroad stop?

Mr. KARNS. It ends at Acaponeta, in the State of Nayarit.

Senator SMITH. Has there been any work extending that railroad in the last five or six years?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; they have been working periodically on the extension of the railroad. The railroad prior to the revolution was built and completed into the State of Tepic. At a very early part of the revolution they destroyed the railroad, and they quit running trains any farther south than Acaponeta. In the last few months they have built bridges across the San Diego River and are pushing the railroad south of Acaponeta, and have already reopened the railroad.

Senator SMITH. How far is that bridge from the present southern terminus of the road they are putting up there now?

Mr. KARNS. I don't just know, but not very many miles.

Senator SMITH. You are speaking of the Southern Pacific road in Mexico?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Not the Mexican National road?

Mr. KARNS. There is no Mexican National road on the west coast at all.

Senator FALL. All the different roads—the road from Nogales to Guaymas and Acaponeta, and from Agua Prieta to Nacozari, and from Mazatlan across to Guadalajara, and the road up the Yaqui River—are all private roads?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; they are all private roads. There are a few more roads—the Kansas City & Orient, built from a little above Topolobampo to Fuerte. There is not a national road on the west coast that I know of.

Senator FALL. Is the road to Topolobampo running now?

Mr. KARNS. Yes, sir; it has been running for a number of years.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. JULIA A. SCRIVNER.

(The witness was sworn by Dan M. Jackson, Esq., secretary of the subcommittee duly authorized thereto.)

Senator FALL. Where do you live, Mrs. Scrivner?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Tucson.

Senator FALL. You are a citizen of the United States, are you?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Where is your husband; is he living or dead?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. He is dead.

Senator FALL. What was the cause of his death?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. A Mexican shot him.

Senator FALL. Where did this occur?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. About a mile and a half on this side of the line.

Senator FALL. In the State of Arizona?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. When was this?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Six years ago the 10th of this month.

Senator FALL. Where was he, if you can identify the place?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. He was at the mine, in a small store.

Senator FALL. What was the name of the mine?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Home Stake Production Co.

Senator FALL. How far is that from Oro Blanco?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Eight miles.

Senator FALL. How far is it from Ruby; you know where Ruby is?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir; 4 miles.

Senator FALL. What became of his murderers; do you know?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Went into Mexico.

Senator FALL. Were they ever apprehended?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. No, sir; I saw the sheriff at Nogales; he said there was no government in Mexico; they did not have anyone to go to; nothing could be done about it.

Senator FALL. What became of the property; do you still own it, the mine?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir; I own half of it, and my husband's heirs own the other half, but there is a sale now pending. I don't know, since the last murder out there so close to the mine I think the company will not take it up right now.

Senator FALL. Have there been other attempts made by yourself and other owners of the mine to dispose of it?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes; quite a number of attempts; but when they find out it is so close to the border, with no protection, they said no, they would not go there, too dangerous.

Senator FALL. You say there is now a proposition for the disposal of the mine?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes.

Senator FALL. Do you object to stating the price you place upon it?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Fifty thousand.

Senator FALL. What is the character of the metal you extract from it?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Gold and silver; I will show you some of it.

Senator FALL. This raw gold which you just exhibited to the committee in this little bottle is the product from the rock from this mine?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. It is not in rock, it is in dirt. They take the dirt out, and let it dry, and then sift it out, sift it and cyanide it; they don't always have to use the cyanide; they burn the quicksilver.

Senator FALL. You fear now that this pending sale will not be put through because of the recent occurrence at Ruby, 4 miles from there?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. This recent occurrence you speak of, was the death of the two Frazer boys by violence?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir; the two Frazer boys; I know of them.

Senator FALL. At the hands of Mexicans?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir.

Senator FALL. Have you been able to keep workmen at work on the mine during the interval?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. No, sir; have not been able to do that.

Senator FALL. Why not?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Too dangerous.

Senator FALL. Are there any American troops in this immediate vicinity?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. There are some at Arivaca.

Senator FALL. Arivaca is 16 to 20 miles from there?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Twenty miles, we always called it 20 miles from our mine; I don't know exactly.

Senator FALL. Are there any Mexican troops that you know of—you haven't been there yourself?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. No, sir.

Senator FALL. So you don't know that any Mexican troops crossed the border?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. No, sir; never was any there that I knew of. If there was I did not know it.

Senator FALL. Was the store robbed or property taken at the time of the murder of your husband?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. No; he was working the mine. He had some gold bullion; he had over $500 worth of this gold dust in bottles; they came to rob the store of gold and money; they got the bullion but did not get all the gold; about $500 worth they did not get.

Senator FALL. Did they attempt to make your husband give up the gold or property before they killed him?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. No; he was sitting at a table; they came in from that side and shot him in the neck.

Senator FALL. Came in from behind?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir; just stepped up to the window, shot him in the neck; shot him twice.

Senator FALL. Did they leave immediately after they killed him?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Well, they piled quite a lot of this stuff in the middle of the store and put oil on it and set it afire; but there was a Mexican man and his wife living close by; the husband had gone to give the alarm, and his wife watched the store; as soon as they went she ran right up and put the fire out; if it had not been for that it would have burned up; could not have helped it.

Senator FALL. You live now in Tucson?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. Yes, sir. I was not at the mines at the time.

Senator FALL. Was it regarded as dangerous to be at the mine at the time?

Mrs. SCRIVNER. No; not that I know of; there had never been anything done there before that.

(The committee then, at 4 o'clock p. m., adjourned to meet at the call of the chairman.)

THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., March 11, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF WALLACE THOMPSON.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. You may give your name to the reporter.

Mr. THOMPSON. Wallace Thompson.

Mr. KEARFUL. And your residence?

Mr. THOMPSON. 55 West Forty-fourth Street, New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are an American citizen?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you born?

Mr. THOMPSON. Topeka, Kans.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your occupation?

Mr. THOMPSON. Writer.

Mr. KEARFUL. What time have you spent in Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. I was in Mexico for six years prior to 1910.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what occupation were you engaged there?

Mr. THOMPSON. I was then connected with the Mexican Herald. I was news editor of that paper when I left Mexico in 1910.

Mr. KEARFUL. When were you subsequently in Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. I returned to Mexico in November of 1918. I went to the city of Monterrey, where I was American vice consul.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long were you there?

Mr. THOMPSON. About three months.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions in Mexico during the time of Porfirio Diaz, when you were there, with reference to security for life and property and travel?

Mr. THOMPSON. During my connection with the Mexican Herald I traveled over most of the Republic of Mexico, by train, or boat, or horseback, and through all of that time I was absolutely unarmed, most of the time without an escort or even a guide, and was always as safe as I could be in any American community, always courteously received, given every protection and given permission to do whatever I wanted to do, without question, and with the assistance of officials and individuals. I remember particularly that in some cities I did not even give my name. In one small town in the interior of the State of Tabasco I received a hotel bill addressed to me simply as "Mister." The Mexicans were always friendly and always interested in the things I was interested in, and never offered me anything but courtesy and assistance.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your work at that time did you come in contact with a good many Americans engaged in different interests throughout Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. I naturally made it my business to see Americans wherever they were, and to discuss their business affairs, with the idea of writing articles for the Mexican Herald and other publications upon the affairs of Americans in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the character of the Americans operating in Mexico at that time?

Mr. THOMPSON. At that time they were universally of a very high type, many of them college men. Many of them on the plantations in the South, and all but a very few even in the interior parts were genuine pioneers, though not of the rough type which is supposed to be the source of trouble between various nations. In other words, these were men who were there for business, rather than exploiting the people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it true, as has been stated by Carranza propagandists and repeated by some high officials of this Government, that the Americans operating in Mexico were a class of speculators, engaged in exploiting the Mexicans under iniquitous concessions obtained from Mexico by fraud and graft?

Mr. THOMPSON. The class of Americans who were actually doing the work of developing Mexico was, as I have stated, of the very finest type of modern business pioneers. If there were any Americans of the exploiting and promoting class they were found around the hotels of Mexico City, and in number or proportion they were certainly no greater than the same type of men who hang around the Waldorf-Astoria in New York to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. How about the Washington hotels?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not know the Washington hotels as well, but I recognize the type here as being closely related to the Waldorf type.

Mr. KEARFUL. On the whole, Americans operating in Mexico compare favorably with Americans engaged in business in this country?

Mr. THOMPSON. They certainly do. I have never before, in that country or in Europe, found a higher type of average Americans engaged in development.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is not true, then, as has also been stated, that the great source of trouble with Mexico was that a large number of Americans were there because they could not live in the United States?

Mr. THOMPSON. My experience with the Americans in Mexico would lead me to say that the number of men living in Mexico who could not live in the United States was so small as to be absolutely negligible. I know one man in Mexico whom I knew to have had trouble in the United who was living there and working for one of the great American companies at a good salary and living with his wife in the simplest way. They lived in Mexico about 15 years, during which time this man saved, I think, about $40,000, which had been advanced to him for exploring and other work in Alaska many years ago, and which he had lost and considered a loan of honor. When he had raised his $40,000 and paid off his debt he told his friends why he had been quiet and why they had not known more of his life at home, and returned to his former residence in Nevada.

Mr. KEARFUL. That individual was not the source of any trouble between the United States and Mexico, was he?

Mr. THOMPSON. He was certainly the source of no trouble whatever, and owing to the fact that he was naturally a successful man, he came to Mexico and devoted himself to industry and the up-building of the country, through his support of the broad policies of the great corporation for which he worked. I may say that this man was the only one I ever knew in Mexico, although I knew hundreds of Americans with considerable enterprise, who was known there by a name other than his own and, as I say, before his return to the United States he told us all what his real name was and laughingly apologized for the fear which he had felt at the time he came and which had induced him to commit the error of attempting to shield himself from an imaginary wrong. There was a standing joke in Mexico regarding the Americans who came down there and changed their names, but the Americans in Mexico who had lived there the longest were always aware that it was a joke, and were probably more chagrined than anyone else at the seriousness with which that joke had been taken by the critics of the régime under which they were living in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the time of Porfirio Diaz did you have occasion to observe as to whether or not there were glowing reports issued in this country with reference to opportunities in Mexico for American citizens to go there and invest their capital and enterprise?

Mr. THOMPSON. Previous to my going to Mexico I was for one year in charge, as personal representative, of a magazine called Modern Mexico, published in New York by Paul Hudson, the general manager of the Mexican Herald. That magazine was an enthusiastic booster of Mexico, but in its editorial columns and in the articles it published it was always absolutely conservative and intelligent. Its advertising columns were often bought by American companies and promoters who desired to sell stock in mining or agricultural companies in Mexico to Americans. One of our difficulties was in being sure these were legitimate concerns, and I may say that, as far as the legitimacy was concerned, the question was never whether the property could be developed in Mexico, or whether the Mexican company could do the things that they promised, or indeed, whether the plan was to exploit Mexico. Wherever there was a positive wrong in the advertisement, it always resulted in our excluding it from our pages. It was on the same basis that advertising of the wild-cat Texas oil companies of to-day has to be excluded from legitimate American publications.

Mr. KEARFUL. Any wrongs resulting from improper operations by American companies would be visited upon their stockholders in this country, would they not, and not upon Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. Absolutely. That is the point which I wish to make. If there were ever any wrongs in connection with the American companies which operated in Mexico, it was absolutely a wrong to the American investor, a wrong which we all know too well in our own experience to exist with the companies which operate within a few miles of the center of population of the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Another point I wished to bring out was as to the American citizens, who invested their capital and enterprise in the development of Mexico during the time of Porfirio Diaz, with the sanction of the Mexican Government and this Government.

Mr. THOMPSON. My study of the Diaz régime in Mexico led me to a realization that Gen. Diaz's plan for the upbuilding of a modern system in Mexico was based upon a belief in the importance of establishing a material foundation for the creation of a great modern civilization. That, I think, is absolutely correct, and I think that all Americans who watched his Government at first hand will agree without dissent. If there was any wrong in his policy it was because there was too little emphasis upon the social side, rather than too much on the material side. Gen. Diaz encouraged American investments, but not by giving them great tracts of Government land--because there was no Government land worth having at that time. His so-called concessions were merely franchises for operation, sometimes giving exclusive privileges, and those were just the same as where an American city would give an exclusive privilege to a lighting company to erect an electric plant, because otherwise they would not be able to guarantee the investors. As has been stated in the testimony before the committee many times, the only privileges ever granted to any company that I have ever heard of were exemptions from various forms of taxation, chiefly those on import of machinery and export of raw materials, for a brief period, and seldom for more than 10 years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that privilege conditioned upon the performance of certain work looking toward development?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. The privilege of the so-called concessions depended absolutely upon development, and no concessions were ever granted for a very long period of time--not even so much as oil lands are now handled in Texas.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the United States Government at that time with reference to American citizens going to Mexico to invest their capital?

Mr. THOMPSON. Our conception of the attitude of the American Government was that it was extremely anxious that Americans should go into Mexico and become a part of the economic life there. It approved of the attitude which many had, which was that the Diaz Government gave us protection and that we could as a result go ahead with the same safety for investments as was enjoyed in the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did any American ever suspect that in case he was denied protection by the Mexican Government, and was persecuted, that he would be abandoned by his own Government?

Mr. THOMPSON. That was certainly never taken into consideration in the plans of any American whom I knew in Mexico. We had been led to believe that the flag was our protection, as long as we were legitimate and honest in our dealings, but that the very fact that we were Americans and that flag was behind us demanded of us an honesty and sincerity of attitude toward Mexicans, which was thus guaranteed and insured more thoroughly than any individual desire to do right could possibly insure it.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you think the Americans as a rule loyally lived up to that sentiment of dealing fairly with the Mexicans and being law-abiding?

Mr. THOMPSON. I certainly do. The Americans in Mexico were almost never in controversy with any Mexican, either official or individual. Most of the legal troubles in which Americans had a part were among themselves, and in these cases they were invariably assured of absolute justice from the Mexican courts.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Mexico at the time Secretary of State Elihu Root was a visitor in Mexico and South American countries?

Mr. THOMPSON. I was at that time city editor of the Mexican Herald, and took a personal part in a great many of the functions which were given in Secretary Root's honor.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your understanding, and that of other Americans, at the time, as to the essential purposes of Mr. Root's visit?

Mr. THOMPSON. We regarded Secretary Root's visit as purely for the purpose of expressing American friendship and recognition of the splendid commercial and material advantages of Mexico, and as a sort of ambassador of American business in Mexico. I think that visit could be compared very well to the recent visit of the Prince of Wales to the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what year was that? It was during Roosevelt's administration, about 1906, was it not?

Mr. THOMPSON. I would say it was nearer 1908. It was during Roosevelt's second term. I am not sure of the year.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember speeches and articles by Mr. Root, after his return from his tour, in which he advocated the necessity of extending our foreign trade, because we had ceased to be a debtor Nation and had become a creditor Nation?

Mr. THOMPSON. I remember very distinctly that was the spirit of the reports and speeches which he made following his return from Mexico, and I may say that in Mexico City his speeches were distinctly of a character tending to encourage commercial relations, as well as diplomatic friendship.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there anything in any of his utterances which would indicate to any person that our foreign trade relations could be extended to Mexico without our citizens going there and engaging in the enterprises of the country, or did he advocate the necessity of our citizens going there?

Mr. THOMPSON. I remember no specific speech to that effect, but I do know that in all of his public and private appearances he recognized the American colony as, in a way, part of his entourage, and that he most certainly did not pretend to ignore their presence, or to do anything but absolutely approve of their being in Mexico and their being engaged in those great enterprises.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not true, as a matter of course, that we can not extend our trade relations with any foreign country without sending our citizens there to engage in its enterprises?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is absolutely true.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does it not follow also that our citizens can not go to foreign countries and engage in enterprises unless they are assured of protection from our Government in case they are persecuted?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is also true. I should like to say here that the present demand in Mexico, which I have seen and noticed personally, for American tools, for American goods of every kind, even at the much higher prices than used to be charged for German and French made tools and goods, is a distinct result of the Americans who pioneered in business and manufacturing there. The American brought American tools with him, and the native learned quickly that they were more useful and reliable than those which he had been using before, and as a natural consequence, from their contact with Americans, this grew into an interest and a desire for American goods, which has made an impress of quality throughout all of Mexico and I am sure throughout Latin-America, where American tools were known to Europeans or Mexicans. That is evidenced by the fact that even where imitations were made of goods, either in Europe or in Mexico, the labels were always made in English and not in any other language.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know Mr. William Jennings Bryan by reputation?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do; by reputation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not for many years he has been a prominent figure in American life, and has great influence over a large body of American citizens?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were not in Mexico when he made his several trips there, were you?

Mr. THOMPSON. I was there during one of them at least, when he came in the capacity of a private citizen, and when he was writing up his views in traveling around the world.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you read an article by him in the Commoner of January 30, 1903, following one of his trips to Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir; I have read it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that in that article, in response to invitations from American citizens to advise them in regard to investments in Mexico, he described at considerable length the great opportunities in Mexico and the enterprises that had already been prosecuted there successfully by American citizens?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. I know he made that the basis of his articles on Mexico, dealing rather with that phase of the subject than with the merely picturesque.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that article he concludes his treatment of that subject with this statement:

There are many opportunities in Mexico for the man who goes there with capital and with knowledge of an industry to bring out the latent possibilities of soil and climate. There are also opportunities for those who go as skilled laborers to oversee industries in the process of development.

Do you recognize that as being a true statement?

Mr. THOMPSON. In general, it is true; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that is a fair summing up of the description of the various industries affording opportunities for investors in Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. I should say it was, but I should say he did not go quite far enough, because I think the opportunities for Americans of ability and intelligence in the management of organizations in Mexico were fully as great as those of men who went there merely to engage in the skilled trades. That was due to a sincere and genuine desire of the Mexicans, of the then ruling class, for a worthy development of the resources of the country, and for the turning of those resources into the creation of new wealth, as against the old policy, which was perhaps their heritage from Spanish times, of exploitation of the soil and of the native. The spirit of the Diaz régime was simply this—that Mexican resources, which were really great, should be organized and built into wealth-producing property, according to the methods of modern economics, which were then represented in the highest sense by the United States. There was always opportunity, a splendid opportunity, for Americans who had the capacity for understanding Mexico and the problems of Mexico, to join in this great era of development.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the effect upon the Mexicans in general of the American operations? Was it beneficial or otherwise to them?

Mr. THOMPSON. It was absolutely beneficial. In fact, the coming of the American industries presented to the Mexicans a rallying point and an understanding of modern economics and industries which they themselves did not possess. It was an axiom of Mexican business that although Mexicans had great difficulty in associating themselves into companies, if they were with Americans, either as the investors or as managers under a contract, they could bring together the very finest Mexicans in the Republic for the purpose of development. I believe, if it is ever possible to compile competent statistics as to Americans in Mexico during the Diaz régime, not the least of the points that will be placed to their credit will be the fact that they made possible the development of Mexico by Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you recollect that at the beginning of the Wilson administration, on March 4, 1913, Mr. Bryan became Secretary of State?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude during the time he was Secretary of State toward Americans who had invested their capital in Mexico and had gone there to develop the trade, largely, it may be presumed, upon the encouragement of his own statements which have been referred to?

Mr. THOMPSON. My knowledge of that comes from a study at some length of the documents touching upon Mexico's history of that period. I think that Mr. Bryan's attitude, at least as to his statement of the policies of the Wilson administration, was that Americans who were abroad, and especially those who had gone to Mexico, went upon their own responsibility, and that they had no right or privilege to demand the protection of the United States Government or of its officials in case of trouble, whether it came from their own mistake or from the depredations of the people with whom they lived.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his advice to Americans in Mexico who were the victims of persecution during that period?

Mr. THOMPSON. His advice was for them to get out of Mexico, which is a matter of official record in a number of instances.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the hardships entailed on Americans following that direction, with reference to their enterprises?

Mr. THOMPSON. To those Americans who had remained in Mexico, and all of whose means were tied up either by contract or by personal investment in the property or business with which they were identified in Mexico, their departures necessitated either the temporary stopping of the business or the absolute loss of it through immediate confiscation. The prestige of these Americans and their understanding of the Mexican people constituted a protection in many instances for their property as long as they were there; but when by leaving Mexico they became merely American citizens their property was almost invariably confiscated or laid waste. In other words, Americans in Mexico at that time stood upon their own footing, as Mr. Bryan had told them they should, and all the power of the flag had been taken from them and all standing which they might have once enjoyed as Americans became a liability instead of an asset.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon what class of Americans still operating in Mexico did that advice to leave the country most heavily fall?

Mr. THOMPSON. The burden of that fell most heavily upon the Americans who had invested their small savings in properties, which they were then trying to hang on to through this personal presence which I have mentioned. I know that there were many thousands of such men, and that they were almost all of them stripped of their investments and of almost all hope of rehabilitating themselves, either in Mexico or the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with a place called Hacienda Yale, in the State of Oaxaca?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; I have visited that place.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the article in the Commoner by Mr. Bryan, above referred to, he has this to say about that plantation:

West of the village of Tierra Blanca, just across the Amapa River, in the State of Oaxaca, we visited a rubber-tree plantation. It was projected by Alfred Bishop Mason, a Chicago business man, but the work of development has fallen to his nephews, Raymond Willis and James Trowbridge, the former a graduate of the Boston Polytechnic and the latter of Yale. These young men began about three years ago the clearing of about 400 acres of tropical forest, so dense that it was difficult to secure any accurate idea of the lay of the land. They now have about 300,000 rubber trees growing, the oldest 2½ years old. It will be four or five years before the plantation begins to yield a return, but there is at this time every promise of success. If the experiment realizes the hopes of the young men they will deserve the reward that they will secure, for they will not only make a fortune out of Mother Earth, but they will show others what can be accomplished in the development of this industry and thus become public benefactors. This well illustrates the difference between wealth created by the establishment of some new industry and wealth absorbed by trading or speculation.

For two years Willis and Trowbridge lived in a hut thatched with palm leaves, but last spring they began the erection of a commodious stone house, with wide and airy porches, and to this newly completed residence the former has recently brought his bride, a Wellesley graduate, to preside over this new center of American civilization.

Is that a correct picture of the Yale plantation?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is a correct picture of the Yale plantation, but I should also like to say that the Yale plantation was one of the finest examples of American industry in tropical Mexico. The entire section around Tierra Blanca was developed with a remarkable intelligence and understanding of the problems of tropical agriculture and administration. The rubber industry was then new in Mexico, but Mr. Willis, whom I knew well, and others of that section, especially J. C. Harvey and Paul McQuiston, had introduced and were developing agricultural methods which would, had their plantation been allowed to remain and be developed, have rivaled the rubber colony of Ceylon. I can not be so enthusiastic about all of the American properties in Mexico, for many of them were stock jobbing propositions, which did considerable damage to American investors, although they did tremendous good for Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what way?

Mr. THOMPSON. They created in the tropical jungle vast forests of rubber trees. Miles and miles of these plants were set out and cultivated and cared for to a point of development before the revolution came. Those properties are now covered with a new jungle growth, but in years to come they will be a source of wealth to Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who performed the labor necessary for the development of which you speak?

Mr. THOMPSON. The labor almost all came from Mexicans, most of it from the immediate neighborhood, and the money which was put in circulation by these companies very greatly improved the condition of the people of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec country, as we called it, and had a certain and very real effect in the development toward a middle class of workers in that section.

Mr. KEARFUL. Returning to Mr. Bryan and the Yale plantation, did you have any personal knowledge of the life there, and of the fact that Mr. Willis brought his bride there to reside, as Mr. Bryan says, over this "new center of American civilization"?

Mr. THOMPSON. I knew Mr. Willis and his wife in Orizaba. When I visited the Tierra Blanca country they were not there, but I was a guest at the plantation, my host being the Mexican manager. It had one of the most beautiful houses in tropical Mexico, and the entire plantation was a model of administrative efficiency and a demonstration of the value of conscientious and scientific cultivation. I believe that while other plantations may have made their contribution to Mexico, even though they have been absorbed by the jungle, the loss of such properties as the Yale plantation and the others near it is something for which Mexico can well mourn.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that Willis and Trowbridge were engaged in oppressing and exploiting the Mexican peons in that vicinity?

Mr. THOMPSON. They certainly were not. They were a shining example of the real value of treating the Mexican peons with consideration and fairness. Their labor problems were solved on that basis, and there was never any difficulty, that I know of, that was not ultimately solved by them to the extreme advantage of the workers.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your information as to what happened to the Yale plantation and to Willis and Trowbridge under the policy of Mr. Bryan that Americans were not entitled to protection and should get out of Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Willis is now an employee of the National Paper & Type Co., working in New York. I do not know what has become of Mr. Trowbridge. I do know, from reliable reports, that the entire country around Tierra Blanca is overrun by bandits and predatory Constitutionalist soldiers, and that the jungle has crept up over the beautiful rubber fields and even into the dooryard of the house, which is probably now in ruins.

I may say that if the record of other sections has been substantially like Hacienda Yale (and there is no reason to believe it has not), the Mexicans whom they taught to be efficient workers and to demand some of the advantages of civilization are now acquiring those advantages as bandits, or have slipped back into their aboriginal nakedness and gain their chief livelihood from breadfruit and bananas growing wild in their dooryards. The whole fabric of the beginning of the civilization of the Mexican in that section has been absolutely destroyed, and he has slipped back probably far beyond the state in which Willis and Trowbridge found him.

Mr. KEARFUL. During what time were you vice consul for the American Government in Monterrey?

Mr. THOMPSON. I had spent many months in war work in Washington, and was sent to Monterrey on the day the armistice was signed. I arrived there shortly before Thanksgiving Day in 1918, and stayed there until February, 1919.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to especially observe the effect of German propaganda at that place, as bearing upon the relations between Mexicans and Americans?

Mr. THOMPSON. Just previous to my arrival in Monterrey there had been a celebration by the allied colonies of the signing of the armistice. It had consisted in part of a parade toward the governor's house, Monterrey being the capital of the State of Nuevo Leon. That parade had been surrounded in its inception by a crowd of Mexicans, which grew rapidly more vociferous until about two blocks from the governor's house they began yelling "Death to America" and "Long live Germany," and began cutting at the flags which decorated the motor cars in the parade, and finally broke up the celebration, so that the Americans and other allied people had to flee through the side streets. An investigation which was made of that incident showed that behind it was German propaganda, and that the moving spirits were certain German employees of the Monterrey Iron & Steel Plant. These men were in the crowd and were distributing tequila, a rank Mexican whisky. Upon representations of the American consul a number of these men who had been the moving spirits in the mob were discharged from the steel plant, the company thus recognizing their culpability. After the allied parade had been broken up the Germans adopted the band which had been assigned by the governor to the parade and went about the streets celebrating "Peace," which they said was a peace for Germany as well as for the Allies. There were speeches made by Germans and by Mexican propagandists in the German club.

Ricardo del Castillo was editor of the German paper El Dia ("The Day"—"Der Tag"). In El Dia the next day Castillo's speech to the mob of Mexican peons before the mob had dispersed was quoted as follows:

I can no more than send my profound condolences to heroic France, for having been the instrument of the imperialistic visions of England and of the commercial ambitions of the United States. Therefore, for Wilson, the extortioner of weak nations and the cause of the misfortunes of my country, I desire the fate of Sylla, that he may be devoured by lice.

Mr. KEARFUL. This newspaper El Dia had been in circulation at Monterrey for some time in the publication of sentiments of that sort, had it?

Mr. THOMPSON. It had been published through most of the war, and had always been anti-American, especially after the United States joined the Allies against Germany, but its propaganda against the United States antedated our entering the war because, as everyone in Mexico realizes, one of the chief jobs of the great German propaganda preached in that country has been to stir up strife between Mexico and the United States, with the idea of keeping the eyes of this country toward the Rio Grande rather than the Marne.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the representations of the pro-German propagandists in reference to the intentions of the United States toward Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. The German propagandists were working all over Mexico, and very strongly in the north of Mexico where Monterrey is located, to convince the Mexicans that the United States had planned definitely to annex all of northern Mexico. Their cry was always of the "Lost provinces of Texas and California." The idea which was forced to the front in the Mexican mind by that German propaganda was that the United States had, from the very beginning of its history, a predatory attitude toward Mexico, and that Texas was a fruit of that unfriendliness and that desire to annex the rich provinces of northern Mexico. There was always a fertile field for that sort of propaganda, and the Germans in their usual way made the most of it. It was quoted very frankly in El Dia, and in all circles of Mexican society in Monterrey, that the plan of the United States was to take all of northern Mexico down to San Luis Potosi.

Mr. KEARFUL. The witness Esteva testified that in his opinion the first cause of the revolutionary trouble was the publication of a series of articles by John Kenneth Turner, entitled "Barbarous Mexico," and that those articles were partly written by a Mexican socialist. Do you know who that man was, or did you come in contact with him in Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. Do you mean Turner or the Mexican?

Mr. KEARFUL. The Mexican.

Mr. THOMPSON. The man who was said to have been associated with Turner, and who was supposed to have been the author of some of the chapters of Turner's book, was named De Lara, and was at the time I was in Monterrey known as a prominent Bolshevist agitator at Tampico. In the latter part of November, 1915, De Lara, and another alleged Bolshevist named Torre Blanco, came to Monterrey for the purpose, it was said, of fomenting a strike in the shops and smelters of the Cia de Minerales y Metales at Monterrey, the Mexican subsidiary of the American Metals Co., which had been taken over by the alien property custodian, and was, therefore, in a way, a sort of an American-governed company, or was so regarded. The strike in the smelter did not develop, but the Bolshevik agitation which was brought about had the effect of starting a strike in the railway shops at Monterrey, that became quite serious, and strike-breakers were brought from the south. The result was that the Bolshevik agitators and the so-called Mexican I. W. W., were officially discouraged in the city of Monterrey and were sent back to Tampico, where they were more useful. That convinced me at the time, and is a matter of record in my reports, that the Bolshevik agitation in Mexico was being used solely as a weapon against Americans, and was never allowed to develop unless it took that form. At the time De Lara and Torre Blanco came to Monterrey it was reported that R. G. Bremer, a pro-German propagandist and Austrian consul, was engaged in translating much of the Bolshevik and I. W. W. material into Spanish for circulation in Monterrey. I made considerable effort to trace down that rumor, and found that such material was being printed in a well-known German printing establishment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find to be the currency situation in Monterrey at that time?

Mr. THOMPSON. When I was in Monterrey the entire business of Mexico was in an almost comatose state. There was still considerable mining and smelting, because the London market was still supporting the price of lead, which is a determining factor in the value of ore in northern Mexico. Business, however, was in a most uncertain state, and one of the chief contributing factors to that was the shortage of currency. Previous witnesses before the subcommittee have gone into detail regarding the issue of paper money in Mexico, so I need only say that the collapse of the paper-money régime in Mexico had already come, and that it had left Mexico upon what we considered a metallic basis. In other words, only gold and silver were supposed to circulate. In view of the fact that almost all the old metal money had been hidden away and most of it exported from northern Mexico—export being an easy matter, for the American border was only 150 miles away—there was not enough in circulation to carry on the business of the community.

In addition to this, the Carranza Government had made it illegal to use American money. There had always been plenty of American bills, which had been accepted at their face value, and these had furnished a circulating medium previous to that time. While that money was still accepted in certain places, it could not be used for the payment of taxes or for transfer throughout the country, so that the whole Monterrey section was dependent upon a very small stock of Mexican gold and silver. I estimated at that time that the entire amount of actual money in northern Mexico, in the Monterrey section, was less than a million pesos, or $500,000. Of that, half was tied up in the vaults of one of the old banks, so that the circulating medium was actually less than $250,000. In addition to that, there was practically no paper in circulation—either checks, or drafts, or regular commercial bank paper. Some of the private banks in Monterrey were doing a loan business through their American correspondents, but the entire total of all money loaned in Monterrey at the time I was there was not more than $100,000.

When it is realized that in the old days, when the banks of issue, which Carranza had closed, were still running, the amount of money loaned in that section on gilt-edged security was about $7,000,000 United States currency, the picture of the desolation of northern Mexico in business begins to take form. The picture is made clearer when we realize that the current price for money on the best security possible—and there were only about three big concerns in the north whose stock was accepted as collateral—was from 3 to 5 per cent per month, or 50 to 60 per cent per year. The result was that there was no business in the Monterrey section that could be carried on unless it was a business of speculation.

In this country we know considerable about profiteering, but Mexico could teach us more than we could ever appreciate here. When speculators enter into business their chief means of speculation are in foodstuffs, and that was the case in and about Monterrey. Their speculation began with the farmer, who, at the risk of the raids of bandits or Carranza soldiers, had harvested his crops and had got them to the railway. He then either had to bribe the officials to get cars or he had to sell his goods at any price to the general in command of the territory or to some one who had his favor. Then the normal methods of transportation were used to bring the merchandise to Monterrey or other distributing points. The money for this transaction was borrowed at the rate of anywhere from 5 to 25 per cent for the brief turnover of a few weeks, and that price was, of course, added to the cost of food to the consumer.

The currency situation in Monterrey at that time was being complicated by the disappearance of the old silver coins, which were of a higher silver content than their value in gold, which was the official circulating medium. These old coins were being bought up for export, although there was a law against the exportation of any silver except under permission of the Government, and an absolute law against the exporting of silver coins.

At one time in Monterrey, shortly after I arrived there, I was endeavoring to buy some small change at an advance of about 4 per cent on the general price of gold, for change always commanded a premium because there was so little of it. I found the price had jumped to almost 10 per cent. I learned that a man named Dominguez, who held a private concession for the export of silver coin through the cordon of official prohibition, was in town. He was buying up the old half dollars and even the 20-cent pieces at a heavy advance on the market price. He stayed in town about three days and in that time he stripped the community of its silver change so that we were doing business with American nickels and dimes and with Mexican nickels and copper coins.

Mr. KEARFUL. What had become of the paper money that had been issued by the Carranza government?

Mr. THOMPSON. The paper money had at that time been repudiated under the various decrees, which had not only ruined the currency system by foisting this paper money on the public, but had also destroyed the banks of issue. I may say right here that in Monterrey there were two of these so-called banks of issue which, under the concessions obtained under the banking laws originated by Limantour, the great financial minister of Diaz, had carried most of the burden of business, which I mentioned above as being about $7,000,000 in gilt-edged loans.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say "concessions." Did not these banks operate under the national banking law, which was a general law?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir. These banks operated under a general law, but that general law provided for what was called "concessions," which, as I stated before, were franchises for operation. There were two of these in Monterrey, as I say, and there were also branches of two other banks which had headquarters in Mexico City. The paper money of these banks had been ruined in the course of the destruction of the institutions by Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the terms of the concession in regard to the issuing of notes?

Mr. THOMPSON. The banks were allowed, under the franchise, to issue paper money to the extent of double their cash reserve, and that money had been accepted all over the Republic at its face value and had been one of the great achievements of the Diaz plan of commercial development. Diaz had financed his own revolution with hard money, gold and silver, chiefly the Mexican silver peso. After he came into power he organized the banking system, which existed until Carranza destroyed it, and that paper money had come to be of the same value in the mind of the suspicious Mexican as gold and silver itself. By this issuance of paper currency, bearing his own promise to pay, Carranza had begun the destruction of the credit of paper money in Mexico, and had even repudiated issue after issue of his own money until its price fell to about 2 cents on the peso. The price of the bank bills had fallen, due to the destruction of the confidence of the people, and also to the fact that there was a good deal of inflating of the money. It is, however, worth noting that while the price of Carranza's own money had fallen to 2 cents on the peso, the value of the money of the banks which he was seeking to destroy was still maintained at 13 cents a peso. Ultimately, however, Carranza closed the banks by decree, in punishment, it was said, for their failure to open their coffers to him.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the cash reserve in those banks?

Mr. THOMPSON. The cash reserve was mostly confiscated by Carranza, but one of the banks in Monterrey managed to save part of its funds by a bribe to one of the Carranza officials, with the result that it was allowed to export some of its money. A portion of these funds were at one time in the American consulate, and one of the thrilling stories showing how the Americans of northern Mexico stood with the Mexican business men and actually stood up for them is the record of the fight which Consul General Hanna made to save these funds in his little office safe. They were finally spirited away during the night, through a Mexican mob which was howling outside the consulate.

One of the banks saved its funds by selling exchange on New York to a Carranza general at a reduced figure, it being vital at that time to these revolutionists to have a way of getting their loot out of Mexico and safely deposited in New York banks. It was said that $250,000 was saved in that way, at a very heavy loss in exchange.

Monterrey was, at the time of Diaz, a very important manufacturing center, and also a jobbing center for all of that section of Mexico. The shortage of money at the present time has, therefore, had a much more serious effect there than it has perhaps had even in Mexico City, where there is enough speculation at the present time to keep a large sum of money in circulation, a part of which, of course, goes into legitimate business.

I have stated there was only about $100,000 out in loans. That was drawing from 2 to 3 per cent, the interest having been deducted from the amount of the loan when it was made. All loans were for short terms, never more than four months. In addition, the old system of "selling" properties, which were to be "bought back" at an agreed figure at the expiration of the term of the loan, had been somewhat in vogue, although there was a considerable opposition to it by the Carrancistas, who would much rather confiscate the property themselves than to have it saved by loans. I may say that this high price for money would seem to be almost impossible for outside capital, but an official of a bank in Tampico who came to Monterrey at the time said that if he had $100,000 he could put it all out at 5 per cent a month on absolutely gilt-edged security.

About the same time a traveling representative of the American International Corporation came into the consulate to inquire regarding the figures on local industries, as he was then scouting through the country for possible investments for the future. He said there was no business he could find in Mexico that offered any possibilities for banking; that while there was plenty of that sort of banking business of which I speak, with its incidental risks, legal and otherwise, it was certainly not a line that he would be willing to recommend to his principals.

It would also seem that there should be money from the old family estates, and I may say that the only industries which are now continuing in Monterrey where any money is needed, such as cotton mills, are being done by these same old families, who have money of their own which they will risk in their own enterprises, and which they do not charge up at any such figure as 5 per cent interest a month, because they would not dare loan it to any other business. In other words, the only business being done in Mexico where capital is required is being done by the American companies or by the old-style Mexicans, who have always used their own money in their business and have never been solely dependent upon banking. In other words, Mexico has slipped back to the period before Gen. Diaz came into power. That is a condition which is rampant all over Mexico, and which I have sought to describe here.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any knowledge as to the system of graft by Government officials or army officials in connection with import duties and internal taxes?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. As consular officer I made some investigation of business conditions in Monterrey, and found that at the basis of all the business troubles were two things: One was the banking and financial situation mentioned above, which naturally forced the necessary margin of profit up to such an extent that the cost of living is appalling in Monterrey; and the other is the question of graft, official and otherwise.

In Mexico the prices of commodities are based upon the cost of the imported article. In other words, the tariff in Mexico, which has always been high, has not been used as a form of protection for native industries, but as a means of allowing the native manufacturers to secure higher prices. Thus, the native product some times is as expensive as the imported, and almost never more than 1 or 2 per cent lower. The result is that the tariff has a tremendous effect on prices, and that is especially true in view of the fact that so much of the manufacturing in Mexico has been destroyed by the Carranza régime. The official schedules for import duties were always complicated in Mexico, but under the Dias régime they were stable. There were no sudden changes, and the importer could always estimate what his import tax was to be, and could therefore do his business on a narrow margin. Under the Carranza régime, however, there has been a most destructive change in the method of assessing customs tariffs. The tariff, both import and export, has been raised and lowered in the most astonishing way, and almost invariably without any advance notice. For instance, the tariff schedules on cotton goods, which provide that there shall be a different tariff for different fineness of materials, are suddenly raised or lowered by executive decree.

The result is that the importer who is not on the inside circle of Carranza information is very likely to be caught with a shipment of goods arriving at the border two days after the tariff has been doubled. That has had a serious effect on business, but it has its explanation in the fact that this raising and lowering of tariff seems to be arranged for the purpose of allowing favored individuals in the inner circle of the revolutionists to make sudden fortunes. For instance, a man who is on the inside would buy an entire carload of shoes, and would bring them to the border, and then inform his friends in Mexico City that he had those shoes and was ready to import them. The tariff on shoes would be immediately removed for a period of one week, during which time this man imports his goods. That actually happened in Monterrey: a carload of American shoes, which normally pay about $1.50 duty per pair, was brought in free of duty, and flooded the market and entirely demoralized it. That happened at the time I was in Monterrey. The man who brought in the shoes, of course, made a fortune out of the one shipment.

Another form of graft which was being carried on at that time, and continues to this day, is the concessions which favored persons have to import their goods free of duty. That is well known, and there is no doubt whatever that it is used almost entirely by Mexicans. I am proud to say that Americans in Mexico have seldom, if ever, to my knowledge, taken advantage of it. These men, all of them Mexicans, who hold the concessions for free imports, sell the privileges which they obtain or which are granted them, for one-half the duty. In other words, if you are a Mexican importer and have a carload of shoes arriving at the border, you may, after the tariff has been resumed, certainly be able to save half your loss of tariff by going to this man and paying him half duty, instead of paying full duty to the Government. This graft is rampant, and there are instances of various individuals in the Mexican Government, from the highest officials to the lowest, profiting from it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there a similar system of graft in reference to internal taxation?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. There has always been a tendency to graft in Mexican administration, especially on the part of the tax officials. That was pretty well stamped out under Diaz. The system consisted of the use of tips to the assessor or collector. Under the Carranza régime, as I know it in Monterrey, there was almost unbridled graft, which again added to the uncertainty of business. However, I am told that graft in Mexico, while increased a hundredfold over what it was in Mexico City under Diaz, has now reached a point where one can tell what one is going to have to pay for every privilege or every bit of justice which one gets from the Government.

I would like to say right here that I have met some Americans recently returned from Mexico, who say they are getting along very well in Mexico now. One I remember particularly, said, "We know how to get along with the Mexicans," and when I asked him what he meant by that he took a handful of silver out of his pocket and shook it in his hand significantly. I believe that where the present American residents of Mexico are appearing to be more friendly than they were in the past to Carranza, it is because they have learned that secretly they can connive with the Carranza government for the exploitation of the foreign manufacturer and the native consumer. In other words, the things which Bryan was accusing the Americans of doing under Diaz, and which they never did, in my belief, and to my absolute knowledge in most cases, they are now doing under the Carranza régime. This new attitude toward the Carranza régime has been forced upon them by the failure of the United States Government to protect them in their rights and their desires to establish American policies and American business in Mexico. In other words, they are victims of our own administrative mistakes, and of the administrative weakness of the present government at Washington.

To explain the taxation system in Monterrey might be of value here, but I will only state that the basis of taxation in that city has not changed materially in form although it has been greatly increased. The method of tax graft in the city has to do with the valuation. Three years ago a revaluation of land in Monterrey was begun and finished in a brief time. The assessor seldom went out of the tax office, presumably because he knew the town so well. The result was naturally that the Mexican policy of "skin your enemies and help your friends" had full swing. It was expected that every one would protest, and every one did, with the result that a single protest usually cut the assessment in two, and another cut it to a third, and if you were well prepared with money on the occasion, it was cut down below the original or old valuation. The result of that has been tax dodging with full protection.

I think the stamp tax is the only Federal tax collected in Mexico, and that has been increased almost fourfold, so that when we formerly put on a peso as a stamp we now put on four. The chief method of graft in the use of stamps, in the administration of the stamp tax, is in the fines which are assessed on business men who make mistakes in keeping their books. The Mexican stamp-tax law is extremely complicated, and it is almost impossible to avoid mistakes. Therefore, an examination of your books will reveal, if the collector wishes to find them, certain errors for which he can fine you heavily. The result is that you are called upon to pay him a fixed sum of money for his "courtesy" in not fining you. I remember a case of an American who had had his books examined for 10 years back by one of these grafting collectors, and a small mistake had been discovered in those years. The result was that the collector required a tip of about $100. In previous years that tip had been about $25 for the examination of his books. The next year a new Carranza collector called, and when he had gone over the books perfunctorily, and had been slipped his $25, he looked at a memorandum sheet and said, "Oh, but you always pay $100."

Mr. KEARFUL. While you were in Monterrey did you have occasion to gather information in reference to the vicissitudes of American citizens in the interior, operating on ranches?

Mr. THOMPSON. Naturally many complaints of that sort came to the consulate, though the Monterrey district suffered less than some of the others, such as the Tampico section, because practically all the Americans in Monterrey and the surrounding country have long since left. Indeed, where the American population in Monterrey in 1910 was about 5,000, it is to-day about 100 Americans.

However, there was one case which was almost complete, and may be of interest, as showing the method followed by the bandits or Carrancistas, and also the attitude of the Government toward them. That case continued through November and December, 1918, and related to a plantation owned by an American who had married in Mexico, his wife's father having been a prominent official in the old Diaz régime. The ranch consisted of about 100,000 acres, and was located in a very rich valley some distance from Monterrey. This man's complaints are all a matter of record, both in the State Department and before the Mexican government, so, although I prefer not to give his name, it can all be substantiated. The man is a very well-known American and is highly thought of, and I was assured from all sources that he was absolutely reliable. The first of our record was a letter from him dated November 3, 1918, and was in part as follows:

I have to report that yesterday, having heard that the Government troops were here and expecting protection, I sent to an adjoining hacienda, 4 carts for salt earth. While loading, the troops (Carrancistas) arrived and by force of arms took 4 oxen and a horse and saddle, causing me a pecuniary loss of $300 for the oxen, and $102 for horse and saddle, total $402. The colonel who took them refused payment or receipt, and said to tell me that the animals were taken by the troops of Gen. Ramos. They knew perfectly well that they were American property. I have very few animals left, and if they pass by here and take more, I am utterly ruined and will have to abandon my property to be completely destroyed.

The consul took this matter up with the governor, but before we got a report, we received another letter from this American, dated November 16, in which he said:

I notice from your letter that the governor will telegraph to Gen. Ramos that the oxen and saddle horse be returned. As the oxen were killed and the meat taken by them, this returning of the animals will be rather difficult. From information received from all directions these troops (Carrancistas) swept through the country gathering up the animals of all classes and the clothes that were left to the "pacificos" [noncombatants] who hid out, and returned to their property after the revolutionists had passed. My hacienda is again full of refugees in all conditions of misery, running this time not from Villistas but from the Government troops. One living in the city can not imagine the suffering caused to these unfortunate people by both sides unless he reads of Belgium and northern France. I came to town to find out the name of the colonel who took the animals, but as these troops have not been here, his name is not known. I understand these troops are again on the road. God grant that they do not pass by my place, as it seems a pleasure to destroy American property and, as they say, call the American bluff.

On December 3, the Government took its first official recognition of the affair, a month after it occurred, in a letter from the chief clerk of the Department of Government, the department making the investigation and taking steps regarding the matter, in which he said:

Mr. KEARFUL. Which Government?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Mexican Government. In this letter this statement was made:

I beg of you to obtain the name of the colonel responsible for the matters complained of, in order that this department may make investigation and take steps regarding the matter.

That was the status of affairs when the letter reporting the new raid was received, which was this time by what this American calls Villista troops, or a body opposed to the Government, which was dated December 1, and in which he makes the following statement:

I have to report that yesterday at 9 a. m. my hacienda was taken possession of by a Villista force of about 35 men under the direct orders of Col. Hernandez, accompanied by Gen. Eulalio Cutierrez, ex-President of Mexico, and held until 5 p. m. Looting was the order of the day. First, my house was sacked of all wearing and bed clothes and eatables and everything of any value taken. Then the houses of the inhabitants were stripped, many of the men left without hats, breeches, or shoes. They then took four carts and 16 oxen of the hacienda and 26 burros of the servants, every one of my sacks, loaded them with corn, about 126 hectoliters, together with all my seed wheat, and sent them away.

Then they sent off 300 goats with their little ones, after which they gathered all the cattle they could, and as they left through my pasture land I do not yet know if they have left me any or not. Will advise later. They took then my last horse and two mules and I can not move from the hacienda. This about finishes me, as I am left without anything with which to work. I am thoroughly satisfied that this Government will not give me the guarantees for which I have paid my taxes, if the hacienda does not produce anything. If I do not get protection quickly I will not be able to dispose of the little that remains, and my place will be a desert like so many others in this fine district. I notified the chief of this section last night, and have just received notice that nothing can be done to overtake and recuperate the property taken. The Villistas will surely return quickly and finish the job.

On a separate sheet of paper a memorandum is noted regarding the incident referred to, with the following statement:

In the last five months more than 12,000 people have fled from this part of the State, leaving their homes and all abandoned. In this district, as big as the State of Nuevo Leon, formerly rich in woods, fibers, animals, and cereals, especially wheat, every rich hacienda and ranch have been abandoned and ruined by the depredations of this band. It is now a scene of "No Man's Land." It is incredible that such a small force has been permitted for such a long time to dominate and destroy such an immense amount of rich country. The Government forces that came in November took their camp and supplies, drove them to the mountains, and then returned. The rebels are again taking possession of everything, more voracious than ever and no relief in sight.

On December 14 we got another report in reference to these conditions, in which the following statement is made:

As I wrote you a few days ago, life is unsupportable for want of protection. I now have to report that my hacienda was again occupied on the 12th day by 15 men of the forces of Carrera Torres, the worst I have seen during the revolution. Robbing, insulting, and threatening was the order of the day. They were entering my house all day on horseback and threatened to shoot my son for not giving them a rifle which he has not got. From here they took a cart of corn, 2 yolk of oxen, 34 goats with their little ones, 4 mares, one of which they shot down because she was wild, and cattle. From here they went to one of my ranches, where they stripped the people and violated the women, and one poor woman had to be brought here on a stretcher. I am moving my furniture as quickly as possible. My people are all terrorized and running in every direction, and I do not think that I can hold enough of them to clean up, if help does not quickly come. In the town there are about 30 soldiers who allow the enemy to profit by these supplies, when by giving protection they can starve them out.

(P. S.—Bolshevism and anarchy are tame compared with this.)

Following the receipt of this letter of December 18 I called in my official capacity, as American vice-consul, on the governor of the State, to leave copies of the letters from this American, and to report the new raids, the others having been previously sent to him by messenger. We asked him what measures would be taken to recover the property stolen and to afford protection to this American.

The governor's reply was a statement that he had already been informed of the activities of this band, and that 200 men had been sent to that district. He spoke of the difficulties of chasing down these bandits, as the entire region is mountainous, and the bandits retreated immediately on the approach of a force of soldiers and stay hid until the soldiers, owing to other work, have to depart, when they descend on the ranches again, as he put it, like "vultures." He said that no matter how long the troops stayed the bandits lived in the mountains. "I do not know how they exist, but they do exist," he said. And so on—fair enough words. He said that he was grateful for the copies of the letters on the situation, and that he would take the matter up direct with the President, using these letters as evidence of the need of strong measures. He said he wished to obtain a large force, of 2,000 men if necessary, to scour out these bandits in this particular section and hunt them down in their holes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he secure the force?

Mr. THOMPSON. Not to my knowledge. It seems to me that this history is as significant as anything that has been told as showing the inability or lack of desire of the Carranza government to furnish adequate protection. The section referred to is one of the granaries of Mexico, and yet Carranza apparently would not assign 2,000 men to clean it up, which they could probably have done in a matter of a month.

On December 17 we got another letter from this American that was supplemental to the raid on December 12, in which he says:

The things that happened in those two small ranches that the rebels passed are horrible. They first put the men under guard, and then abused the women, not even sparing little girls of 9 and 10 years. The screams of these poor unfortunates were pitiful. They took all the clothes even from sick children. It was awful to see the next day the parents arriving with these little ones in their arms, trembling from cold. We are 7,500 feet above sea level; cold winds in the day and heavy breezes every night. If there is a Red Cross in Mexico it could not do a better service to humanity than send supplies.

As a result of that appeal we wrote to Mexico City, and the local American Red Cross chapter sent a stock of supplies, which we promptly forwarded to this American to distribute among the sufferers in his section.

Mr. KEARFUL. From the information you obtained at that time, do you regard the statements made by this American as typical of the situation existing in every part of Mexico, according to matters of common knowledge?

Mr. THOMPSON. I certainly do. It seems to me that is absolutely typical of the conditions, and because it is a complete history, I have taken considerable space to set it down as a type and not a single incident.

(Thereupon, at 1.20 o'clock p. m., an adjournment was taken until Friday, March 12, 1920, at 10.30 a. m.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

FRIDAY, MARCH 12, 1920.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WALLACE THOMPSON—Resumed.

Mr. KEARFUL. In one of the various quotations from the reports made by the American ranchman, he spoke of the Mexicans calling the "American bluff." What do you understand he meant by that term?

Mr. THOMPSON. The term "American bluff" is, of course, borrowed from the English, and in fact the Spanish word is identical with the English. The "bluff" to which this American referred, and to which Americans and Mexicans in Mexico generally refer, is the demands which we make, with the most elaborate official letters and communications to the Mexican Government, calling for the protection of Americans, and hinting darkly of the perils which will face the Mexican Government in case it fails to protect our people.

By "calling" this "bluff" the Mexicans mean that they will defy the American Government by carrying on their depredations against Americans, and that the United States will do absolutely nothing.

I may say, I think, without any reflection upon our consular or diplomatic corps in Mexico, that the time was reached in Mexico some years ago when their demands for the protection of Americans and their representations to the Mexican Government officials came to mean nothing. Ten years ago, in Monterrey, a word from the American consul was as good as an order from the highest authority in the Mexican Government. During the last siege of Monterrey the American officials were not only sources of personal authority in all the turmoil, but the Mexicans really believed the United States would do something, if they did not agree to the demands of our representatives. But, gradually, as these demands were made and were not complied with, and the United States did nothing at all, the prestige of the American officials and of the American Government declined steadily and of late years it has gone down a toboggan slide.

Even the personal prestige of American officials amounts to nothing in Mexico to-day. Such a man as Consul General Hanna, of Monterrey, who has lived in that city for more than 20 years and who is respected and honored by all, was formerly good for the release of any American, or, indeed, of any Mexican, from unjust confinement; but even his word or his demand to-day means nothing; and when three years ago he was carried through the streets under arrest, although the crowds groaned and protested loudly, nothing could save him from that indignity. The "calling of the American bluff" is the merriest game which is being carried on in Mexico to-day. The Mexican is a born gambler, and he will always call a bluff or attempt to call what he considers may be a bluff. In calling a bluff against an opposing player—in this case the American Government or American officials—when he shows he has the cards the Mexican immediately retreats and accepts the show-down without the necessity of force being brought to bear; but when time after time and year after year bluffs have been called by the Mexicans refusing to comply with our representations, a state of affairs has been reached in Mexico where neither American Government officials nor Americans of long residence in Mexico have any influence whatever. That is what the American rancher refers to, and that is a plaint which goes up in Mexico every day. Sometimes it reaches as far as the Monterrey consulate and sometimes it reaches as far as the border, and sometimes, as in the case of this committee, it reaches the Senate Office Building; but never, through all the years that this has been going on, has it apparently ever reached the White House.

MR. KEARFUL. To carry out the simile in connection with the national game the Mexican has repeatedly called our bluff and has invariably found us of late years with a bobtailed flush. Is that correct?

MR. THOMPSON. I think that is very well put; and I may say that the game has reached such a point in northern Mexico that the Mexican seldom bothers even to wait and see what we have, but proceeds to go ahead with the next deal without even requesting us to show our hand. Unfortunately, in Mexico, it is Mexicans who always deal the cards—an art in which there is nothing for him to learn.

MR. KEARFUL. It was testified the other day by Mr. E. N. Brown, former president of the National Railways of Mexico, that much of the freight business on such roads as are operating is done by private trains, owned and maintained and operated by foreigners. What information have you upon that subject?

MR. THOMPSON. My information dates from last year; and although there have been some changes in the situation, owing to the fact that more and more of the mines in Mexico have been closed since the European war ended, and the Governments of Europe and the United States ceased to uphold the metal market, I think that there has been comparatively little change in the situation. I may say at the beginning that to me and, I think, to most people in Mexico who are able to maintain a detached viewpoint, such as I feel that I have been able to do, the maintenance of the freight business in Mexico in some ways is a miracle of American energy and American resourcefulness.

When the roads were taken over by the Carrancistas in 1914 there were almost daily blowups of bridges and trains, and since that time there has been a continual destruction of track and of rolling stock. The Mexican Government has bought practically no repair parts and very little, if any, new equipment. The right of way has been maintained in certain sections, notably on the main line between Laredo and Mexico City, so that that line is passable. As to the branch lines, over these the Mexican engineers, with their light engines, can still pilot their 6 and 10 car trains with infinite care, knowing each rail and curve and how it can be negotiated.

The upkeep of the rolling stock, however, has been utterly ludicrous. The railway yards in Monterrey, when I was there, were filled with the broken carcasses of freight cars and with ruined and rusty engines. The freight cars filled the sidings, and the engines were in the yards, slowly rusting away. From about 100 engines now at Monterrey practically every bit of brass has been detached and sold by petty thieves for junk, and other parts of the engines have been taken away, even down to the bolts, for the repair of the 25 or 30 engines which they still maintain on that division.

When I was in Monterrey there were about 20 trains being operated out of there on the six lines which center at that important railway point. The handling of freight was subject to hopeless delay, and the only possible method of getting goods through was by express, at rates which were, pound for pound, practically as high as the passenger rates. The freight business had fallen off to such an extent in 1916, I think it was, that the American mining companies obtained permission from the Mexican Government to provide and operate their own trains. The arrangement which they made, and which obtains to this day, was about as follows:

Under special franchises a private company furnishes the locomotive and cars in each train and pays the full rate for the freight carried in addition. All that the Constitutionalist Railway Co. did was to furnish and pay the crew and to furnish fuel, oil, waste, etc. The private companies, therefore, maintain the trains, owning and keeping them in repair. In addition to that, in order to obtain a certain amount of efficiency, they voluntarily paid a regular bonus to the Mexican crews. That was about 1 cent United States currency per kilometer to engineers and conductors and one-half cent to other members of the crews.

The books of the various companies will show, I think, what the additional cost of this form of service was to them. I believe that it was an increase of about 20 to 30 per cent over the regular freight rates which they paid the railway company. Since Carranza took over the railways, the freight rates have gone up 25 per cent all over the country, the rate for ore in Mexico being about 1 cent United States currency per kilometer ton. So that the additional cost was about one-quarter of a cent per kilometer ton, which, needless to say, is a considerable and unnecessary addition to the cost of mining.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was any deduction made from the regular freight rate on account of trains being furnished and maintained by the private operators?

Mr. THOMPSON. Absolutely not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do these operators carry freight generally besides that arising from their own business?

Mr. THOMPSON. Most of these private companies were allowed to carry only their own freight, but one American concern, the Oliver Trading Co., had a concession to carry miscellaneous freight, a concession which I believe still obtains. Another American company, after the mining business became reduced, owing to the reduction in the price of lead and to the increase of taxes of the Carranza government, obtained a similar franchise to do commercial business, but I believe that this has been merged with the Oliver concession, which is now operating the mining company's trains on a lease. This company was the Cia. de Minerales y Metales (the American Metals Co.).

Mr. KEARFUL. In carrying freight for the public, what charges are made, beyond the ordinary freight charges, by these private operators?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am not sure, but I believe the increase is 50 per cent over the normal freight schedule of the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which amount is naturally paid by the consumer?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the proportion of the freight business done by these private operators?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no actual figures of the proportion, but I believe that during my time in Monterrey considerably more than half of the freight business of northern Mexico was being handled by the private trains of these foreign companies. I have, however, figured for that time, all the equipment owned by these companies, which I think may give point to my statement of this condition. The American Smelting & Refining Co., for instance, operated 31 locomotives, 20 of which were owned by the company and 11 were old constitutionalist railway engines, which the company had taken and rebuilt at its own expense, and which by arrangement with the railway company it was allowed to operate for, I think, about two years before giving them back to the constitutionalists railway.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say "the railway company." The "railway company" is the Mexican Government, is it not?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; I accept this correction. The National Railways of Mexico are owned by a stock company in which American capital predominates.

Mr. KEARFUL. I do not mean the actual technical ownership; what I mean is, Is it not the fact that, irrespective of ownership, the railroads which were taken over in 1914 have been operated and are now operated by the Mexican Government?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is exactly what I mean, that although the technical title is in the name of the stock company, the actual operation of the railways, including all the things necessary for traffic, are in the hands of the constitutionalist government, which has taken all of the money which the railways have earned, and has never since 1914 paid one cent of the fixed charges for which the National Railways of Mexico, the stock company, is and must be responsible.

Mr. KEARFUL. Proceed with your statement of the figures.

Mr. THOMPSON. The American Smelting & Refining Co., therefore, operated 31 locomotives, and nearly 800 cars, 486 of which it owned, and 296 of which are either leased from American railway companies, or are operated under the same arrangement with the Constitutional railways; that is, they have been rebuilt by the American Smelting & Refining Co., and are to be used by them for a certain stated period in return for that rebuilding. This estimate of equipment of the American Smelting & Refining Co. covers the entire Republic of Mexico.

The Mazapil Copper Co., a British concern, with headquarters at Saltillo, which is in the Monterrey district, operates 3 locomotives and 350 cars. This company also has a narrow-gauge railway, which is used only to carry ore from the mines to the smelter, having 12 locomotives and 241 narrow-gauge cars, but that has always been a private line. The Tezuitlan Copper Co., which operates in the State of Puebla, but has a smelter at San Luis Potosi, and brings coal from the Mexican coal fields near Eagle Pass, owns 9 engines and about 124 cars. It also operates cars which it has leased from American railways.

The brewery in Monterrey has 2 engines and about 50 cars.

The American Metals Co. (Cia de Minerales y Metales) has 27 engines and 464 cars.

The Monterrey Steel Plant has 8 engines and 75 cars that it owns, but it also leases a large number of cars from American railway companies. That number is constantly changing, owing to the fact that it uses these cars to bring coke from the United States.

The Oliver Trading Co. had, while I was in Monterrey, 3 engines and about 50 cars, if I remember correctly.

There are other mining companies in southern Mexico, such as the Real del Monte, in Pachuca, and, I think, the El Oro Mining Co., which is largely British owned, which have some railway equipment, but I can not give the figures.

In giving this list of private trains operated in northern Mexico, unfortunately I can not give the list of the equipment operated in the north by the Constitutionalist railways themselves. I can only state that, from most reliable sources in Monterrey, I learned that the Constitutionalist railway is operating only about 20 per cent of the rolling stock which was owned by the national railways of Mexico in 1912. That figure may seem trifling and unbelievable, but when it is remembered that during the revolutionary period there was the most wanton and unthinking destruction of equipment and personal property of every sort in Mexico, it becomes a little more believable.

For instance, when Monterrey was the center of the revolution in 1915, Gen. Pablo Gonzales, at the head of the Carranza troops, burned 800 loaded freight cars in the Monterrey yards, in order to keep them from falling into the hands of the Villistas. It is the skeletons of these cars which line the sidings in Monterrey to-day, and make the great yards of that city suggest the ruins in Belgium.

When I was at Monterrey the estimates given me by Mexican yardmen in the employ of the Constitutionalist railways was that there were 25 engines handled every 24 hours in the local roundhouse, and that there were 20 freight trains, of an average of only 12 cars each, passing through the city. There was then an average of four passenger trains daily.

The foreign companies which are operating trains, in addition to their equipment of rolling stock, have small but very well-equipped machine shops, where the cars and engines are kept in repair. The American Smelting & Refining Co. have a beautiful little shop, where there are always three or four engines being gone over or rebuilt. The American Metals Co. has a slightly larger shop, and the steel plant also has its own equipment, although I may say that the steel plant is a Mexican concern, although its original officers were French and Spanish, who were identified with the business life of Mexico City and had been for many years.

When I was studying this particular phase of the conditions in Mexico, for the purpose of making a report to our Government, I found myself swept off my feet time and again by the useless horrors and destruction which had gone before and was still going on from day to day in the very arterial system of Mexican progress, for the railways of any country are its arteries, and in Mexico far more than the Mexicans themselves have ever realized. I believe that the wonderful American enterprise which built these railways and which opened up the mines of Mexico is responsible for the maintenance of the commercial life of the Republic to-day.

I have not read Mr. Brown's testimony, but I wish to state what he probably did not state that under his wise management and under the progressive policies of Mr. Brown and the late A. A. Robinson—who was president of the Mexican Central Railway before it was merged with the national lines—there was built in Mexico a system of railways which will do credit to the western territory of our own United States. Just before Diaz fell, Mr. Brown put in rock ballast and the solid steel on the railways all over northern Mexico at a cost unjustified by the traffic at that time, and these are the things that are keeping the railways in operation to-day. In traveling over the lines of the north, at the sidings where the sick and wheezy engines operated by the Constitutionlists had to stop and breathe in order to get up enough steam to go on, I walked the rotten ties and dug into them with my penknife. The road is ready to fall to pieces, and but for the rock ballast and heavy rails would be utterly impassable. The possibility of operation of the railways there, such as there is to-day, is a rugged monument to the enterprise of men like Mr. Brown and Mr. Robinson, with the magnificent crew of railway builders and operators who went with them in the great pioneer period of the Diaz régime.

To-day on the base of this monument, the American companies which are operating trains and maintaining their shops, have built a superstructure which, though it may appear to the world outside as a credit to the current government, because it was built under the Carranza régime, is in reality only a manifestation of that indomitable American spirit which has ever been one of the most potent factors in the civilization and progress of Mexico.

MR. KEARFUL. When you were in Monterrey did you have occasion to ascertain the opinion of prominent and substantial Mexicans with reference to the intervention by the United States in the affairs of Mexico?

MR. THOMPSON. When I was in Monterrey I made it my business to go into conditions there, for the purpose of reporting to my Government on every phase of the situation, as it was in that way that I conceived my work in the Consular Service. I think I may say that, simply because I went out to seek this sort of information, I got a good deal which was of interest to our Government, and which may be of interest here.

Monterrey is, first, only 167 miles from the American border, and has always been known as one of the "Americanized" cities of Mexico. The Mexicans of that section know the United States and the Americans very well and understand them probably better than other Mexicans can.

Therefore, the upper class, at any rate, look upon the United States with respect, if not with affection, and have no definite possibilities of progress in any assistance which the United States might give. I talked with men of that type, as well as many others, and found that almost all of them realized that if American intervention should come in Mexico it would by no means mean annexation, but would be rather the sort of medicine we gave Cuba. As a result, their minds have not been clouded by any fears of American expansion, and they have never taken seriously the German propaganda that the United States was looking with envious eyes on all of northern Mexico. In the course of these dealings with Mexicans I obtained data, all of which tended invariably toward the idea of the inevitability and value of some sort of American intervention.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you written up in permanent form the interviews you had with these Mexicans?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; I wrote that matter up in definite form and have it in my personal files.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without giving the names of the parties the interviews were with, will you furnish them to the committee for the record?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; I can furnish that material, and will be very glad to do so, in such form as will absolutely protect my informants.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you read from the interviews written up by you such parts as bear upon the question asked, in such wise as not to indicate the identity of the individual?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. First, I will take the statement of a comparatively young man, the son of one of the original Carranza families in Mexico. This young man is of the type and age to be an army officer in case of intervention by a foreign power. He told me that he had just been talking with the governor of the State, and had said to him:

I do not feel that in any case we of the upper class can be expected to take any part in politics or in the army. There was a time when I felt it would be my duty to go into the army and repel any foreign invasion, in case that should come, but that time is no more.

Then my informant went on to explain to me that the cry of patriotism and the good of the country and the dangers from without had been sounded so many times in Mexico, and there was such inevitable disappointment with the outrages that were committed in the name of patriotism, that there was little or no patriotism left in the minds of the upper-class Mexicans. He said of his own volition what was told me by many other Mexicans of means:

In case of invasion or any serious revolution the Government officials, as they are now constituted, would make that the occasion for assessing a large "loan" on anybody who had anything for the purpose of paying for "defense," and as soon as the money was collected they would run off and not protect anything.

Another Mexican, whose sympathies were still with the old Diaz régime, stated the same thing with regard to forcing loans. This man is a sympathizer with Americans, not as a dependent or inferior, but as a man who understands the Americans and is understood by them better than by his own people to-day. He felt that he would welcome American intervention, for the simple reason that it would be the best thing for Mexico, and because he was sure that it would mean no such terrible thing as the lower-class Mexicans are led to believe it would. In connection with that he told me of the time when the Americans came in 1847, how it was said that all the lower classes flocked to the hills in terror, stayed there three days, and then came back loaded with baskets of food to sell to the soldiers. "It would be like that all over again," he said, with reference to the possible coming of other American troops.

Another prominent man, an original sympathizer with the Madero revolution, considered that the false Mexican pride was the chief stumbling block in the solution of the Mexican problem. He said:

Germany, which is a great power, is not ashamed to ask other powers to come and police their country, and yet Mexico is too proud to allow such a thing. It seems as if there must be something wrong with a pride like that, as if it were not entirely justified by the facts in the case.

He frankly stated that he believed that Mexico would have to be policed or handled by some outside force—he hoped by the League of Nations, as that would be much more simple than the United States, from the Mexican viewpoint. In that connection he remarked, "Carranza is anti-American, of course." This man's attitude is one of absolute hopelessness as far as Carranza is concerned. He has hope that some rebel leader may become important and strong enough to obtain the support of the United States, and thus be able to oust Carranza. It always is understood in Mexico that the United States put Carranza in power, and can put him out and some one else in whenever it so desires.

A prominent Mexican who has had connection with the banking business, but who has no definite political affiliation, looked at the question from an economic viewpoint. He spoke at considerable length during one interview I had with him of the false pride which kept Mexico from taking help, or even advice. He expressed the belief that there was no hope of getting peace in Mexico under the present Government, and said that no profitable change seemed possible without the aid of the United States.

Conditions and business are going to worse and worse extremes so rapidly that he could see no hope now of business getting back on its feet without outside aid, and such aid the Mexican Government was not only unable but unwilling to give. He cited the cost of money, up to 50 and 75 per cent a year, and then traced back over the tangled mass of causes which had led up to that condition, which had made legitimate business impossible and forced Mexico to "live on her fat," as he expressed it.

He said that credit had been utterly and completely destroyed by the present Government, so thoroughly destroyed that the people had not even faith in the Government gold coins, and questioned the value of the 2½ peso gold piece. He said that credit could not be restored by the Mexicans themselves in a generation, and then only by a herculean effort, efforts of which the country was utterly incapable; that only the United States had the credit to finance the Mexican industry and business; and that credit would not come now because there was no faith in Mexico. He traced the vicious circle round and round, always reaching the same point of completely broken faith in both the present Government and in Mexico herself.

Another man who had also been in the banking business stated to me that he believed Mexico can never be settled by the present Government because of its outrages, and, further, the belief of everyone that it can not start upon the basis upon which all building must be done—that is, the basis of confidence of the people; but, as he said, “what else is there”? The inference was, from what he said again and again, that it was up to the United States.

A man prominent in manufacturing pointed out to me that, owing to the fact that if a Mexican supported Carranza he was a prey to bandits, and if he should buy off the bandits he was a prey to the Carrancistas as a “traitor,” the present position of Mexicans of standing in the country must of necessity be one of absolute apathy, for “no government in the last 10 years has ever been able to prove itself strong enough to justify any man with anything to gain throwing his influence with it.”

The above expression, of a high-class Mexican's attitude, is significant for its obvious truth, and as an explanation of why Carranza can not command the support of men with ability and property, who must keep themselves in such condition as to be able to prove to the next fellow who comes to power that they never really meant it with Carranza.

A condition, which is probably largely local in Monterrey, came to my attention many times in connection with Mexicans who had been ruined by the revolution, but who have obtained capital from the United States and had been able to rebuild their business. These were men who had had dealings with Mexicans in Monterrey and also with Americans in the border towns, but when they were ruined and had to begin again their Mexican associates had refused to help them, while the banks and their friends on the border many times advanced them considerable sums of money on their personal and unsecured notes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that the character of men whose opinions you have been quoting?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir. This is the only man I have mentioned who had had favors from Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the men whose opinions you have been quoting men of business and high standing in the community?

Mr. THOMPSON. They were, and in addition they were men who were not dependent in any way upon the favor or the trade of the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the reason for the necessity of withholding their names from publication in your testimony?

Mr. THOMPSON. These men are living in Mexico under the sufferance of the bandit type who now control the Government. If their testimony were given out, or if by my description of them it were possible for them to be identified by the Carrancistas, they would be persecuted by iniquitous taxes, by false imprisonment, and by underground attacks which would ruin them politically, personally, and financially. In fact, I may say that some of the men whom I have quoted have suffered in the past from just that sort of persecution. They are men who have never taken part actively in politics, and have, therefore, never come under even the simulated legal ban of having been a traitor or enemy to the constitutionalist cause. They are subject to persecution only because they attended to their own business, and did not actively support the Carranza régime.

To return to the type of men who obtained credit in the United States when their own people refused help, I may say that men of that type have learned from personal experience, which touches them very deeply, that the American is just and that he will express faith in those who are worthy of it. This bond is a strong one wherever it exists, and that it does exist has been proved by the expressions of men of that type to me. I consider it something of which we as Americans can be very proud, that men of our country continue to express their faith, as they do, in Mexico and have proven their ability and their honesty.

I of course talked to many men of less prominence, and I would like to say here that the small-calibered middle-class Mexican (who really does not see much farther than the peon), who thinks only of the day, who has been educated in the United States or has had business there; this type of man has all the false pride and sensitiveness which marks Mexicans as a whole. This type of man believes in his heart that something outside Mexico might solve the problem and undoubtedly would solve it, and his only objection is the fact that if this outside aid would come, and was even accepted, it would be a reflection upon that same Mexican pride. This "pride" is perhaps their only trait which is understood by the State Department and by the White House, and sometimes it seems to be the only point which is considered by our officials dealing with the Mexican Government. That condition has been so overemphasized and petted that as a result that pride has taken the form of braggadocio, and a belief that Americans are afraid of Mexico.

MR. KEARFUL. Did you secure the opinions of any foreigners, other than Americans, who were prominent in business in that section?

MR. THOMPSON. I made it a point to interview a number of these men, and think that perhaps the statements of two of them will be of interest. Both of them are business men.

One of these men stated to me that there is "a very large proportion of genuine pro-Americans among the leading Mexicans here," the result of educating their children in the United States and of the trade they have with Americans. He feels, however, that it is not entirely safe to judge the pro-Americanism of to-day without taking into consideration the fact that the only trade of importance in Monterrey is now with the United States, and that there is actual financial profit to be gained from the friendship of that country. On the other hand, he felt that the situation of its being worth while to be friendly with the United States would always be the only hold that Americans will ever have over the Mexicans anyway, so that the feeling of pro-Americanism is "good business"—is really a solid ground to work upon. He said, cautiously, that although he had known the Mexicans for many years he never felt that he could really tell what a Mexican was thinking about him. This man said that in case of foreign intervention all the business men would be pro-American, and the lower classes would remain divided, as they are to-day.

The other foreigner whom I will quote is a keen analyst of Mexican character. Like all men of means in that section, he is fearful of the present Government. He explained that the Mexican mind naturally takes an opinion contrary to yours, and especially admires the man who is fighting against odds, that being the Mexican idea of being "muy hombre," or a real man. That explains much of the sympathy for Germany, for the German propaganda work of Germany "fighting the world" has had much effect. It also explains Carranza's apparently insane opposition to the United States at every turn as part of his campaign to gain prestige in Latin America. This foreigner expressed the opinion of the intelligent business man of this section when he laughed at Carranza's treatment of bolshevism and anarchy and his treaties with Latin-American powers, and says this latter is only a form of Latin pomp. This man is obviously pro-American, but rather unhappy over our trade methods, and says Mexico will go back to Europe if present trade methods are continued. He believes that business in Mexico will remain at practically a standstill until confidence is restored in the Government, but does not say when, if ever, he expects the present Government can have the confidence of the people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do the things you have stated with respect to Mexicans, as to the necessity for withholding their names, apply to these foreigners as well?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; it certainly does.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it safe to even give their nationality?

Mr. THOMPSON. Absolutely not; because that might help identify these men.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think, if they were known or might be identified there would be danger of reprisals being visited upon them by the present Mexican authorities for having expressed such sentiments?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think such reprisals would be forthcoming, undoubtedly; although, as these foreigners are not Americans, Carranza would have to be much more careful and roundabout in his persecution of them than he need be with Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you find to be the opinion of Americans operating in Mexico with reference to the solution of the Mexican problem?

Mr. THOMPSON. I know of no American in northern Mexico who does not consider that intervention by the United States would be a real solution of the Mexican problem. Most of them who still remain, however, recognize that if such intervention should come it might injure their business, and not only theirs, but the business and the immediate future of Americans in other sections of Mexico. These men recognize, however, that in case of intervention Monterrey, being a strategic point of great importance, would be taken and held by the Americans probably longer than any other single section, and knowing our people and our methods they realize that if an American administration had sufficient time it would gain the confidence of the Mexican people, and that the business of residents of Monterrey would, therefore, have time to recover. They are, therefore, free from the feeling of the Americans in southern Mexico that their personal profit demands that they should be left alone. They look at the problem with considerable clarity, and I think I will get none of them in trouble with Carranza by saying that they would accept American intervention in Mexican affairs.

These men, when I was in Monterrey, had been and were fighting the battles of America on a frontier, which we at home may not recognize as a frontier, but with a patriotism and love of country which compared favorably with the attitude of any American in this country or in France. They were keeping the light of American prestige burning abroad amid great discouragements, from their own Government as well as from Mexico, and were as thorough Americans and as willing to stand or fall by our Government, whatever it did during the war, as any Americans alive. They are friendly to Mexicans, and are respected and honored by them, and such belief in intervention as they have is solely with the idea of helping Mexico rather than helping themselves. That attitude of believing in the value of intervention for Mexico herself is, I believe, almost universal in the minds of Americans in Mexico. There are men whose business would be entirely ruined by American occupation, but these men, because they believe in Mexico and believe in the value of American influence in Mexico, nevertheless believe that American aid will truly solve her problems.

Mr. KEARFUL. We sometimes hear statements from a few Americans in Mexico to the effect that the Mexican problem is in fair process of being solved by the Carranza government, and that there is no need for outside help. Have you heard of such Americans?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have heard of them, and I have talked with them in this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the reason for that attitude?

Mr. THOMPSON. I believe that wherever that attitude appears it is purely from a selfish viewpoint. These men are making money and are comfortable under the Carranza régime, because, as I stated early in my testimony, they have learned how to "handle" the Carrancistas, and they are making money and getting prominence out of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do they handle the Carrancistas?

Mr. THOMPSON. They handle them, as I stated above, very largely by bribery, I believe, and by friendships, which they have established with the men who, two or three years ago, they regarded and called in private cut-throats, bandits, and assassins. I believe that any American who, at the present time, is in favor of Carranza is speaking in the interest of his own personal profit, either directly or indirectly, and no American who knows Mexico thoroughly to-day or who knew it in the past, can believe that the present government can or will solve the Mexican problem.

Mr. KEARFUL. As a matter of general interest, what can you say about the operation in Mexico of the Enemy Trading List that was made up by our War Trade Board during the war with Germany?

Mr. THOMPSON. That was naturally a subject which had to do with most of my official work when I was in the consulate at Monterrey. Without going into any great detail, I may state that the Enemy Trading List, as applied to Mexico, was supposedly directed against German firms or anti-American Mexicans, the idea being in Mexico, as all over the world, to prevent the Germans from gaining prestige and trade advantage which might, during the war, or afterwards, redound to the advantage of the enemies of the Allies. In Monterrey, however, and I believe in all of Latin America, from what I have been able to hear, the Enemy Trading List had almost the opposite effect, especially in sections close to the border, where the complicated operations and application of the "black list" made it almost impossible for anyone who wished to deal honestly with the regulations of the War Trade Board to get any goods. The Germans in Monterrey, for instance, knew of the "black list" almost immediately upon its preparation in Washington in October, 1917. The black list did not go into effect until December, so that in the two months previous to its operation the Germans imported tremendous quantities of all sorts of goods across our border to replenish their stocks. During the war they used either their own influence with the Mexicans or the knowledge of the black list they had obtained for the replenishment of their stocks steadily.

The result was that profiteering was rampant, and that the Mexicans as well as the foreigners of Monterrey paid tremendous prices for all drugs and hardware (the lines in which the Germans predominated), and that through that profiteering the Germans gained capital and a hold on the trade of Mexico which it will be almost impossible to break in years to come. The friendly foreigners and Mexican concerns did import some goods, but this was always subject to great delays and expensive losses. In the drug business, for instance, there were practically no firms except the Germans, who had large stocks, and in case of sickness, and especially during the influenza epidemic, the foreigners were forced to go to the German drug stores to get drugs and supplies. I have known personally of dozens of patriotic Americans who went to the back doors of German drug stores at night, in order to get a prescription filled, and to conceal their identity from critical persons. The same thing applied in the hardware business, and the stocks of American goods which the Germans had always handled, because American goods were always more popular with the Mexicans, were steadily replenished and the windows of these stores always carried fresh American goods at most astonishingly high prices. During the war the Black List was revised from time to time, and all Mexicans were always anxious to conciliate those in charge of the permits for importation of goods; but the ultimate result was never good, and the psychological attitude of the Mexicans toward Americans and American merchandise in Monterrey has suffered extremely through the operation of the Black List.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know of an individual who called himself Dr. Atl?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; I knew Dr. Atl personally in Paris in 1913, but I have not seen him since.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is his real name?

Mr. THOMPSON. Gerardo Murillo.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his connection with the Carranza revolution?

Mr. THOMPSON. He was in Paris during the Carranza revolution, posing as an artist, but actually the head of the Constitutional "junta" in Paris. It is said that he was personally responsible for the failure of the loan which Huerta tried to float in Europe in 1913. Carranza had announced that when he got to Mexico City he would repudiate that loan, and Dr. Atl, as the representative of the Constitutionalists in Paris, went to various members of the Paris Bourse, and finally got publicity in a prominent Paris newspaper of that report, and the immediate result was that the French bankers decided that they would not underwrite the Huerta loan. Dr. Atl later returned to Mexico and was made director of the National Academy of Fine Arts. He has always been known as a prominent Carrancista, and has always been classified as one of the so-called Bolsheviks. He was, I believe, in this country, in the early part of this year and was among those deported as an undesirable citizen under the espionage act, along with the Russians, Emma Goldman, etc.

MR. KEARFUL. Have you in your possession a letter written by Dr. Atl to a representative of Carranza in the United States from Paris?

MR. THOMPSON. Such a letter came into my possession about four months ago and interested me considerably, as it was written when I was seeing Dr. Atl in Paris and when, as I say, I knew him only as an artist.

MR. KEARFUL. Do you also have a translation of that letter?

MR. THOMPSON. I have a translation of that letter.

MR. KEARFUL. Do you object to placing it in the record?

MR. THOMPSON. No, sir.

MR. KEARFUL. The letter will be inserted as follows, the name of the person to whom the letter is addressed being omitted:

3 BIS BAGREUX STREET, PARIS.
CONSTITUTIONALIST JUNTA OF MEXICO.

Paris.

MY BELOVED: Your letter has been extremely gratifying to me because it brings me news of you and because I see you are battling for the revolution—for the eternal revolution, savior of the world. All my energies are for the revolution in Mexico, which I thus define:

Land and liberty.

Land and liberty for all.

The appointment by Citizen Carranza in selecting you seems to me very appropriate, and both of us—you and I—can be very useful if we get together in active interchange of ideas and documents. On my part I offer you our periodical now and hereafter; if you wish to make a serious study of Mexican affairs, I will publish it for you in some one of the most important reviews of Paris. In all the press I have good friends and we can make—we are making—an intelligent campaign in favor of Mexico.

When you have any interesting information and can send it by telegraph it will be very useful to us.

I translate the clippings you send. Once they are used, I shall return them to you.

At this very moment, in the Chamber of Deputies, an interpellation is being made on the loan. The minister of finance will not allow the bonds of the loan to be quoted on the exchange, and will not permit any operation to be officially made on said loan.

This, as you see, is decisive and constitutes a triumph, which is due to Diaz Lombardo, Alvarez Rul, and Lizardi.

The recognition of the belligerency of the revolutionaries would be desirable, for, as you say, the revolution would take an enormous impulse. Money and arms are what are lacking. Indeed, I believe so. If you could see the poverty through which we are passing here. Fortunately, I am better trained to get along as a buffoon than all the fakirs of the Ganges.

One here is entirely up to date as to the events that are transpiring in Mexico and as to the attitude of the United States.

I am very glad to deliver your good wishes to the committee in Paris, and I am happier still to shake your hand most fraternally.
And to read something worth while from you as soon as possible.
I call myself Atl and not Murillo.

PARIS, July 31, 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. In this letter Dr. Atl makes use of the slogan, more or less familiarly known in Mexico among the radical class of revolutionists, namely, "Land and liberty." What do you understand to be intended by that class when they use the slogan, "Land and liberty"?

Mr. THOMPSON. That phrase, apparently, interpreted in Mexico, both in the explanations by the orators and radical type and also by its operation, to mean land without payment, and the liberty to take what you want.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean the land that belongs to others should be taken and divided among the revolutionists, without payment, and the liberty of those who have not to take from those who have, without payment?

Mr. THOMPSON. These were certainly the promises which were made by the revolutionists to the Mexican people, and that promise was expressed by that slogan of "Land and Liberty."

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been your observation as to the carrying out of that slogan, according to that definition, as evidenced by the acts of the Carranza revolutionists?

Mr. THOMPSON. My observation has been that the land has been taken from those who had it and has been given to those who had not, but the favored section of the "have nots" has been the Carranza officials and generals, who I learned have obtained possession of many of the finest landed properties in Mexico, which they are operating for their own profit. In many cases they have had, as farm labor, soldiers of the army, the laborers being the same type of Mexicans to whom the promise of free land was held out. The only thing free, one might say, being the permission to labor upon these haciendas for the meager pay of a Mexican private soldier.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does that apply to the farms that have been bought and developed and built up as homes by American colonists in Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am so informed that that is the case in such sections as Tampico, but I have no personal knowledge of that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you understand to be meant by Dr. Atl, when he speaks in his letter of "the Eternal Revolution, savior of the world"?

Mr. THOMPSON. Dr. Atl is a radical, by his own statement and by his association with radicals in this country and in Europe and in Mexico. That letter was written, I believe, in 1913, and his identification of the Mexican revolution with the Eternal Revolution means, I believe, that he considers the Mexican revolution as a phase of the world revolution advocated by Lenin and Trotsky.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was on account of sentiments such as those that he was deported from this country as an undesirable alien?

Mr. THOMPSON. So I understand.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know a Mexican lawyer named Jorge Vera Estañol?

Mr. THOMPSON. I knew Mr. Vera Estañol slightly in Mexico, and I understand he is now living in Los Angeles. He was a man of great prominence as an educator and as a student of Mexican affairs. He was connected with the educational plans of Gen. Diaz, and was, I believe, minister of education under Madero. Amata

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he recognized as a man of integrity and high standing in Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not believe that any Mexican will deny that he ranked with the best of the intellectuals.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a letter written by him, expressing his opinion upon the Carranza régime?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have a copy of a letter which he wrote to a Mexican publication in the United States, speaking of the new constitution.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you submit that for the record?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. That may go into the record, as follows:

In one place it (the 1917 constitution) recognizes the existence of individual property and thus does not place all lands at the service of the community; and in another place all lands are declared potentially socializable, which depreciates their value, makes difficult any opportunities for operations which actually divide and subdivide it, and impedes the investment of capital in its development; a condition indispensable to its being cut up to small parcels, and agriculture remains stationary. When the most sanguine hope consists, in the case of expropriation, in receiving a paper depreciated 25 to 30 per cent below normal, of the nominal value of the property, it is not human to hope that the owner will put into it either work or protection or money. Thus, the régime is neither properly individualistic, because it does not contain serious guaranties of the private patrimony, nor is it communistic, because it does not place the real estate at the service of the community. It is essentially a régime of institutional despotism, since, under the guise of a constitutional system, it dedicates the program of thefts and robberies which have been carried out by the armed citizenry during the revolutionary period. And the "armed citizenry" (who are now called "public functionaries") have interpreted admirably the spirit of the political cabal.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the time you were in Mexico doing literary work, and acting as the vice consul at Monterrey, and since you left Mexico, have you been a student of Mexican history and of the Mexican problem as it now exists?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have devoted considerable attention to the Mexican problem in many of its phases, more particularly the social.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you formed a definite opinion that you care to state in regard to what you think ought to be done to solve the Mexican problem?

My experience in Monterrey led to a change in my ideas, and I then realized that intervention was a solution of the Mexican problem from the Mexican viewpoint. I remain convinced; however, that from our own viewpoint as Americans it was decidedly subject to serious doubts, first, because I did not believe that our people wished intervention in Mexico or to send an army there, and secondly, because I feared that an American occupation of Mexico would create a feeling against Americans which it might take years to eradicate. The Mexicans, however, with whom I talked in Monterrey convinced me that if occupation by the United States would have the form in which we occupied Cuba, that that danger of unfriendliness toward our people could very safely be discounted. I certainly think that intervention in Mexico would be a partial solution of the Mexican problem, particularly if such intervention is handled by men of the type whom we sent to Cuba and the Philippines, and there is no reason to believe that such men will not be available.

The only real objection to American intervention in Mexico is the cost in money and blood to this country, but a study of the Mexican problem from the United States in the recent months has convinced me that Mexico in her present state is a menace to our peace and to the solution of our own problem. As the situation is now developing, I believe we are very likely to be forced into intervention in Mexico by some such diplomatic impasse as forced us into the war in Europe, long after our entrance would have saved the situation at relatively little cost and without the after effects which have come from the long continuance of the European War. I believe now that if we had had a firm policy toward Mexico from 1910 on, as we had had a firm policy toward Diaz, that the Mexican problem would not now loom as an American problem. The only question in my mind regarding the manner of intervention is whether, if we prepare ourselves to go into Mexico, that very preparation would not settle Mexican affairs. The influence which the United States must exert in Mexico is moral, and if the time has passed when moral influence can be exerted in Mexico without physical force, then the time has come when we must use that physical force, but I am far from convinced that the moral stand might not even now do the work without war.

I may say that is my opinion, as the result of my observation of the Mexican situation and of the American attitude toward Mexico, that though we have almost lost the chance of impressing Mexico with the necessity of its being a civilized community, without our actually civilizing it, I still cling fondly to the hope that firmness may some day be tried before it is forced on us.

There will be an election in Mexico in July, and I am told by parties close to the administration that the White House is waiting upon the result of that election. Whether the election satisfies the White House or not, I fear that the apparent ignorance of the White House of actual conditions may lead to its support of a man even less desirable than Carranza. If the election means the beginning of a truly new régime in Mexico, I believe that we would not intervene, but if it has only the semblance of a new régime we will, in my opinion, drift rapidly toward intervention.

MR. KEARFUL. What kind of a new régime do you refer to?

Mr. THOMPSON. I refer to a régime which will be dominated more by the eternal logic of political economy as personified in intelligent Mexicans than by the peculiarly Mexican dogmatic conception personified by the radicals now in control.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean that element which is represented by the intellectual class now exiled from Mexico?

Mr. THOMPSON. I believe that the Mexican problem will be solved only by the cooperation of that class. I have given some attention to the social, and particularly the racial phase of Mexican history and politics, and I believe that it is true that to-day there are fewer men of European culture and race in Mexico than at any time since the Spaniards were driven out in 1821, or a brief period during the revolution previous to Diaz, when there was a similar exile of the higher type of Mexicans to this country. Diaz brought those men back to help him solve his problems, and it was through their aid, and chiefly through their aid, that he was able to build up a modern State in Mexico. Whatever is the outcome of the Mexican election, or the outcome of the American intervention which may be forced as the result of that election, these men who to-day are living in penury in the United States must be taken back to Mexico and must become an integral part of the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. These men are living not only in the United States, but in other parts of the world, are they not?

Mr. THOMPSON. They are.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further, Mr. Thompson, you care to state that you have not already covered?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

(Witness excused.)

(Thereupon at 12.30 o'clock p. m. the committee adjourned.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 24, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., March 24, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF WILEY KING.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. You may state your full name.

Mr. KING. Wiley King.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. KING. I live near Chickasha, Okla.; my address is Chickasha.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you born?

Mr. KING. State of Missouri.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long were you in Mexico?

Mr. KING. I don't know whether I can remember the exact time or not. I think I went there in November, 1903, in the fall of 1903, and I left there in October, 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your business in Mexico?

Mr. KING. Farming and stock raising.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what place?

Mr. KING. At the Atascador hacienda, in the State of Vera Cruz, district of Valles.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far is that place from Tampico?

Mr. KING. How far is it from Tampico?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. KING. Some 65 miles, I believe, is the distance.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was this place called Atascador a colony of Americans?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. About how many Americans were located there?

Mr. KING. I never did know exactly. There were something in the neighborhood of a little over 100, I think, families and single persons together.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was their business the same as yours?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many acres of ground did you have?

Mr. KING. Four hundred and twenty-five.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you get it?

Mr. KING. I purchased it from a New York company, E. H. Campbell & Co. At the time he had a business enterprise in Tampico, grading and building sewer systems in Tampico, grading streets, etc.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did these American families that you speak of own small tracts similar to yours?

Mr. KING. Some owned less and some owned a good deal more; some of them owned as much as I did and some went up as high as 5,000 acres.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much did you have in cultivation?

Mr. KING. About 100 acres.

Mr. KEARFUL. What improvements did you have?

Mr. KING. I had it all fenced and cross fenced into three different fields and in pasture. I had a house, a barn, and a well, and a windmill, and such like as that on the place.

Mr. KEARFUL. Workshop?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Farming implements?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; and cattle.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you raise cattle?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; I raised cattle.

Mr. KEARFUL. What agricultural products did you raise?

Mr. KING. I raised beans and corn, principally.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of a country was that place when you and your neighbors went there?

Mr. KING. Well, it had been a large stock ranch. There was 192,000 acres in the ranch. It had been purchased by this New York company, E. H. Campbell & Co., and was held by them without any Americans at all on it, or anybody, except probably a family or two of Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had it been improved in any way?

Mr. KING. No, sir; it was not improved, except just a few ranch houses where they stayed to herd cattle.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the colonists have a school?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they maintain it themselves?

Mr. KING. They maintained the school themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without any aid from the Mexicans?

Mr. KING. We never got any aid whatever from the Mexican authorities for the school.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you happen to go to Mexico?

Mr. KING. There were some solicitors in Chickasha who had gone down there and gone onto that tract of land, and got up a contract with Campbell to purchase and colonize it, and they got to advertising it and I went down then.

Mr. KEARFUL. You went down to look at it?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And found there was a good opportunity there?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. For a home?

Mr. KING. For a home.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you find conditions at the time you went there, as to security for life and property?

Mr. KING. Well, it proved to be good up to the revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your first troubles begin?

Mr. KING. Our first troubles begun, I think, it was when—the real troubles, there might have been some minor troubles—when the Americans entered Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. What kind of people were these colonists?

Mr. KING. They were the farming class of people, very honest, and enterprising, as a rule.

Mr. KEARFUL. People of good character?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they own their places?

Mr. KING. They owned their places.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they pay their taxes and their debts, and abide by the laws of the country?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did the inhabitants of that settlement compare with the inhabitants of agricultural settlements in this country?

Mr. KING. I think, speaking of my own country in Oklahoma, they compared a little above. They all owned their own property, and they were independent from one another.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were you treated by the Mexicans when you went there, and for some years afterward?

Mr. KING. We were treated well. There was one man, Mr. Pablo Rodriquez, had a large ranch right adjoining us, and he instructed his people to be good to us, the people he had working for him on his ranch, and they all treated us pretty well. That was the ranch right close to us.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did the Americans treat the Mexicans?

Mr. KING. They treated them very nicely, as far as I ever heard. I never heard of any abuses at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they always friendly and on good terms with the Mexicans?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say your first troubles began about the time of the landing of the American forces in Vera Cruz? Were there any outrages committed prior to that time?

Mr. KING. Now, I believe there were. I believe the outrages committed on the Gourd tract were before that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you explain what that was?

Mr. KING. Well, they roped Mr. Gourd, and threw the rope over a mesquite tree and held him up, while some of the others committed outrages on the girls.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he a member of the Atascador Colony?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; adjoining my farm.

Mr. KEARFUL. What efforts were made to capture the perpetrators of that outrage?

Mr. KING. Mr. Gourd and the two girls came to my house immediately after that happened, that night, and came and told me what had happened, and I remarked, "My God." I sent my boys and a Mexican to Coco after the Huerta soldiers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the soldiers come?

Mr. KING. No, sir; they said they didn't have any orders to leave the station, and couldn't come without orders.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the men who committed that outrage afterwards caught?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; those same soldiers, through the efforts of the governor and the American consul, kept making inquiries, and they wanted me to name the ones we thought had committed the outrage. I named the Javala family and one other Mexican, I forget his name, and told the boys to tell that captain at Coco to arrest those fellows and make them talk, and I thought they would get the facts in the case. They did so, and they succeeded in capturing 9 men.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they do with them?

Mr. KING. It was reported they had executed 8 out of the 9.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was in the time of Huerta was it?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any perpetrators of outrages being captured and executed after the Carranza officers got into control?

Mr. KING. I never heard of one.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened at the time of the landing of the American forces at Vera Cruz?

Mr. KING. Well, at the landing of the American forces at Vera Cruz we had to go into the jungle. We were ordered out. We didn't know very much what had happened, but after we got out we learned there had been a bunch of Huertistas come out to kill us, and they did quite a bit of robbing of the American people there on the ranches, who were there.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say you did not leave the country?

Mr. KING. No, sir; I did not leave the country; I went into the jungle and built a camp there.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long did you stay at the camp?

Mr. KING. If my memory serves me right, it was 22 days.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the other colonists leave the colony and go into the jungle?

Mr. KING. A few of the Chimal people went into the jungle, and I think also at San Dieguito, but the most of the American people had all left the colony at that time. They were ordered out before that. They left at the time of the entry into Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. By whom were they ordered out?

Mr. KING. They were ordered out, I believe, by Mr. Wilson at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. By the American authorities?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; by the American authorities.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason you and your associates did not obey that order and leave the country?

Mr. KING. What we had was there in Mexico, and we realized if we left it that we would be broke up, you know, and not have anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the treatment that you received from your Mexican friends in the locality?

Mr. KING. Well, they were friendly. Our friends there in the locality remained friendly all through, were friendly when I left.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they offer to give you protection in case of any trouble that happened?

Mr. KING. I did not receive any protection from them.

Mr. KEARFUL. And after 22 days you went back to the farm?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find had happened while you were gone?

Mr. KING. I found they had destroyed a lot of goods left in the house, and had taken away quite a bit of it. They had taken, I presume, something like 75 fanegas of corn, and about 40 fanegas of beans. They had killed at that time nine head of fat hogs and had taken them away, and all my chickens—about 125 hens, I would say—and killed, I believe it was, two head of cattle.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the place generally looted or not?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. My place and Mr. Horndike's was right where the road entered the ranch from the station at Coco, and that is where the Huerta soldiers were stationed at that time, and they had come out most every day and carried off some things, you know, from my place and Mr. Horndike's, and visited other places, other parts of the ranch, but not so much, because we were the closest.

Mr. KEARFUL. They took the things that were most convenient?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; and most necessary for their use.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you apply to the Huerta authorities for protection?

Mr. KING. No, sir. We was afraid of the Huerta authorities at that time. We didn't go about them at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened then subsequently, after your return to your place?

Mr. KING. Well, as I remember, we had a reign of quiet then for a while. After the Huertistas departed the Carrancistas seemed to take control, and we had a little ease for a while, and they treated us very well then.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your next troubles begin?

Mr. KING. Those are hard dates for me to remember, just when certain things happened.

Mr. KEARFUL. With reference to some event. Do you remember when the Pershing expedition occurred in 1916?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. We had to go to the jungle again when the Pershing expedition occurred.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you ordered out again by the American authorities?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; we were ordered out again by the American consul, but received the notification a little late, but we went to the jungle again. We lost property again at that time, but we didn't have so much to lose then.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you return to the farm again?

Mr. KING. After about 28 days.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened from then on?

Mr. KING. Well, that was just the beginning like of these murders, after we came back this time, but I can't give the dates. I believe the first was when the Villistas came into the country after that. They came in after the Carranza soldiers at the time they held the siege of Ebano.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was before the Pershing expedition, was it not?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; that was before the Pershing expedition. I have got that a little tangled. That was before the Pershing expedition.

Mr. KEARFUL. That would be in 1915?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. However, at the siege of Ebano there were two families, Mr. Bird and Mr. Sigler, who had gone to robbing the Americans and some of the Mexicans, taking some of the Mexican property. Those Huertistas got a report some way, and they came in and robbed a few Americans; among the Americans a man named Lincoln Weder, one that was later killed.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say the Huertistas did that?

Mr. KING. No, sir; the Villistas. They took Mr. Dunheim and Mr. Limerfall, two Germans, Mr. Morehead and my boy, and took them over to another place there. Then they made a dash on Mr. Bird's place, and went in and carried him away and killed him the next day; killed him without trial. They had notified the Americans to appear, but when they got there they had already executed Bird.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any stealing of cattle at that time by Mexicans?

Mr. KING. No, sir; I don't think the Mexicans had ever begun to take any cattle from the ranches at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any cattle stolen after that by the Mexicans?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. That is when the cattle stealing began, after that occurred.

Mr. KEARFUL. After the Carrancistas came into control?

Mr. KING. After the Carrancistas took control. They had a general staff at the place about 14 miles below on the river. They got to stealing cattle and taking them down there, and they would sell them to Manuel Lerdo. There were three of those people. There was Manuel Lerdo and Napolea Lerdo, brothers, and Pedro Cenobia; he was their brother-in-law. They got the stuff that was being taken down from the American colony there.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say these were Carranza officers?

Mr. KING. There was a Carranza general, and a colonel and a major. The first two named was the general and colonel, and the last named was a major.

Mr. KEARFUL. As I understood you, these Carranza military officers were buying cattle that were stolen from the colonists?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was any effort made by the colonists to get their cattle back or to prevent their being stolen?

Mr. KING. Lincoln Weder went down, after we had heard reports that they were stealing the cattle from some other Mexican peons there, Lincoln Weder went down to investigate, and found some of the cattle there in the corral, and he protested against it, and he came back home. They told him they would pay something for it, but I don't think they ever did. He came back home, and that night there were some parties went down, but they failed to catch them. The report followed then that the next Americans that came there and raised a disturbance probably would fail to ever get home.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Weder go back?

Mr. KING. That information came out a few days after I left Mexico. A few days after I came out Weder went back down there to protest again against the stealing, and they followed him out and killed him before he got home. That is when he was killed. That is according to the information from my youngest son, and was reported to be on the 24th of October, two years ago last October.

Mr. KEARFUL. 1917?

Mr. KING. 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. What live stock was taken from your place?

Mr. KING. I lost horses and mules and cattle and hogs, and we lost a lot of poultry.

Mr. KEARFUL. About how many cattle did you lose?

Mr. KING. About 25 head.

Mr. KEARFUL. And about how many horses and mules?

Mr. KING. About the same, 25 head, something near that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ascertain who the parties were who took the stock?

Mr. KING. The first that we lost was during Gen. Aguilar's term. They took two horses and dragged my son from one of the horses and punched him in the back with a gun, after he told them he would go with them to the general and get the stock back. They dragged him from the horse and punched him in the back with a gun, and sent him back home, and took the horses on. The next property we lost, that we knew who got the stuff, was a bunch of five Pelaez men that went through the country. They got seven head of horses and mules. The next bunch they got was just after I came out, they got five head more, supposed to be Carrancistas. We got one mule back after that. That was some of the Carranza faction.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get any protection from the Carranza general against that stealing?

Mr. KING. Not a bit in the world. He seemed to be trying to get the stuff out, and would give a little for it to those men that would bring it in.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the Carranza generals were in collusion with the bandits?

Mr. KING. I think so, from what one Mexican that bore down on us with a gun as we came out—from what he said. He said that he was afraid of the Americans. I told him he needn't be afraid of the Americans; that they had not harmed anybody and would not harm them. He said he was afraid of them, and told the officers at this town down on the river that he was afraid of them, and he said the officer told him, "Can't you protect yourself? Haven't you got a gun?" At that time they had two Winchesters, and one man had a rope down, as though he intended to rope us.

Mr. KEARFUL. These were bandits, were they?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they told you about that conversation they had with the Carranza general?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. These were the same parties that had been stealing the cattle.

Mr. KEARFUL. And these cattle were turned over to the Carranza general?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; turned over to these three officers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any Germans located in that particular place?

Mr. KING. There was just two German families there.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were they treated?

Mr. KING. They were treated very nicely.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were not robbed or run out of the country?

Mr. KING. I never heard of their ever being robbed of one cent, and they were there when we left.

Mr. KEARFUL. They are still there, as far as you know?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the American citizens who were members of that colony?

Mr. KING. They are scattered throughout the States, where their former homes were.

Mr. KEARFUL. None of them are there now?

Mr. KING. None of them are there at all on the ranch. I think there are a few in the district of Tampico in the oil fields.

Mr. KEARFUL. Working in the oil fields?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did many of these people have all they had in the world on these places?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that the rule?

Mr. KING. As far as I could see, all the people that were there on the ranch had all their effects generally with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What protection was ever given to any of these American citizens by the American Government?

Mr. KING. The only protection they ever got, any of them, was the American Government did help some of them to leave the country. They had to go away and leave their property, and many of them that had considerable means sometimes didn't have much money on hand, and they didn't have time to sell or dispose of anything to get money. They had to get out and go.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether any of them ever made any complaint to Washington authorities about the way they had been treated in Mexico?

Mr. KING. There were no protests made only through the American consul. I suppose he made protests against the way the Americans were treated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the American consul at that time?

Mr. KING. Clarence A. Miller.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did he say to you about affording protection?

Mr. KING. Well, he didn't advise anything, only to make a list of it and turn it into the Secretary of State, I believe it was at Washington, D. C.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that done?

Mr. KING. By a good many. I never turned in a list, from the fact that we were losing right along, and I was advised by this last consul—

Mr. KEARFUL. Dawson?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; Dawson. I was advised to wait until later and then turn in the list altogether when we had seen what we had lost.

Mr. KEARFUL. What advice did you receive from the American consul as to what you should do at any time?

Mr. KING. I didn't receive any.

Mr. KEARFUL. He did advise you to get out of the country, did he not?

Mr. KING. Oh, yes; we were notified to leave the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you or any of your neighbors have any concessions that gave you special privileges over anybody else?

Mr. KING. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You bought your land and paid for it?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And got your title?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And paid your taxes?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were not engaged in exploiting the Mexican peons, were you?

Mr. KING. No, sir; we weren't employed by any of the Mexicans. We employed the peons; we worked them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that beneficial to them, or otherwise?

Mr. KING. Sure it was. It was their only way of subsisting, to get work from some one.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the American enterprises have on their condition?

Mr. KING. It seemed to have a wonderful effect. It got them to wearing good clothes and good shoes and good American hats, in many instances; not altogether, but in many instances.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they have a feeling of gratitude toward the Americans?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. I had one Mexican that worked for me about six years. He often told me how he used to have to work for very small wages, and how he had to live, and said if I ever came back to the United States he was going to come with me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that illustrative of the improvement of the Mexicans generally, on account of American enterprises?

Mr. KING. I think so. I think the Mexicans that were employed by the Americans were generally satisfied.

Mr. KEARFUL. What kind of people were these Mexican workmen generally? Were they quarrelsome and hard to get along with or not?

Mr. KING. No, sir; not in their natural moods, they were not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they peaceful and industrious?

Mr. KING. Very peaceful and industrious; yes; fairly industrious, when they were hired to work. They were an inoffensive kind of people. That is, the under class, you know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they impulsive and easily aroused to action?

Mr. KING. We didn't have any trouble along that line. We never had any trouble with the men we were working with. We never had any trouble in getting along with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were these people that worked for you revolutionists?

Mr. KING. No; we didn't have anything to do with the revolutionist faction in the way of labor.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did they come from?

Mr. KING. They were a class that were picked up through the country. Perhaps some were a class of laborers, you know, that had been laboring, maybe some of them for American people. When the Carrancistas were at my place one time some of them said they had worked for the Americans. They never gave us any trouble then; those fellows didn't.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those that worked for the Americans thought well of the Americans, did they?

Mr. KING. They thought well of the Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did the leaders of the revolution come from?

Mr. KING. I would say the leaders came from the middle or upper class, mostly.

Mr. KEARFUL. What part of the country did they come from?

Mr. KING. They generally came from the cities; people who were educated a little bit.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they come from the north of Mexico?

Mr. KING. No; they come from anywhere in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What information have you as to murders of Americans in that locality, besides the ones you have mentioned?

Mr. KING. Besides the ones I have mentioned here this morning?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. KING. There was Weder, that they followed out and killed; and there was L. A. Dunn, that was killed down near Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about the killing of L. A. Dunn?

Mr. KING. I don't know anything about it, only what I have heard, that he was a bookkeeper for the Mexican Gulf Oil Co., and they had a pay roll of $10,000, and those bandits came in there and robbed them, and then some one in the camp blew a whistle, and they turned on the Americans then and killed some of them. My information is they killed Dunn and three others, and one Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. From whom did you get that report?

Mr. KING. The report came from my son, who was at that time in Tampico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your son was there at the time?

Mr. KING. He was in Tampico at the time. He saw Mr. Dunn before he died.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other murders do you know about?

Mr. KING. The Franklin murder, I just heard a report of that. Franklin was one of my neighbors.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Dunn also one of your neighbors?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; the Dunn family lived in three miles of me; mighty nice people. There was another killing that I heard of. There was one man named Pilgrim that was waylaid and killed at Chimal. I have no details other than that he was waylaid and killed there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that another American colonist?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that same vicinity?

Mr. KING. Some 75 miles from ours.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what has happened to the Chimal colony?

Mr. KING. Pretty much. I saw some of the Chimal people quite often. They went out on the first order. They have pretty much left. A few stayed with their stock, and later, when this man Pilgrim was killed and they lost some property, they mostly sold out and all got away. They were all gone but about three, I believe, the last I heard.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any information generally about various other colonies of Americans in that region?

Mr. KING. I had a small amount of information from San Dieguito. The people generally had left up there, and one man told me they had 900 head of cattle, and when they went to get them, he said: "We got 300 and they got 600." That was Mr. Jones, of the Jones-Cowan Stock Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were these colonists, according to your information, pretty much the same as the Atascador colonists?

Mr. KING. Pretty much. They were ordered to get out. There was another place where the people had to leave. It wasn't so much a colony. There were two or three families there. They were south and west of us on the river, a family named Ogden that had quite a lot of property there. This man Manuel Lerdo would go there and get things, and just give them a receipt for it, and his wife got tired of it and tore up one of the receipts and threw it down, and it made him mad and he made threats against them, and they had to get up and leave; left everything they had.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the condition of those farms now?

Mr. KING. They are growing up again with brush. There is lots of land that has been cleared up that is going back into brush again. The houses were stolen, or carried away piece by piece, for the lumber and iron that was used in building them.

Mr. KEARFUL. None of the land is being cultivated now?

Mr. KING. I don't think but a very little. We left a man on our place, and the boys made a trip back there and the oldest wrote me he thought the old man would starve out. He stated he was not doing very much. He said I wouldn't know the place if I would see it.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you account for the fact that the Germans were not molested.

Mr. KING. Well, the Germans kind of stood in with them. During the period of this European war they talked to the Mexicans, so we understood, and told them if the United States ever fought Mexico they would fight with the Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was a fact, though, that Germans living in the colony were not molested, but were well treated and are still there?

Mr. KING. They were well treated, and were still there when I left.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have never gone personally to the State Department to get information about what you should do or what protection you might receive?

Mr. KING. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did any of your friends go there for that purpose?

Mr. KING. Not as I know of. As far as I know, all of our people who have had any information at all was by the advice of the consul.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling in regard to receiving protection from the American Government?

Mr. KING. The feeling in Mexico?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. KING. It really was rather high against the United States for not protecting them.

Mr. KEARFUL. When you and your neighbors went to Mexico to make your home in that settlement, was there any intimation from anybody that you would not receive protection in case you were persecuted?

Mr. KING. No, sir. We thought, on the other hand, that we would be protected.

Mr. KEARFUL. What made you think that?

Mr. KING. We thought the United States would protect its people anywhere. I don't know really how we came to that idea, but that was the general opinion, that they would be protected anywhere.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your opinion now in regard to that?

Mr. KING. My opinion now is quite the reverse, that they have not been protected.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you ever been to Washington before?

Mr. KING. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. There is a new Secretary of State who just took office yesterday. It might be worth your while to go and see him and ask him what his attitude is.

Is there anything further, Mr. King, that has not been covered, that you would like to state?

Mr. KING. I don't think of anything at the present, no sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. If you should decide to call upon the new Secretary of State, the committee would be glad to have you return and give an account of your experience.

Mr. KING. I hardly think I will call on him to-day. I am in a hurry to get back home. I suppose he will learn all the information that is being received at that office, and will do his duty. I hope so, anyway.

Mr. KEARFUL. I am very much obliged to you.

Mr. KING. Thank you.

(Whereupon, at 11 o'clock a. m., the committee adjourned.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., March 26, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM C. GARRETT.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live at present?

Mr. GARRETT. I live at Tulsa, Okla.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Mr. GARRETT. I am assistant superintendent in the Cosden Refinery.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the Cosden Oil Co.?

Mr. GARRETT. The Cosden Oil Co.; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you born?

Mr. GARRETT. I was born in the suburbs of London, England.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you an American citizen or a British subject?

Mr. GARRETT. I am an American citizen.

Mr. KEARFUL. By naturalization?

Mr. GARRETT. By naturalization.

Mr. KEARFUL. When were you in Mexico?

Mr. GARRETT. I went down there first of all in 1912.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long did you remain?

Mr. GARRETT. I was there until 1918, off and on. I had to leave there on different occasions.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee is informed by numerous American citizens who have been robbed and driven out of Mexico, and who appealed to Secretary Bryan for relief, that Mr. Bryan's favorite question to them was, "Why did you go to Mexico?" I ask you, why did you go to Mexico?

Mr. GARRETT. I went there because I had assurances from the Government that if I went down there my investments would be protected, and Mr. Bryan personally himself wrote an article in "The Commoner" advising people to go down there, and I went down there with the intention of staying there and being a law-abiding citizen and helping develop the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you do when you went to Mexico?

Mr. GARRETT. I purchased land and hired a number of men, cleared the land, and planted henequen.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what part of Mexico did you purchase this land?

Mr. GARRETT. About 12 miles north of Victoria, on the railroad.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many acres?

Mr. GARRETT. I purchased 440 acres of land. I planted some of it to fiber, and besides that I contracted to plant 200 acres of other products.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much money did you invest in this property?

Mr. GARRETT. I invested altogether when I was down there about $40,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you representing a corporation?

Mr. GARRETT. No; I was not. I went down there and purchased this land in my own name, and interested other parties to invest money with me in the venture, but there was no corporation, no articles signed in any way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you control and manage the enterprise yourself?

Mr. GARRETT. I controlled the whole thing myself; absolutely.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any concessions or special privileges from the Mexican Government?

Mr. GARRETT. Nothing whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you always pay your taxes and abide by the laws?

Mr. GARRETT. I always paid my taxes, kept my taxes paid up, and never had any trouble whatever with reference to any legal matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe the enterprise of henequen farming with reference to what has to be done, and how long it takes for the plants to mature, and how soon you can hope to get a profit, etc.

Mr. GARRETT. In planting henequen, first of all I had the land all cleared and a portion of it grubbed. I then purchased from a hacienda that was about 16 miles from where I was small plants, the suckers from the larger plants, and I had those brought in the Mexican carts to my plantation, and later I purchased my own carts and hauled them myself. We used oxen to haul these loads, and these plants were planted a thousand to the acre, and the land was taken care of, the brush was kept cut down, and the plants cost me 2½ cents apiece in American money.

Mr. KEARFUL. Besides the labor of planting?

Mr. GARRETT. Besides the labor of planting them and hauling them and taking care of them afterwards. It took them six years before they grew and were ready to cut.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you do the planting?

Mr. GARRETT. I did most of the planting—well, I began in 1913 and 1914. Of course, it took some time to plant that amount of land.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then the plants had not matured when you left there?

Mr. GARRETT. A great number of them were ready to cut. Some 600 acres of them were all ready—should have been ready—to cut.

Mr. KEARFUL. You planted the entire 600 acres?

Mr. GARRETT. I planted about 570 acres altogether.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have the place equipped for living and working?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I built a frame house there, and I had built a number of houses on the plantation for the workmen to live there, especially my foreman, and I was well equipped with horses and oxen and utensils necessary for the work.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the condition of that henequen farm now?

Mr. GARRETT. It has been utterly destroyed. In the fall of 1917 and the spring of 1918 a large quantity of this fiber was ready to cut, and the fiber went up in price. It went up from 6 cents to 20 cents a pound. The consequence was that the people around could come and could work this fiber out by hand and make good wages at it. They would come in at night and cut the heart out of the plant, thus destroying it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the particular idea about cutting the heart out?

Mr. GARRETT. They could get whiter and finer fiber. Those who owned the plantations would never think of cutting that portion of the plant, but these men who came in there would bring their burros in at night and would come in by the dozens, a dozen of them at a time; and I made complaints to the authorities at Victoria and other towns close by and could get no redress whatever, no assistance in any way.

Mr. KEARFUL. In 1912, when you went there, Madero was in power?

Mr. GARRETT. He was in power; yes, sir. No; Huerta was in power.

Mr. KEARFUL. No; Huerta came in in February of 1913.

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, I beg your pardon; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your troubles first begin, and what were they?

Mr. GARRETT. The troubles began in 1913, when there was a great deal of talk about the revolution and bands of robbers began to start up over the country and would come and demand from you your horses and anything that they thought they wanted.

Mr. KEARFUL. The revolution that you mention was the Carranza revolution against Huerta?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; but I had to get out, first of all—they destroyed the railroad from Monterrey to Tampico first of all in 1914. That was when the railroad was first destroyed, and my wife and daughter and myself had to leave the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that about the time of the landing of the American forces at Vera Cruz?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; about that time. There was a great deal of feeling at that time against Americans, and it was very strongly expressed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you leave at that time?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I came out.

Mr. KEARFUL. And subsequently returned?

Mr. GARRETT. And subsequently returned. I returned about six months afterwards, somewhere about five or six months afterwards.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you then go on with your work on the farm?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I went on planting and clearing.

Mr. KEARFUL. And caring for your crop?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; and caring for the crop.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe in detail in your own way just what troubles you had and the outrages that were visited upon you, and by whom?

Mr. GARRETT. The outrages were so frequent, the demands for horses, and the number of times that brigands or rebels would come onto the plantation to demand whatever they wanted were so frequent that it began to be quite a common occurrence.

Upon one accasion my wife was there during the fall, and three soldiers came down there and rode in and demanded something to eat. We gave them some food. They then wanted to know whether I had any money or jewels or anything valuable, and I told them no, and they said that they would come in in the night and find out. They wanted to know also who was my foreman, and he was standing around there close by, and one of them said to him that if they found him they would hang him, because he was working for a foreigner. We kept quiet, and they went off, and the men who were around me said to me: "Those are bad men. You had better get away;" and so we all went out, the foreman, my wife, and I and two other men, into the timber and hid all night; slept there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they visit you in the night?

Mr. GARRETT. In the evening these men came back, shortly after dark, and we could hear them hammering on the door. I had not locked the door because I had expected that they would break the door open anyway, but they did not enter. They could not find any of us after pounding at the door, so they rode up to my foreman's house where his wife was and asked where we were, and she would not tell them. They threatened to assault her if she did not, but she still refused to say where we were, and they went back and fired some shots through the house; they broke the windows and set fire to the curtain of the house, and it flashed up to the ceiling. After staying around there for probably a couple of hours—I would not like to say how long it was, but it seemed a precious long time—and firing shots in every direction, they went off.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who were these parties? Do you know?

Mr. GARRETT. They were two soldiers of the Carranza army.

I went down the next morning and saw the governor of the State, Luis Caballero, and made a complaint to him about it, and he said what could he do? He did not know who they were. I told him that I could recognize the men if, when he had his roll call, he would have them lined up at the barracks, and he replied, oh, he could not do that. That was one occasion.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other personal experience did you have with them?

Mr. GARRETT. On several occasions they would ride up there and demand horses at the point of a rifle, and I would have to let them take them; but I had two special horses that my wife and I rode that we clung to for a long time. They would come around there, and I would drive the horses into the corral and put up the bars and go and sit on them and tell them to go, but when I was away one time they came and took them and left us absolutely afoot. They took all the horses and mules that I had.

The last experience that I had was the worst. It was at the time of the rebellion that Luis Caballero raised against Carranza in the early spring of 1918. The soldiers came out from Victoria and marched past my plantation to the north, where they were met by the government troops, and a fight occurred in which a great number of them were killed. In fact, I understood it was such a mix-up that they did not know which were which, and every man was shooting at the first one he could see.

During this time I went and hid in the brush. One or two men who had come out from Victoria and had felt that they did not want to join the rebels, who were false to them, came onto the plantation, and, knowing some of the men that worked for me, told them that they would like to hide there. One of them took his saddle off and put it on the porch of my house and turned his horse loose, leaving his cartridges in a bag on his saddle. I was not aware that the man was there or that his saddle had been placed where it was.

About sundown my men came to me and said that the fight was over and that it was perfectly safe for me to come back; that everyone had gone; so I returned to the house, and was sitting on the front porch, and in a few moments I heard some shooting at the gate and trampling of horses, and I turned to make for the brush. Then I heard a rifle shot, and I looked around and found one of the men was riding toward me, so I stopped and asked him what he wanted, and he told me that the captain wanted to see me. I went up to the captain and asked him what he wanted. He was on his horse, flourishing his revolver, shooting it at the same time; and with a flourish he said, "Give me $5,000." I said that I did not have any money there; that it would be foolish for me to keep so much money on the plantation; and he said, "Give me $5,000," at the same time striking me on the side of the face with his revolver and shooting it off. He knocked me down insensible, and when I came to I found that they were ransacking the house, taking everything they wanted, breaking open my trunks, and had tied my Chinaman up there to the house, and he was begging and imploring them to leave him alone, and he gave them all the money that he had. Then they let him loose and told him to cook them something to eat.

After they had finished they came to me, drew their sabers, and pounded me all over, telling me to get up. They put their revolvers at my head and said, "Now, I am going to kill you, you damned gringo." I staggered to my feet, and they said, "Now, give me what money you have," so I told them that I had a little money that I kept for the pay roll next Saturday, and that I would let them have that.

I had about 120 pesos, partly in American and partly in Mexican money. At that time American silver was current in Mexico just the same as Mexican money. I also had about $40 in paper money. I had given this to one of my men in the morning to take care of, thinking that if trouble occurred it would be safer with him than with me; so I told them that I had some money that I would give them. They jumped on their horses, all of them, saying, "It is mine! It is mine! It is mine!" and, with their horses and swords, they pushed forward to this house where the man had the money. I went to him, and he brought it out, and I handed them the sack of silver and dropped the pocketbook with the paper money on the ground and kicked it in the grass. Then the captain said, "Give me $1,500 more." I said, "No; that is all the money you will get. That is all the money I have." He said, "Well, we will find out." So they drove me back to the house, where there was a large tree, and they put a rope around my neck and pulled me off the ground twice.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you give them any more money?

Mr. GARRETT. No. Then they asked me about the saddle, and they seemed to be under the impression that this man had come and sold me the saddle, and so they made a great fuss about it. I told them that I had not seen it before; I knew nothing about it; but they had broken open my trunks; so they went and took all my books, my accounts, and brought them all out and put them under the saddle, took some kerosene and soaked the whole thing, and gave me matches and said: "Now set it on fire." I had no compunctions whatever about burning up their own saddle, but I did regret burning up all my accounts.

When I was assaulted by these men, the man that left the saddle was hiding under the table in my kitchen, and he told me that the captain was Capt. Quilentan, and the other officer was Lieut. Uribe. He gave me those two names. He said he knew them both.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that your final experience in Mexico?

Mr. GARRETT. At that time my men who had seen me knocked down had run away to the brush and gone down to Victoria, where they told my friend, Mr. Robert S. Tice, who was the superintendent of the Quaker school at Victoria at the time, that they had seen me killed; and having this corroborated frequently, he went down and sent a telegram to my wife to that effect, but very fortunately the telegraph wires were all cut, and the telegram did not go through. After that, I left on the first train that left Victoria for Laredo, and came out, reporting the matter to the authorities at Matamoros.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far were you from Victoria?

Mr. GARRETT. I was between 12 and 13 miles north of Victoria, at the first station, Caballero.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you there when Gen. Pablo Gonzalez, under Carranza, took the city of Victoria?

Mr. GARRETT. I was in Victoria when Pablo Gonzalez took it for Carranza, and on one occasion when conditions got so bad in Mexico that it was advisable to leave I had thought that it was just a temporary affair, and that matters would settle down, and I got options on a quantity of land and went over to London and arranged for the purchase of this land, the money to be placed in the bank in New York against the deeds. I returned to this country to find that conditions, instead of improving, had gotten considerably worse. After great difficulties I succeeded in getting to Tampico by boat, and went up country to find that the men who had given me the options had been obliged to leave the country. After waiting there for two or three days the town was attacked by Carranza's men under Gen. Gonzalez, and I was in the town when it was taken by this general.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know John Lind, who was sent to Mexico by President Wilson to eliminate Huerta?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, yes. I met him at Rancho Victoria, close to Hincotinceo.

Mr. KEARFUL. After John Lind's return from Mexico, he wrote a book about Mexico.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you read it?

Mr. GARRETT. No; I did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that book he lauded the motives and acts of the revolutionists under Carranza, and he stated, among other things, that the restraint shown by the victorious Carranza armies upon entering the cities that they captured was creditable and encouraging. What can you say about the acts of Gen. Pablo Gonzalez when he entered Victoria, and his victorious army, as to their being creditable and encouraging?

Mr. GARRETT. Gen. Gonzalez treated me with the greatest amount of courtesy. When I went to see him and asked him for a permit to leave the country, a pass to go through, he referred me to his secretary, who, I noticed, was a Mason; and, catching sight of my Masonic badge, he put out his hand, saying: "What can I do for you, senor?" and offered to do anything in his power to help us. We obtained passes that were very firm in their expression that we should be protected, and nine of us rode from Victoria to Matamoros, and while on the way we received the greatest amount of courtesy, with the exception of one experience that we had with one drunken Mexican, who came upon us accidentally in the brush at night and was going to shoot us all.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the acts of the followers of Pablo Gonzalez when Victoria was taken? What happened to Victoria?

Mr. GARRETT. They looted the town, and especially the business of those men who were loyal to the Government, the old Government, and especially the Spaniards. There were two or three Spaniards. One of them was Senor Quintana.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say Victoria was looted. What happened to it? What looting occurred?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, they broke open the large stores and the banks; they took all the property out and distributed it among the people, broke open the safes in the banks, burned the jail and the courthouse. All the records were burned at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not regard those actions very creditable and encouraging, did you?

Mr. GARRETT. Not by any means; no. But I think it was a matter almost beyond the control of Pablo Gonzalez. I think that the men took the matter into their own hands.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a talk with John Lind when you met him in Mexico about the situation?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, just a little. I do not recollect at the time what it was. I just happened to meet him at a ranch.

Mr. KEARFUL. He did not expound to you any of his theories about what should be done in Mexico?

Mr. GARRETT. No; he did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you appeal to the Mexican authorities for relief against the robberies and outrages committed on you and your property?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, frequently. I would go down to Luis Caballero, who was the governor of the State of Tamaulipas, and I could get no assistance whatever from him. He would utterly ignore it. I went there on one occasion to the governor's palace and waited two days before I could get any audience with him. I sent in my card, and told him that I would like to have an interview with him to complain about the way in which I was treated and in which these roving bands of soldiers would come out to my place and would come in and demand anything, and would come and live upon the people who were working for me and demand food from them; but he absolutely ignored and refused to do anything for anyone who was a foreigner. He was very, very bitter against foreigners.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever appeal to the American authorities for relief?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What answer did you get?

Mr. GARRETT. I was advised to leave the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never got any advice in regard to any protection other than to leave the country?

Mr. GARRETT. No. I think we had no less than three letters from the consul advising that we should leave Mexico; conditions were so bad that it was advisable for us to go and leave everything we had there at the mercy of the people who were there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have everything that you possessed invested there?

Mr. GARRETT. I invested all the money that I had. When I came out I had my suitcase, and that was all. I was fortunate to be able to bring that out. I never reaped one dollar from my investment in Mexico in any way.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the prospect of your success if you had received protection?

Mr. GARRETT. The cultivation of henequen is a very lucrative enterprise. A well-cared for plantation, one that is producing, will bring from $75 to $100 an acre each year, and the larger portion of mine—just a little of it had been planted later, and would not have been ready to cut for a little time—but I had hundreds of acres of it that at the time I left should have been ready to cut, and would have been if the conditions of the country had been such that I could have gotten it out.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were your relations with the workmen on your place and in that locality?

Mr. GARRETT. Personally, my experience with the workmen who lived on my plantation was very agreeable. My opinion about them was that they were very tractable; that they were very easily handled as long as they were treated right, and I noticed also that they would rather work for a foreigner than they would for a Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for that?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, they seemed to think that they were better treated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you always treat them well?

Mr. GARRETT. I could not have treated anyone better than I treated them. They never had to wait a day for their money. I always had their money ready for them on Saturday afternoon, and I never owed one of them a single peso.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they good workmen?

Mr. GARRETT. They were good workmen; yes. They would come and work for the money that I paid them, and I paid them at the same rate as was customary in that vicinity. I thought that they were excellent workmen.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did the people come from who committed these depredations?

Mr. GARRETT. They would come from all around toward Victoria and up in the mountains—men that I was not acquainted with.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know that many of them came from Sonora and Chihuahua?

Mr. GARRETT. You mean toward the end, when the plantation was destroyed?

Mr. KEARFUL. The revolutionists under Carranza.

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, yes, yes. Those men came from there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe to be the effect of foreign enterprises in Mexico upon the people as to being beneficial or otherwise?

Mr. GARRETT. It is my impression that Mexico was greatly benefited by the investments that were made by foreigners. Otherwise, the country would have remained in virtually a dormant state. It was foreign capital that had come in there at the request of the Mexican Government that has developed Mexico to the condition that it is to-day—or that it was before the present troubles occurred.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether practically all of the principal business enterprises of Mexico have been conducted by foreigners and by foreign capital?

Mr. GARRETT. Nearly all the large enterprises in Mexico—the railroads, the oil industries, and a great number of the very large ranches, and the mining interests—were all conducted by foreigners.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you heard of the Carranza doctrine and the slogan "Mexico for Mexicans"?

Mr. GARRETT. That was the familiar saying before I left. It appeared to me that the Mexicans had become alive to the improvements that the foreigners had made down there and had sent their sons to this country and abroad to be educated, and when they came back they were naturally as bright, as intelligent, as the majority of men who can be found. One would say: "I have a son who is an engineer. He can conduct this business." Another one would say: "I have a son that understands railroading. He can run these railroads." And so they said: "You people get out. We will run this business. We will run it ourselves. Mexico for the Mexicans!"

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you understand that the phrase "Mexico for the Mexicans" means "the property of the foreigners for the Mexicans"?

Mr. GARRETT. That the property of the foreigners should be turned over and be used entirely by them. Now, the Mexicans were glad to have foreigners come down there and invest their money and improve the country; but just as soon as this was productive and the returns came in, then the story was different: "Now we will take it; and we will handle it ourselves."

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about numerous colonies of American citizens that were established in various parts of Mexico, in the vicinity between Tampico and Monterrey?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I know quite familiarly about the Columbus colony and the Chimal colony. I know several men who were in Chimal and several who were down in Columbus. They had gone down there and invested all that they had and were doing well, had built nice homes; had fine cultivated land, had imported stock, and had put up stores and improved the land, had schools, and were getting along splendidly until this revolution came and they were advised by the United States Government to leave. Great numbers of them got up at a minute's notice, and left everything that they had there and came back to the United States, and when they came back again there was not a thing left. Everything was gone.

Mr. KEARFUL. What character of people were these?

Mr. GARRETT. They were farmers—a fine class of people. A good many of them came from the western part of Oklahoma.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were not, as has been said about Americans operating in Mexico, speculators engaged in exploiting the people?

Mr. GARRETT. They were not. These men that I knew were not by any means of that class. They were men who went there with the intention of making a home and making a living down there, and were succeeding. They had a knowledge of farming, and they were using this knowledge to their advantage, and were of a vast benefit to the country, and would have been if they had been permitted by conditions to stay there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they oppress the Mexican people who worked for them?

Mr. GARRETT. Not by any means. They treated the Mexican people well. I never heard of any occasion of those men oppressing the Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to all these homes that were established by Americans from the western part of the country?

Mr. GARRETT. They were all left desolate. A great number of their houses were pulled down, and the lumber used by the people around, the Mexicans and the country was left to grow up to weeds; the stock were taken, the horses were taken, and the cattle, a great number of them, killed and eaten.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know a man in that vicinity named Cameron?

Mr. GARRETT. Dr. Cameron—yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of a place did he have?

Mr. GARRETT. He was located up in the mountains, about 20 miles from Hincotenco. He had an orange plantation there. The last I heard of him, he and his family had been compelled to leave the country. They had been there for a great number of years. Their children and whole family of them spoke Mexican as well as they did English.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what happened to a man named Mark Johnson, at Victoria?

Mr. GARRETT. Mark Johnson and his mother lived on a farm about a mile and a half north of Victoria. They had a dairy farm there, and kept a quantity of cows. On one occasion my wife and I were staying there over night with them when some Mexican soldiers came and demanded some fodder, and they were told that the fodder was needed for the cattle, and the soldiers said they needed it for their horses, and they were going to have it; and so Mr. Johnson told them that if they could get an order from the general, he would let them have it. This man immediately drew his revolver and pointed it at his head, and said: "That is all the order you will get." I went up to the man and talked to him and told him to put his revolver up, that we were not armed, and there was no occasion to speak in that way, and another man who was with him talked to him and calmed him down, and they went off. The next day, he and I rode together into Victoria and saw the Gov. Luis Caballero and made a complaint to him about this matter, and we were told that if this man could be located he would be punished. We found the man and went back and told the general where he was, but no notice was ever taken of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the method employed by the Carrancistas to get recruits for the Army?

Mr. GARRETT. They would get the men to go and join the Army, promising them a horse and a rifle, and telling them that anything that they could take and any loot that they could get would be theirs. That is what several of these men told me personally.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was done by the Army officials in regard to taking away the arms of the inhabitants of the country, the foreigners?

Mr. GARRETT. No foreigners in Mexico were permitted to have any rifles or revolvers. When you went in the country they would search your suitcases and trunks particularly for revolvers, and if they found them they would take them away.

On one occasion I was going across the border, and, if I remember right, there were eight Americans on the train. We had all passed the customs. It was the time when we had to travel in baggage cars with planks across for seats, and at one end of the car I saw these Americans, and I went up there and spoke to them, and talked to them a little bit, and a few minutes after the train had started a man came up and said he would like to see your suitcase; so a man said: "Why, my suitcase has been examined by the customs." He said: "I would like to see it again," and he showed a badge showing that he was a customs officer; so he opened it and went through it very carefully and found a revolver. He said: "You are not permitted to bring revolvers into this country; it is against the Mexican law," and he said: "I will take this." He put it in his belt, and so he went up to the next man and said: "Have you got a revolver?" He searched his suitcase and could not find any, so he said: "Have you got a revolver?" The man said: "No." He put his hands around his waist, and found one in his belt, and he said; "Yes; you have." He said: "I will take that." Then he came to me and said: "Have you got a revolver?" I said: "Yes." He said: "I will take it," and he took a revolver away from each one of us. Then he went back in the car, and he said: "This is against the law, your bringing revolvers into this country. You may consider yourselves under arrest, and you will all get off the train at the next depot and go back to Matamoros with me." So we talked it over, and a few moments later he came back again, and he said: "I have been considering the case of you fellows, and if you would like to sign a paper donating these revolvers to the Mexican army, I will let you all off." So we decided that as he had the revolvers already we might just as well give them to him, and so we did so, all of us, and he disappeared off the train at the next station. No doubt he sold them for his own advantage later, but that is something I know nothing about, what he did with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they do with reference to taking the arms away from the plantations?

Mr. GARRETT. If they heard of any, they came for them. They heard that I had a Winchester rifle on my plantation, and they sent for it, but I was not home at the time. I was out, and my foreman went in the house and gave it to them, took it and gave it to them. Two soldiers came up there and said that they had been sent out from Victoria with an order to get my rifle, and so the foreman thought that under those circumstances it was right to give it to them, so he let them have it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without arms, of course, the foreigners were left an easy prey to the marauders?

Mr. GARRETT. An easy prey. The only thing I could have was a shotgun. They did permit you to have a shotgun.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find when you first went to Mexico to be the attitude of the Mexicans toward the Americans?

Mr. GARRETT. When I went there first of all, they seemed to be quite friendly, but later they seemed to get very bitter, especially when I would go down to Tampico. I had business down in Tampico pretty frequently, and I would go down there, and I found at Tampico that the feeling against Americans was very, very strong, especially at the time of the Vera Cruz affair.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the feeling against Americans different from the feeling against other foreigners?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; it seemed to me to be more bitter against Americans than it was against others.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for that?

Mr. GARRETT. I could not exactly say what was the reason of it, excepting that they seemed to feel that the Americans had taken part of their country from them in the past.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they could take it back?

Mr. GARRETT. And they could take back; yes. They seemed to think that anything that an American had was legitimate prey to them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they would have felt that way if this Government had adopted a firm policy?

Mr. GARRETT. No; I most certainly do not. I think that if the policy had been firm in handling the matter the conditions down there would have been very different from what they were. There was a time when the Americans were treated with a considerable amount of respect, but afterwards, later, they were treated with the greatest amount of indignities.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know about a trip made by Secretary of State Root to Mexico and the South American countries?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I have heard about it; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what the purpose of that trip was and the theory of Mr. Root in regard to our foreign trade?

Mr. GARRETT. His theory was that the foreign trade would develop if there was a better feeling among the South American countries and Mexico toward the northern Republic, and that Americans should go down there and enter into business, and so form connections that could be of advantage to their business relations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember Mr. Root's theory that since this country had become a creditor nation its progress depended upon the extension of our foreign trade?

Mr. GARRETT. Absolutely; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. According to your observation and experience is it possible to extend our foreign trade without our citizens going into the foreign country to establish relations?

Mr. GARRETT. No; my observation is that in the last few years there has been a good deal of talk about extending trade in foreign countries, and that unless the United States protects her citizens that go down there and endeavor to establish relations which are friendly the effort will be a failure.

Mr. KEARFUL. Naturally, of course, our citizens will not want to go to Mexico unless they secure the protection of this Government in case they are persecuted?

Mr. GARRETT. Not by any means. I would not go down there any more again, and I certainly would not advise or recommend anyone to go down there under the present conditions.

Mr. KEARFUL. Unless there should be a change in the policy?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; unless there should be a change in the policy.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mentioned an article by Mr. Bryan in The Commoner extolling the opportunities in Mexico and advising American citizens to go down there. Do you know what Mr. Bryan's subsequent attitude was after he became Secretary of State?

Mr. GARRETT. After he became Secretary of State, I understand from what I have read that he said that it was foolish to have gone down there; that there were plenty of opportunities for investment in this country, and that those who were down there should get out at once.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know that when you were down there he ordered them to get out to avoid complications?

Mr. GARRETT. There were distinct orders sent out, signed by the United States consuls in various parts of Mexico, advising the United States citizens to leave Mexico at once.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did that occur more than one time?

Mr. GARRETT. Twice, if not three times.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have occasion to observe the procedure at a Mexican election?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe it.

Mr. GARRETT. The elections are held in a rather peculiar manner. Tables are put out in the open, and frequently there are judges from both parties or all the parties represented, and when a man comes up to vote he is asked personally for whom he is going to vote, and he tells them which side he is going to vote for. The result is that if he votes against the man that is elected, then he is in bad favor with him afterwards in not voting for him.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect does that have upon the voting?

Mr. GARRETT. It causes the whole country, or everyone in that part, to vote for the party in power, because he is afraid not to.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of ballot boxes do they have?

Mr. GARRETT. They have open boxes, quite open, so that anyone can put any number of votes in on the sly that he wants to.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to observe the treatment that was accorded to other foreigners than Americans by the Mexicans, whether it was better or worse, with reference to the British or Germans?

Mr. GARRETT. I did not know personally. I knew one German, and he was treated about the same as I was at the time. He lost everything that he had.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under whose rule did that occur?

Mr. GARRETT. That was in the early part, before the European war broke out, but after that I did not know personally any Germans or any English, although down at Tampico the Germans were in very high favor. They would publish papers, notes, bulletins on the walls about things that had occurred during the war that were absolutely untrue and were outrageously exaggerated, and the peons would go there and read them out loud; the few of them that could read would read them out loud, and of course all the others would believe what they read about what was going on.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I care to ask. Is there anything further that you would like to say that has not been covered? Perhaps you have some opinion in regard to what ought to be done to set Mexico right?

Mr. GARRETT. My opinion is that the United States should go and take charge in the same way as they did in Cuba, and straighten the matter out there. Mexico in itself is one of the richest and most resourceful countries that there is on this continent, and it is deeply to be regretted that the wonderful products that can be derived from that country should be undeveloped in the way that they are.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean you think that the United States ought to go there and take the country and keep it?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, it would be a whole lot better, in my opinion.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that the problem could be solved without going to that extreme?

Mr. GARRETT. I think that if they would form a protectorate over it in the same way that they did over Cuba for a time, it would help matters very largely.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe to be the opinions of foreigners on that question?

Mr. GARRETT. They were all of that opinion, that the United States should step in and do something in order to make living conditions down there more agreeable, and there were a great number of Mexicans I found down there that were of the same opinion.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of Mexicans?

Mr. GARRETT. The higher class of Mexicans, a great number, that would be glad to have the United States go there so that their business conditions would be absolutely settled and carried on safely.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean you think they would like to have the United States come in there and oust Carranza and turn the country over to them?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I do not know that that was their opinion, but that the United States should go down there and form a protectorate over the country, so that in future they could carry on their business without their places being looted and overrun by bandits.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that there would be a guaranty of security?

Mr. GARRETT. So that there would be a guarantee of security; yes. That is their idea, but they would welcome anything if they knew that their property was going to be secure.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the opinion among the working classes, if they have any?

Mr. GARRETT. The peons are opposed to it. If you talked to the peons they would say: "No; we would rather die than be under the United States"; but I think that is being drilled into them by some of their leaders that have different opinions.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean the leaders that are in power?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; the leaders in power.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further that you can tell us?

Mr. GARRETT. No. I might say that my plantation has been absolutely ruined; that there is no prospect, unless the place is replanted, of ever getting anything out of it; that I went down there in good faith and invested all that I had, and lost it, not through my own fault, but through the fault of the Government that did not keep to its guarantees, and I think that I ought to be reimbursed to some extent for my losses.

Mr. KEARFUL. To which Government do you refer?

Mr. GARRETT. I refer to the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you feel that your American citizenship gave you a guarantee that this Government would protect you in a foreign country?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I did most decidedly. I thought that I would be protected by the United States when I went down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is all I care to ask. Have you anything further?

Mr. GARRETT. No; I think that is all.

Mr. KEARFUL. We are very much obliged to you.

(Whereupon the committee adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., Wednesday, March 31, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. PETER KRITZBERGER.

(The witness was duly sworn.)

Mr. KEARFUL. You may give the reporter your name.

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Peter Kritzberger.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Lincoln, Ill., is my home.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long were you in Mexico?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I went to Mexico in 1909.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your business in Mexico?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, I bought a little piece of land down there at that time. Since then I bought another piece. That is what I went there for.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where is that property located?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. That property is located upon the Tehuantepec Railroad, about halfway between Salina Cruz and Puerto, Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the State of Chiapas?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir; in the State of Oaxaca at that time. I was only there just one year. After one year I bought a piece of property down in Chiapas.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of business were you engaged in?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, I was developing land for other Americans there, and getting out firewood for the railroad company, getting cedar, dry wood. I was also working on a salary in development work, taking care of a ranch for other parties.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there a colony of Americans located near you?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. I was right there among the American colony. There was more or less two or three hundred Americans located in that place.

Mr. KEARFUL. From what part of the United States did they come?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Mostly from the West, not very many from the East, but various States, you know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was their business?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. They bought farms there and started to develop, built houses and fixed up homes, had families.

Mr. KEARFUL. What year was that colony started?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I think it was along about 1911 or 1912, along in there somewhere.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they raise on these farms?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. They raised corn and all kinds of vegetables, bananas, oranges, pineapples, cattle, hogs, horses.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people were these colonists?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, some of them were farmers, some were mechanics. I don't know exactly what class they were.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they own their own places, as a rule?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes; they all bought their own places, all of them, I guess. That is the way they came to come there from Oklahoma.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they have all they possessed, as a rule, on these places?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Lots of them did; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did they compare as to character with the same class of American citizens in this country?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I think there were just as good Americans there as I ever saw anywhere.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been stated that one of the difficulties in Mexico was that the American citizens who were operating there were of a class that could not live in their own country. Were any of that class there?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Not in that colony. There were such things as railroad engineers and conductors and such as that that can't get a job in this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those American colonists peaceful and law-abiding?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And attended to their own business?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir; absolutely.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they engage in political or revolutionary troubles?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir; nothing whatever of that kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the name of the colony where these people were located?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. San Pedro de las Papas is the tract of land that colony was in; 63,000 acres, practically all sold to different Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did these colonies operate under any special concessions or privileges that gave them an advantage over the Mexicans in any way?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir; I could not mention one case where an American took advantage of a Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. They simply bought their land and paid for it and developed it?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. There was sometimes a little difficulty. You know, the natives down there are in the habit of planting corn or putting up a house or starting up a little farm of their own just wherever they want to, and, of course, an American goes down there and buys his property and pays his taxes and lives according to the law; he wants his property, and he will have a little difficulty in getting these people off, keeping them off. They had a little trouble that way.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of a place were you on?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I was first in with this colony. That is where I lost my home and everything I had there. Then after that I went over on this 6,000-acre ranch belonging to Mr. Cunningham. I was over there the rest of the time I was down there. I was interested in handling those cattle on shares with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time you went down there in 1909, what was the condition as to security and safety and protection to life and property?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I felt absolutely safe. I used to walk 10 or 12 miles through the woods on a lone trail; never had any arms or anything about me. If I would meet a native on the trail, he would step out of the way and let me go by. Nobody ever bothered me in the world at that time. They were very nice.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of any trouble from bandits or marauders at that time?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir; I did not hear anything of that kind. I didn't talk Spanish any then. It would be pretty hard for me to know at that time, but I don't think there was anything of that kind. I never heard of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did the first trouble of that kind begin?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, of course, the first year I lived in that place, halfway between Salina Cruz and Puerto Mexico, I guess was about the time the revolution started. Of course, we were scared out into the woods three or four days, when they said the bandits were coming through. After that passed over we hadn't any further trouble. Down there in Chiapas; the first trouble we had down there was the time the Americans went into Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was in April, 1914?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened at that time?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, along about 2 o'clock in the morning there was a train pulled into that place from Tonalá. Tonalá is what they call a county seat here, something like that. Along about 2 o'clock in the morning there was a train pulled in. It didn't have any lights, it didn't blow any whistle, didn't take any water, pulled up to the station and stopped. I didn't know what it was. I was out on the porch trying to make out what it was. I couldn't tell whether it was a hand car or a train. I was about three or four blocks away from it, and it was coming in slow.

I went back and waited in the building, just waited there, and in a little bit there was an American engineer came running over there. There was a work train stopping there, and they slept at that place. He said: "Pete, for God's sake, get up. There is a bunch coming out here going to kill us."

I told him to watch the trail until I picked up my clothes and rifle and six-shooter I had there in the house. We went out the back way, and just as we got out in the back yard the shooting started over at Mr. Smith's place, and these bandits went up and fired three or four shots through the windows right in the house, and Mr. Smith said he asked them what they wanted, but they wouldn't talk to him at all. They just kept knocking down the doors and cutting down the screens and started to burst in the door where his son was sleeping, and he opened the door and shot one of them and Mr. Smith directly shot another one. Mr. Smith got out then; they were running all around, and he took a shot at all he saw and he wounded two more.

The Smith family skipped out into the woods. They had 12 small children, and they kept them all out in the woods four or five days in their night clothes. Directly the family came to the railroad, and they picked them up and took them to a place they called San Geronimo, and took care of them the best they could there. I was out in the brush myself at that time. I and the other fellows hid out in the brush four days at that time.

Directly Mr. Smith got word about his family, he made up his mind he would come in and take whatever happened. He was in jail at Tonalá two months after that. The marines were sent from Salina Cruz to Tonalá. Some of them were coming from below Tonalá, and that ship sailed up to that port and they got out on the shore. I don't know how they got out; but they came into Tonalá on foot, the marines did; and, of course, the people in Tonalá were going to mob them then. I was in the States then, and that is what the people told me there at Tonalá. That was after I came out of the brush; and I came right off to the States. That all happened while I was in the States.

They wanted to have some settlement made of that Smith case—whether they should try him, or whether he was guilty of anything or not—and get him out of jail and settle it some way. They set him free, and he got a train and took his family over into Guatemala.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he ever return to his place?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of his place?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. The ground is there; the land is there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the house?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. It is all ruins. It was a brick house. It is all destroyed—all in ruins. They stole everything he had in the house, and practically stole everything I had in my house at that time. And I was out in the brush with three other fellows for three or four days. Finally, they said if we would come they would give us protection. So we came in, and they took our arms away from us and locked us up in a little adobe house. That is a mud house they had there. They locked us up there, so these bandits could not get to us, I guess. The next day they took us down to San Pedro and they guarded us there, and the day after that they put us in a stock car with a bunch of soldiers and took us down to the Guatemala line—us and quite a bunch of Americans. I suppose there were 100 Americans that went out on that train.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you go back after that?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. I was in the States that summer, and I went back, I think, in September.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why did you go back?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, I had my interests there, and these other people had their interests there, and something had to be done.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any assurance of protection if you went back?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Not a bit.

Mr. KEARFUL. What trouble did you have after that?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Then I think it was the following December, the last day of the year, is when the first bunch of Villista bandits took that place?

Mr. KEARFUL. In 1914?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I think it was in 1914. I think it was December after—

Mr. KEARFUL. The landing at Vera Cruz?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. They came in there, and of course, I didn't know who they were. A boy brought some milk out to the house, and he told me there was a bunch of Carrancistas in town that morning, and I said, "Is that so?" I said, "I will take a walk up town and see what is going on." When I got up there, this Col. Culebra was up there, and there was only 32 of them at that time. This colonel approached me and wanted to know if I was Don Pedro. That is Spanish for "Pete." I told him I was. He said, "They told me you have several rifles and sixshooters and a lot of ammunition over there at your house." I told him it was a mistake; that I had a rifle and sixshooter, but the rifle was out on the ranch, and I said, "The ammunition I have is in my belt, and this sixshooter is all I have." "Well," he says, "we have to have some ammunition." "Well," I said, "I don't know, this is all I have, and I need this here, because lots of fellows come around here, and if they find out you haven't got anything they get you."

I took him to the house, and I had three American saddles and a lot of little things around the house. I had a bottle of this comoteca, a kind of whisky. I wanted to get on the good side of him, you know, because I didn't know what was going to happen. I asked him to take a drink. Oh, yes; he would do that all right. I poured a drink out for him. That is the style they have down there, they always pour a drink out for you. He refused to drink, and made me drink it first. I drank it, and then I poured a drink out for him, and he was satisfied and drank the whole bottle, and when he left there he was pretty well organized.

I gave him some ammunition I had, 30-30s, and 44s that we got at the time the Marines went into Vera Cruz. I don't know how I got them, but I had some there. I gave them to him and he didn't bother anything I had, but he took the horses and saddles and anything he wanted from any of those other Americans that were there. They weren't there, but their property was there. I was there, and he didn't bother me at all.

When we left the house he wanted to know why I didn't strap my gun on me. I told him I didn't want to; that I was afraid somebody would take it away from me. He made me put it on, and give me a license or paper, so none of his men would take it away from me.

Of course, I walked up town with him. He was pretty well organized, and they have a style down there, if you walk off with a fellow, they put their arms around each other's necks, and walk down the street. We walked down town that way, and the natives there saw it.

Pretty soof after that the Carrancistas came in from one side, and they had a kind of a battle there, and the Villista bandits went up into the woods. Then the people around there told the Carrancistas I was a friend of the bandits, and, of course, the Carrancistas jumped onto me and wanted to know how about that. I told them I tried to be the best friend in the world I could, because I was scared to death of them. I didn't know what else to do. I don't see what anybody would do in a case of that kind. They didn't do anything to me; didn't bother me any.

Then it was about a year, or pretty near a year, after that when they came the second time. It was on the 27th of December the following year. There were about 150 at that time. They came to my place and hit my place about 2 o'clock in the morning. I had been sick just about a week before that, and at that time I was just about getting over it and so I could sleep good, and I was sleeping very sound. I heard these bandits outdoors, but it didn't seem to wake me up right away. Directly they woke me up, and I looked out, and every window or door I looked out I saw armed men. So I just got down on the floor and crawled over in the corner. I had a six-shooter in a little grip and I took it out and took it with me, and I asked them what they wanted. They would not say anything. They just cursed me and told me to open the door. I asked them who they were and what they wanted, in Spanish, of course. They wouldn't say anything more, only cursed me and told me to open the door.

They got around to where my cook was asleep, a Chinaman: they got him out, and as he came out they grabbed him and wanted him to tell them where I was. He got loose from them and got in where I was, and the bandits went in after him. Well, I took a shot at him as he landed in the door; shot him with the six-shooter. I didn't aim to kill him; I didn't aim to kill anybody, but I wanted to get out of there. So I shot five shots through different windows and doors, and they cleared away on one side into the grass and brush, afraid I would shoot them, I guess. I went to my trunk and got the money and stuff out and packed up this grip and went out the back way, and while I was going out I heard horses coming down the trail toward where I lived. They had heard the shooting, and there was more of them in town. They circled the house, and they had a rope. They thought I was in there, and they were going to catch me and hang me. That is the story the natives told me afterwards.

I just had my night clothes on. I lost everything I had in the house that time, too. I went down toward the railroad and across the lagoon, just on the other side, where they couldn't get to me. Of course, when I got there I had a few clothes there, but I was practically without any clothes until I got there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did they do to your place?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Burned it; destroyed everything in it—tried to burn it, but it was a brick house, with hardwood floors, a nice American-style house. They dumped the things that were in the trunk and all the stuff out on the floor and set fire to it, and burned a deep hole in the floor, but that hardwood don't burn very good. They busted the piano and broke the doors and windows.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they loot the house?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir; they took everything in it; that is, the Carrancistas came there afterwards, after these bandits had gone, and they looted what the bandits didn't take.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to the places of the other colonists there?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, all those places the other people had there are all gone. They stole all that was left. Every Tom, Dick, and Harry that would come along would tear a piece of the house down.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did these people have live stock and implements, and their houses furnished?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And improvements on the place?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Oh, yes. You know how it is; they didn't have much from the first start out, you know. They spent all the money they had, lots of them. There was lots of those people that wanted to get away with their children and their families. I was making a little money along at the time, and I bought lots of that stuff for practically nothing. They didn't have the money to get away.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the stuff you bought?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. The bandits and the Carrancistas destroyed that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are any Americans left in that colony now?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Not a one.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where are they?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I don't know; in different parts of the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were any of them killed?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. One of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was that?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Jake Myers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please relate the incident of his killing.

Mr. KRITZBERGER. That was about the year 1915, I think. He came over to my house one afternoon, and he said, "I have a fat pig I would like to butcher, and I want you to come down and help me." He was an old man, about 60 years old. I went down and helped him kill his hog, and he hung it up in a shed he had there. He was going to leave it there until morning, and in the morning he was going to cut it up, you know, and fix it. After we had the hog hung up I came on back home, and I met two men on the railroad. I went along the railroad on my way back.

Then, the next morning I went down early to help him with his hog again, and I couldn't find him. The hog was still hanging there where we left it. I saw the house was all tore up and upset, but the other things were just as they were when I left. They hadn't been moved, such as kettles and stuff that he used to dress his hogs with.

So I staid around there a while. I called and called and called, but he never came. I thought probably he was out in the cane patch somewhere, and he would be back after a while. I went back home, got a cup of coffee, and after a while I went back down there again.

Everything was just the same as it was; everything just like it was when I first went down. I called and he never answered. I thought "I am going to take a walk over in that cane patch. Probably he went out there to cut some cane and got sick or something." He was an old man. I started out that way, and I suspicioned something. He had a little sugar mill over there. I don't know what caused me to go over there, but I went over there, and he was down under one of the kettles. It seems as though he knelt down to get some hot coals out from under the kettles, and he was on his hands and knees, and these people slipped up behind him and just cut his head off. It seemed as though it was just one cut through his entire neck, except his throat.

Mr. KEARFUL. With a machete?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. With a machete; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the murderers ever found?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was done with them?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. We had no idea who did it. Of course, I went uptown and reported the matter, and all the Americans ran down there to see. This same party that did the work was there at the time, standing around. He even dug the grave. We hired him to dig the grave. We didn't know who it was, you know.

The 16th day of September they had a big feast day. That is their national holiday. Well, he got drunk that day and he told it. So we had him arrested and had him tried. He had American money on him that I saw another fellow give this Mr. Myers two or three days before, and he had a match box on him that I saw Mr. Myers have in his pocket, and we found some blood on his machete. So they took the fellows into Tonalá—there were two of them—took them before the judge and had a trial, I guess; I wasn't there, but I know they took that fellow down there. He had to pay $300, and that was all there was to the case. The man is still free. I see him every once in a while; both of them. I know more or less about where they live.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was fined by the judge?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. The judge took the money that he robbed Mr. Myers of.

Mr. KEARFUL. In payment of the fine?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. In payment of the fine.

Mr. KEARFUL. They did not impose any further punishment on him?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Nothing further whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was that judge? Was he a Carrancista official?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. He was under the Government. He was a Carrancista. Carranza was in power at that time, but he had been judge there for a long time. He is dead now.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say this murderer against whom the crime was proved is at large?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And going about the vicinity?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Just the same as any other native.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any other murders of Americans that you knew about in that colony?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. Mr. McGill was murdered about 30 miles below where I lived. I was well acquainted with him. There was also a Mr. Morgan, up on the Chivela ranch. He was also murdered.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the circumstances of the murders of those two men?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Only what they told me. I was in the States that summer when Mr. McGill was murdered, and I got a letter from his father and he told me about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was anything done by way of punishment of the murderers?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir. They have not found out who they were. They haven't punished anybody. They haven't tried to. I don't believe. They say they shot three fellows they thought were implicated in the Morgan murder. Mr. Morgan was captured in a sawmill and tied up and taken down to his home by a band of about eight men, and he was hollering for help and everything, you know, to get somebody to come and help him, and they sent another man down ahead to tell the women to get out of the house. The next day the American consul and some Americans that lived in the north part of San Geronimo went down there to get him, and they found him on the floor. He had a knife run through him, and two bullet holes through him. There was also a Spaniard shot and killed in the same house.

Mr. KEARFUL. When these depredations were committed against Americans and their property were any complaints made to the authorities?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were any appeals made for protection?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. I don't know how many times I made complaints, but they didn't pay any attention to it; didn't pay any attention to the American consul.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you understand to be the reason for that attitude?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, they knew they didn't have to; that is the only reason I know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do they seem to think they can commit these outrages with impunity?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. They feel as though they can do anything they want to to the Americans. That is the only way I could explain it. It seems to me they think they can do anything they want to with Americans. They have been doing it right along. You go and make a complaint, and you are liable to get in jail for it. I am sure I would never say anything any more, because I came so close to getting in jail. I caught a man killing a fat cow, and I made a complaint to the authorities there at Tonalá, and they arrested the fellow and took him up, and the next day they turned him loose. The fellow swore up and down he would shoot me, and do all this, that, and the other. They turned him loose, and then I went to work and wrote a letter to Gen. Alvarado, the big Carrancista general in the south, and Gen. Alvarado sent word down to have him arrested again. They rearrested him, and he was in jail about a week, and he is at liberty now. I know it cost me about $300 to convict him, and I lost two of my rifles, and three of my men are still in jail, and I felt mighty lucky that I wasn't in jail, the way we were going.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the attitude and demeanor of the authorities toward you when you go to make a complaint?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Every time I go into the office they pretty near know I am coming in there to holler about something, you know, and they hiss and laugh at me and wink at each other and say, "There comes that Gringo back for something."

Mr. KEARFUL. They treat the American complaints as a joke, do they?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I don't know what else you can make out of it. I wouldn't do anything, because it was absolutely useless. I had four powers of attorney down there for different people. I couldn't do anything. They were stealing cedar and cutting ties on property I had a power of attorney for, and I made a complaint. I wrote to the consul, and the consul wrote to them, and it didn't amount to that much. They took the stuff and went with it and I never got a cent, nor anybody else.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever make an appeal for protection to the American Government?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir; nothing further than the American consul. I told him my troubles and asked him if he could do anything for me.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did the American consul say when you appealed to him for protection?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. That case where they were stealing that stuff, I wrote him a letter and told him I had a power of attorney for that stuff, and he wrote this colonel that they had down there who was stealing that cedar and stuff and told him I had a power of attorney for it and he had no business there. He didn't pay any attention to it. He just kept on stealing.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did the American consul say to you about his ability to afford protection to you and other Americans?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I don't just understand you.

Mr. KEARFUL. When you appealed to the American consul for protection from the American Government, what did the American consul say to you about getting protection, if anything?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. He didn't say anything. I was down there once when I had my passport verified and I told him about lots of this stuff that was going on, that I couldn't get any protection from the authorities in Tonalá; and he never said anything, that he would do anything or that he would not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he ever give you any advice about what you should do?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he ever advise you to get out of the country?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever receive a notice or order coming from the American Government to get out of Mexico?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. There was an order came one time, at the time Villa went in the States, from the English consul, who was representing the American Government there, that we had better get out.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the time of Villa's raid on Columbus?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the Pershing expedition followed?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. They had no American consul then for about a year or a year and a half, maybe two years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever appeal to the authorities in Washington for protection?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why did you not?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, I thought the American consul would be looking after that. He sent a letter to Washington, and to the ambassador at Mexico City, and also the consul general at Mexico City, telling what I wrote him. I don't know any more about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any of your neighbors or other Americans there who appealed to the Washington authorities?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of any of them getting protection?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir. That is out of the question, protection of any kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who were the Mexicans who were robbing these places and committing the depredations you speak of?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. They were people that came along. Even a train would pull into that place, and would stop for a while, and the train crew would get out and rob and steal around the houses there—anybody that would come along. They would just tear the houses down and sell the boards. Of course, the furniture and stuff like that has all been stolen and is gone. The Americans left and, of course, they left their houses standing there, but they are all gone now. They have completely lost the whole business.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were any of these depredations committed by the Carrancista soldiers?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. The Carrancista soldiers came into San Pedro several times. They would say, "I'm going over to that Gringo. If he don't give us something to eat we will shoot a hole in him." I would not be at the house, and they would rob the house, destroy the garden. A bunch of them would come in and turn 200 or 300 horses in the pasture, never ask permission or anything. I had about 600 head of cattle that belonged to other people. I didn't own any land, and I didn't have anything else outside of these cattle. They were running on this ranch of Mr. Cunningham's, a 6,000-acre ranch, all fenced in. They just cut the wires down and stole it and turned cattle in, and took trees and logs out, anything they wanted to. I complained about that I don't know how many times—I guess 20 times—and the more I complained the more it was done. People bring in cattle from 20 or 30 miles away and turn them in on that property, and I can't stop it. I absolutely have no control over the place at all. My cattle get mixed up with these cattle. These cattle go in the corral where my cattle are, and that's the last I see of them. I can't stop it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about graft on the part of Carrancista officers?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. It is all a graft. Everybody grafts.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give us some illustrations?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, I can in a way. If people are shipping cattle or anything that way, the first thing you will have to do, you will have to pay the train master $25 or $30 to get your car. When you get a car, probably the conductor or engineer will come around and say the car is broken, but if you can pay them $25 or $30 they will take the car on up to their destination. When you get there, and another train crew has to take your car down, they will take it down a station or two, and then they will say there is something the matter with the truck, the car is in bad order, and they can't take it any further. They do that just to get another $25.

Mr. KEARFUL. These are all in addition to the regular freight charges?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. These are all extra; yes, sir. That is the custom down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it the custom to pay the officials to get them to perform their duty?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. It is the only way you can get anything done.

Mr. KEARFUL. What information have you about outrages upon women by the Carrancistas?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. At the time they came in there, at the time of the Vera Cruz business, they assaulted one American woman.

Mr. KEARFUL. How about the native women?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Oh, they assaulted little girls and women right along.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was a common thing, was it?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. The second time the bandits came there, they destroyed all the little girls that were in the town.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean they assaulted them?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to the American woman you speak of?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. That family went over into Guatemala. They took them out on the same train we were taken out on. I don't know, but it seems to me like that woman died later on over there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was her condition at the time she was assaulted?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. She was in a family way at the time she was assaulted, and the party that assaulted her is living right at that same place to-day. They have not even asked him anything about it, I don't think.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was this woman a member of the American colony there?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. They had a family of four or five children; a little baby. They lost everything they had. After that happened, though, he didn't want to stay there any longer. He got over in Guatemala. That is as far as they got them.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you leave Mexico?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. This last time?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I left there the 22d day of February.

Mr. KEARFUL. This year?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were any Americans there when you left?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Not in my district. Within 40 miles of me there wasn't any. There used to be 200 or 300 there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of travel over the line you took coming to the United States?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Down along the Pan American line they used to go in large droves, 200 or 300 of them. They used to take towns. They took that town of Tonalá three times. I had a room there, and clothes and stuff there, and I lost everything I had there. From that time the bandits were all split up in small tribes, and they would just rob and steal everywhere they would go. Probably one bunch of 10 or 12 would hit you to-day, and to-morrow another bunch would come along and they would take whatever they wanted and asked no questions, only they may ask you to help them.

Up along the Vera Cruz and Isthmus road they have seven trains. They run a train from 5 to every 15 days. They have a work train and a passenger train and another train for troops.

Mr. KEARFUL. A military train?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. A military train; yes, sir. The bandits had destroyed the bridge on the track and they had to build a new bridge over the track before we could move on. We had that military train to guard the passenger train.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions on this last trip you made?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Why, I think they are worse right now, in fact, than when I came out.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many days were you coming out?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I was two weeks and two days coming out, about two weeks coming through Mexico. As a rule it takes five days, but I was lucky. I struck the train just right, you see. If I hadn't struck that train at that time probably I would have had to wait 8 or 10 days before I had another chance. Probably it would have taken me a week or 10 days longer.

Mr. KEARFUL. On what portion of the trip was the worst condition of travel?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. That was the worst part, on the Vera Cruz and Isthmus Railroad.

Mr. KEARFUL. Below Mexico City?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. The track is all grown up with weeds and brush. The train just creeps along and the brush breaks the windows of the train. They can't have anybody to clean and work on the track. The window lights on the train are all shot out or torn up or broken.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have sleeping accommodations?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you able to get meals or food on the road?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. If you can eat these frijoles or tortillas that the natives have on the road. I took a little canned stuff with me. We can't find anything to eat on the road until you come to a place they call Orizaba. Then you have Pullman accommodations into Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any class of Mexicans in the locality where you were operating that was peaceful and law abiding?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Very few; very few.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the sentiment among the better class as to what ought to be done to straighten out the trouble there?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, they all seem to think the States are to blame for all of it, because they don't come down there and do something to straighten that out. Lots of them lost everything they had, people that were worthy. Then the Mexicans, the natives, the better class of people, wanted intervention, all over, anywhere you talk.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean they want the United States to take the country?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do they want the United States to do?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, I don't know. They think if the States would come in there and take hold of things they probably would get under a different rule.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do they seem to be hopeless that the Mexicans themselves can straighten the situation out?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir; absolutely. I don't see how in the world, if some foreign country don't fix things up down there, how it will ever be settled.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the sentiment among the Americans and other foreigners down there as to what ought to be done?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. They have same opinion.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your own opinion as to what should be done?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I think there ought to be intervention. That is the only thing I can see in the world that will ever do any good now. The people have got in such a state that I don't think they will ever get straightened up. I don't think they can ever do it. They have had their own way for 10 years, and it is going from bad to worse all the time. You can hardly get anybody to work now. They don't have to work. They can take anything you have got, and nobody say a word about it, so what is the use of working? That is the way they feel about it, and they tell it to you, if they want to.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are there any other incidents of which you have personal knowledge that you have not already related?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. There was a Mr. Summers. I knew him. I saw him on the way up. He lived down close to where I lived. While I was talking with him a fellow came in and said, "The bandits are down there looting your place." We were talking about one thing or another, and he says, "If they will let me know when they come around I will go down there and have an interview with them." I saw in the paper when I got to Laredo that they had captured him and was holding him for $5,000 ransom. I also saw it in the home paper when I got home, and saw that his brother in Oklahoma some place had paid the ransom.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who were the people who captured him and held him?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. They were bandits; that is all I know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you make any distinction between bandits and Carrancistas?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No; I don't. I think they are all bandits, the way I figure it. The way they did me, and the way they do everybody, I don't see where there is any difference. I really think the Carranza forces did me more damage than the bandits. The bandits would come in and stay two or three or four hours, take what they wanted, and go on. The Carranza forces would come down there and probably stay for a week, and steal off of me all the time they were there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they ever pay for anything they got?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir; they didn't pay for anything. I never got anything. When I got down there this last time I took a sashay down through the woods. I had been away four or five months, and I found several animals that were shot. I found where they stole a lot of barbed wire. I went to Tonalá, and as it happened the general was at Tonalá. I also wrote the consul a little before that about it. I had a talk with the general, and he wanted to know who was doing that. He said, "Why don't you watch and see who is doing that?" I said to him, "I am not going to stay around in the woods, when the bandits and people are out there with rifles killing cattle." "Well," he says, "the only thing we can do is to send a commission out there and take the arms away from the people around there and stop it." He said he would do that. In about 10 days here comes about 25 men, and they came to the ranch about noon. They had already taken up the arms on one side. They stayed at the ranch that afternoon and that night until 4 o'clock the next morning, and then they worked on the other end of the ranch to the other little town and gathered up the arms. Then when they came back they stayed at the ranch until long about midnight the next night. Of course, I took the captain and one or two others in the house and treated them as nice as I could.

The rest of the soldiers stayed outdoors. When they left that night they robbed the ranch, took a lot of things—saddles, bridles, blankets. I turned in and wrote the general a letter and told him they came out there and robbed me, but that was the end of it. If I had not said anything in the first place, I would have been robbed but once, but I went and made a holler, so I was robbed twice. The more you try to do anything the worse you are stung.

Mr. KEARFUL. There were a good many Americans who were robbed and driven out of Mexico who applied to the American State Department for protection, and they have reported that the question put to them was, "Why did you go to Mexico?" So I will ask you why you went to Mexico?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I thought there was an opportunity there, is why I went to Mexico. I think I would have lots of money to-day if that had not happened.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you advised about the opportunities in Mexico by the Mexican Government or by this Government before you went?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir. I read literature, and I went down on my own hook. Nobody told me, and I never asked any questions.

Mr. KEARFUL. You went there to engage in a legitimate business enterprise, did you?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I went there with the intention of making money, and trying to do business in a business way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any idea when you went there that when you succeeded in developing the business it would be taken away from you and you would be refused protection?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No; not the least idea; not the least idea. When I first went there it seemed like all the natives respected you. If you passed one of them, they would take their hats off to you and get out of your way and allow you the trail. It kind of made me take up with the country. But it is just the opposite now. Even if you are in town, you can't walk on the sidewalk. You are liable to be assaulted or insulted. They will call you anything they want to, or make a joke of you, or shove you out of the way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you or the other Americans who went there mistreat the Mexicans in any way?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir. I don't know one case where an American ever mistreated a Mexican. Of course, some Americans may have some trouble down there, because he has his property, and some Mexican will want to use part of it to plant some corn on or something like that, and the American won't stand for it. Of course, you wouldn't call that mistreating the Mexicans, because the property was paid for and the American was paying the taxes on it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the American enterprises have upon the condition of the Mexican laborers? Was it beneficial to them or otherwise?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. The Mexicans at that time seemed to think it was a nice thing for Americans to come in there, because the Americans always paid them more money than anybody else, or their own people did. They seemed to think they got along better. Any American that went down there, he would start developing and trying to do something, which their own people didn't do so much. And the Americans always paid them better wages than anybody else. At the same time, if they got a chance at you they would cut your head off.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further you want to say that has not always been covered?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir; I don't know of anything. I guess we have covered about everything.

At different places, in riding along on the train, we would see natives hanging on the trees now, along the railroad. They kill each other. It seems like they will loot, and one will rob the other, and one will kill the other to get what he had looted.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the condition of the country through which you traveled at the time you came out of Mexico the last time?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. It is worse than ever.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what way?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. In the way of looting.

Mr. KEARFUL. How about the farms along the railroad? What condition are they in?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. I mentioned that. The farms are there, but the improvements and everything and the people are all gone. The land is there, of course. I don't know whether the taxes are paid on it, or whether the Government has put an embargo on it or not. Of course, I don't know that. Some of them probably are paying taxes on their property there yet, and some of them I don't suppose are able to.

Mr. KEARFUL. If the taxes are not paid then the Government levies an attachment on the property?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What they call an "embargo"?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir. They put an embargo on some that is paid, too, if they want to. They put an embargo on land I have a power of attorney for, and I have paid taxes right up to date. I went to see the collector and tried to explain the thing to him, but he wouldn't be convinced in any shape or form. I wrote to the consul about it, and I don't know what the outcome of it is now. I wanted to get away, because the bandits were working around there and I didn't want to stay any longer. I didn't stay to finish that embargo business they put on that property. The consul said he would try to straighten it out. And that is all I know about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do the Mexicans treat other foreigners besides Americans—especially Germans and Englishmen?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Well, it seems to me the Germans don't have as much trouble as anybody else. It seems like down with the German people they don't have any bandits. In those big coffee ranches there, where the Americans have those big coffee ranches, and the English have a few of the coffee ranches, but the most of them—two-thirds or better—belong to the Germans. The bandits don't operate down in there. I don't know why.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what part of the country is that?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. That is practically on the Guatemala line.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the State of Chiapas?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are there any other incidents that you recall?

Mr. KRITZBERGER. No, sir; I guess not.

Mr. KEARFUL. That will be all, then. Thank you very much for your testimony.

(Thereupon, at 12 o'clock noon, the committee adjourned.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 1, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., April 1, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. MICHAEL J. SLATTERY.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. SLATTERY. Michael J. Slattery.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present place of residence?

Mr. SLATTERY. 830 North Sixty-third Street, Philadelphia.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you born?

Mr. SLATTERY. Philadelphia.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. SLATTERY. I am a mine operator.

Mr. KEARFUL. What opportunities have you had to observe conditions in Mexico?

Mr. SLATTERY. Recently?

Mr. KEARFUL. At any time.

Mr. SLATTERY. First of all, my close contact with the people; I went into Mexico in March, 1901, coming out when we were forced out by the invasion of Vera Cruz by the United States Government, in April, 1914. Living all those years in Mexico gave me a splendid opportunity of knowing the people, becoming acquainted with them, their customs and mode of living; and, after my coming out of Mexico, keeping up the friendship with most of the friends that I had made down there. I think, therefore, I am in a position to say that I know something of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your business in Mexico?

Mr. SLATTERY. My business was being engaged in mining.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what part of the country?

Mr. SLATTERY. I was in charge of many operations in the State of Zacatecas, the State of Colima, and the State of Jalisco, particularly Jalisco. I was in charge of a number of big properties down there, and not only in charge of a number of properties, but I owned considerable property of my own.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed to state in your own way the nature and extent of the operations with which you were connected in Mexico?

Mr. SLATTERY. I do not quite get that question; in how large a way?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. SLATTERY. For instance, in one property we were operating a mill of 200 tons capacity and were considering the advisability of further adding to that mill. We employed close on to 1,100 men.

Mr. KEARFUL. What kind of a mine was that?

Mr. SLATTERY. That was gold mining. At another place we had about 350 men and were building and constructing a mill. At a number of other places we had anywhere from 50 to 75 men at work prospecting and doing development work.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you make an estimate of the amount of money invested in these enterprises with which you were connected?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes. The actual capital invested I would imagine would be in the neighborhood of $7,000,000. Aside from that there were a number of properties in which I have been directly interested, properties that I have owned myself, for instance, where I have taken considerable money out of the ground and put it back into the property; that is to say, in the development work I took this money that we received for the sale of bullion and concentrate returns and put it right back into development and improvements.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with the condition of mining in Mexico prior to the time that the Americans went in there to engage in mining?

Mr. SLATTERY. My experience with mining only dates from March, 1901; but from talking with the natives themselves about the mining prior to that time and comparing it with the conditions of the succeeding years, say from 1901 to 1910, I should say that I was familiar with those conditions.

Mr. KEARFUL. About what time in the history of mining in Mexico did the Americans go into that country?

Mr. SLATTERY. I do not know exactly. I do not know when Porfirio Diaz—one of the most wonderful Presidents that Mexico has ever had—issued that famous proclamation of his, which, among other things, if my memory serves me correctly, said:

Recognizing that the economic condition of Mexico can not be developed from within, I hereby invite the nationals of the world to come into Mexico and develop the resources of Mexico, guaranteeing to them the same rights and privileges as are now enjoyed by Mexican citizens, excepting, of course, the right of suffrage.

When I came into Mexico that was one of the first—in fact, before I went into Mexico that was one of the first things that was called to my attention. It was called to my attention for the reason that Mexico to me was a strange country and I was anxious to understand the conditions which would safeguard a man, his life, and his property while in that country; and it was while I was in the City of Mexico talking to one of the most prominent members of the legal profession that that proclamation was shown to me, and of course I have always understood and during my years under Diaz I realized that that proclamation was being carried fully into effect, namely, that Americans as well as all other nationals were given every right and privilege to engage in the mining industry.

Mr. KEARFUL. You regard that as practically the beginning of American mining operations in Mexico?

Mr. SLATTERY. I believe that that was the beginning of the American entry into Mexico on a large scale in mining.

Mr. KEARFUL. Diaz was president first in 1876, and again in 1884.

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that it was near the beginning of his administration?

Mr. SLATTERY. No; that I can not say, because I never took the trouble of looking it up. I am only familiar with it because it appears on the first page of the constitution.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the fact in regard to the mining prospects of Mexico when the Americans went in? Were there great bonanzas ready to be developed at little cost, or were they problematical and expensive?

Mr. SLATTERY. In my entire experience in Mexico, my long years in Mexico, I never saw in any part of Mexico and never met any American or Britisher who ever ran across one of those so-called bonanzas. Personally I was always on the lookout for that kind of a proposition; but in my 18 years professional proper connections in Mexico I never knew of such a thing. Bonanzas only come where there is an intersection of veins, and those intersections of veins are usually not found on the surface; they are usually found very deep down in the ground, and it requires a great deal of development work to locate such bonanzas.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition with respect to the surface prospects having been worked out when the Americans went in there?

Mr. SLATTERY. Mexico is known as the land of antiguas. That is to say, there are a number of old mines, some of them going back to the time of Carlos V of Spain; but the way those mines have been worked, those antiguas, have been such that in nearly every case every piece of ground that has been worth while has been practically, you might say, worked all over again, for the reason that there were very narrow passageways. We mining men developing the ground call them rat holes. They simply followed the pay streak. The development work was not carried on as we carry it on. They simply gouge and follow the streak. If it is a foot wide they will just drive the width of a man's body; so you can readily see that when any Americans came across these antiguas that were supposed to be very rich mines in the days gone by, it required considerable money to open up and develop them; and there are very few antiguas that are in actual operation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it a fact that all of the rich prospects had been worked out and abandoned at the time the Americans went in there?

Mr. SLATTERY. I should like to answer your question in this way: Every big mine in Mexico to-day that is worthy of the name of being called a big mine has been developed by American enterprise or British engineers. In other words, when those men first went in there and took hold of these properties they were merely prospects, and to-day they are the most wonderful properties in Mexico, and those mines were developed by American and British capital. I want to say that the reason why I say "American and British capital" is this: It is a strange thing that the American people have never realized. We fellows in Mexico have been dubbed, you might say, back here, as being soldiers of fortune. It has been said that we have gone down there and that we have grabbed the lands, and that we have stolen the mines, and in other words that we have taken these things away from the Mexican people, when as a matter of fact Americans in Mexico have only been engaged in things that have required nerve, patience, and sacrifice. That is to say, they have been engaged in mining, and every man knows that a man who lives in the mining country is away from civilization; he is out in the lonely hills. He does not develop a mine overnight. It takes time to do that. Every shot he puts into the ground does not produce ore, and he has his disappointments. Then we have the railroad men, engaged in building railroads. The Americans built all the railroads. When we talk about the progress of Mexico during the years prior to Mr. Diaz, and we say that nearly every section of Mexico has been connected with the capital by railroad, we can also say that these same railroads have been built by Americans. Our dams, waterworks, ports of entry, our beautiful harbors at Vera Cruz and Manzanillo, and all big things like that, Americans have been asked to go in and do these things.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the paving of the streets?

Mr. SLATTERY. We are laying out the sewers in the different cities. Americans as a class have not gone into the commercial enterprises. The thought I want to convey to you is that we did not take away any opportunity from the native people. We developed the opportunity.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it a fact that the Americans went in there and did the things that the Mexicans themselves would not do or did not do?

Mr. SLATTERY. That is the truest statement that has ever been made.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that especially true with regard to mines?

Mr. SLATTERY. Absolutely so. I have been in contact with a great many Mexicans, and I have never known a Mexican in my entire experience in Mexico to ever invest a dollar in what we would call a prospect—that is, what we fellows would consider a good gamble that we would be willing to sink our own money in to help to develop. I never knew of a Mexican in my entire experience that would be willing to invest in that prospect with you.

Mr. KEARFUL. In getting control of mining prospects in Mexico, did you ever know of Americans who had special concessions that they obtained from the Mexican Government that gave them any special privileges over the Mexicans?

Mr. SLATTERY. Do not make me laugh. As to these so-called special concessions, I have only heard of the term since I have been back in the United States. Anything our people got in Mexico, we bought and we dearly paid for.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you or your associates have any special privileges that you got from anybody?

Mr. SLATTERY. I not only did not have any special privileges, but I can cite many occasions where they have attempted to take away from me what I really secured in the proper and legal way, after I developed them from a prospect into a paying proposition.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has it been true with many other operators, as it has been with you that when profits were made from the mines, those profits were reinvested for further development?

Mr. SLATTERY. Oh, yes; that has been our general policy. That has been the general policy of many of our American mine operators.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the operation of American capital and enterprise in the mining industry have upon the laboring classes of Mexico? Did it tend to oppress them?

Mr. SLATTERY. It seemed to me—and of course I am only going to speak of my own expedience—that we put life into the whole country where Americans were engaged in an enterprise. Speaking for myself, I can recite to you three places where practically a blade of grass did not grow. When I say “a blade of grass,” you know what I mean—developed in the proper way; there was nothing but a little prospect, little indications, superficial indications that there was ore in the ground. We developed those three places, so that in time we built practically towns around those mines with the people engaged in the development of our work.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you employ natives exclusively?

Mr. SLATTERY. Natives. When I went to Mexico first, the average wage of the peon, the laborer, was 6 cents a day, Mexican money. The first crew of men I ever employed I paid 50 cents a day. That was the beginning, you might say, of the hatred that sprang up between the mining men and the hacienda men.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Mexican hacienda men?

Mr. SLATTERY. The Mexican hacienda men. They were paying their men 6 cents a day and allowing them so much of the corn and beans that they would raise on the hacienda. Sometimes they got what was coming to them, and sometimes they did not. In any case, we began at 50 cents a day. We raised that to 75 cents a day. We have been paying from a dollar for common labor up to two and three dollars a day.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are speaking in terms of Mexican money?

Mr. SLATTERY. In terms of Mexican money. I never operated nor would I operate a company store, but I always saw to it that in dealing with storekeepers that were in my village or in the place where I was operating, we bought those goods for cash. You know Mexico is a country of long-time credits, but by paying cash for everything you can buy things considerably cheaper.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the system of company stores that operated to oppress Mexican laborers as it was operated by the Mexicans?

Mr. SLATTERY. The company store was a store where the peon or the laborer could go to the store on what they called a ticket, and on this ticket everything that he was given out of the store was put down. At the end of two weeks, or at the end of a quincena—two weeks' time—or a month, or whatever the time or period of employment was the amount that he was supposed to receive every day was then placed opposite what he received, and it was always found that that man was in debt. No matter how it was figured, the peon was always in debt. In addition to that, the prices in the company store were always higher for everything than he could buy them for right out in the open market.

Mr. KEARFUL. Provided he had the cash?

Mr. SLATTERY. Providing he had the money. I saw the dangers of that system, and I always desired to have the confidence of the Mexican laborer, and in order that he would not think we were trying, as we use the term nowadays, to profiteer, we did not operate a company store, but we did control every storekeeper in our village. That is to say, every man, every storekeeper who sold a piece of goods higher than what the price was that we fixed on it, we practically took the privileges of the store away from that man. In other words, what I mean by that is that we would not honor our time-cards in his store.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, if he sold on credit to your workmen and charged them an exorbitant price you would see that he did not get paid?

Mr. SLATTERY. We would not honor those cards, and in that way our laboring men, our miners, were able to buy in these stores articles of wearing apparel and also edibles for less than they could buy these same articles for in the smaller towns, because of the opportunities we afforded them, by paying cash for everything and buying at wholesale prices.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other benefits accrued to the Mexican natives by reason of the operations, besides this doing away with the company-store system and the wage scale? What about their habits of living and their clothing, etc.?

Mr. SLATTERY. That would have to be answered with a long story, which I do not like to go into.

The average American who has gone to Mexico has been practically the judge and jury and doctor and everything else for his laborers. Once an American obtained the confidence of the native, that native would bring and did bring his domestic troubles, his family troubles, all his troubles to him. In case of any quarrels or anything of that sort he would never think of going into the town to the jefe politico or to the judge to settle them. He would bring them up to his American patron and have him adjust them. We Americans moved among those Mexicans; we were practically their doctors; many of us took up a course of medicine, you might say by correspondence, through the Parke-Davis system, just to learn the general symptoms of diseases and have some pills and things around about the place, so that in case of little ills and all that sort of thing we would be able to administer to them.

What the Americans have done for their laborers and for the people connected with their work, no man is in a position to give a real statistical account. For instance, those of us that knew their habits, we celebrated their own fiestas right on our own grounds; we gave them their own entertainments; we gave them their own music; everything that they would have by going to the big towns we gave them right on our own place.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without assessing them for it?

Mr. SLATTERY. Without charging them a nickel.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the matter of education?

Mr. SLATTERY. In the matter of education, we always saw to it—of course, that was never carried on in a systematic manner, because, after all, the word “education” is a misnomer in Mexico. Although I have read so many beautiful things about the educational system of Mexico, I never came in direct contact with it; at least, I never saw it, although I searched for it—this wonderful educational system that was said to be going on in Mexico. Without speaking for anybody else, we had a rural school—you might call it—out our way, that we had two or three hundred children attending, and we practically paid 50 per cent of the expenses of maintaining that school.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the system that you describe, of gaining the confidence of the Mexican workmen, generally followed by American mining operators?

Mr. SLATTERY. Generally; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the Mexicans toward the American operators during the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. SLATTERY. The attitude was, I would say, of the most friendly kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they grateful for the things that were done for them, or otherwise?

Mr. SLATTERY. Well, yes; but that word “grateful” is a peculiar word in Mexico. A Mexican very seldom—I suppose it is a trait that is unexplainable—shows gratitude, but if we could use the word in its broadest sense, they would go out of their way to appreciate what was done for them by their American patrons.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they trustworthy, as a rule, and faithful?

Mr. SLATTERY. Absolutely. That is a thing that I should like to describe for you, because it has been asked of me so many times. The most faithful individual that I have ever met is the Mexican peon. He will stick with you, if he has a responsibility, 24 hours of the day, if it is necessary.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you not call that gratitude for good treatment?

Mr. SLATTERY. You have asked me another question, now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well.

Mr. SLATTERY. You asked me if they were trustworthy. You can put on your desk $10,000 in money in all denominations, and go out; go down to the mill, or go somewhere else, and come back, and not a nickel of that money will be touched; but some old rivet or some old bolt or something that is absolutely of no use to the Mexican himself, but may, perhaps, be of some use to you, will be taken by him simply because it is lying around. Now, that is almost indescribable.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are talking now of a period that is past, are you not?

Mr. SLATTERY. I am talking now of the Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. The characteristics of the Mexican generally?

Mr. SLATTERY. I am talking now of the Mexican of to-day, as well as the Mexican of 1901 that came under the direct influence of the Americans. When I say that, I do not include in that a single member of the outfit that has taken up arms with one faction or another. I describe him as nothing more than a bandit—members of that outfit.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you include in the term "bandit" the government army?

Mr. SLATTERY. I include in the term "bandit" every man that has been in the Carranza army, the Villa army, the Obregon army, all the factional strife; everyone of those fellows I include in that term.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which predominated in the mining business in Mexico—Americans or British?

Mr. SLATTERY. Oh, we were away ahead, both in money and men and development of mines, of British capital.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any troubles at all during the time of Porfirio Diaz in your operations?

Mr. SLATTERY. Never. We never worried a minute. I rode all over Mexico during those good old days on horseback, and I felt as safe as if I were back in my own home town. The thought of danger never occurred to me. In fact, at night at the mine we slept with our doors and our windows wide open.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never had any feeling of insecurity?

Mr. SLATTERY. We never had any feeling of insecurity during all of those years.

Mr. KEARFUL. How is it now?

Mr. SLATTERY. As it is now, we are not even permitted to spend a night in our own place.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what point did this change begin to take place?

Mr. SLATTERY. It started in 1910. In September, 1910, Mexico was celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of its independence from Spain. Everyone who was within the gates of Mexico at that time would think that she was the greatest country in the world, everybody seemed to be so happy and lovely with one another. Two months afterwards, if you will recall, Pancho Madero hoisted his flag of revolt, and then started the anti-American riots. From some of the men who were closely connected with Pancho Madero, I was given to understand that these anti-American riots were inaugurated or initiated to convey to the American people and the world at large outside of Mexico that Porfirio Diaz was not capable of protecting life and property; so in nearly all the cities of the republic these riots started.

Mr. KEARFUL. What result did they anticipate, upon showing to the world that Porfirio Diaz was incapable of protecting life and property?

Mr. SLATTERY. It appeared to Madero, and it appeared to a great many of the other malcontents, who were few in number at that time, that Porfirio Diaz had such a hold on the world at large that it would be a very unpopular thing to start anything in a regular way that would tend to defeat Diaz for reelection as president, so they took the other method of—as we use the word nowadays—propaganda, but it was armed propaganda. By having an outrage here, and another one there, and another one somewhere else, the impression would get out eventually that Diaz, after all, was not doing what he was supposed to be doing; namely, protecting life and property.

To get back to that period, I recall very vividly what happened in Guadalajara in September of 1910. We Americans were asked to get up some kind of a show. In fact, there was a day set aside for us, and we put on a set of athletic events. It was something new to them. They never had had them before. In fact, it was the first athletic meet that was ever held in Mexico. I was the chairman of the committee. I invited the governor out. The governor said, "Oh, well, it is going to be like all the rest of these festivities. You will say you will start at 2.30 and you will not get started until 4 o'clock." I told the governor we would start at 2.30, and that a pistol shot would be fired, and that the motorcyclists—which was to be our first race—would start at that time.

The governor was eating his dinner when he heard the motorcyclists go by. He immediately rushed out, got into his automobile, and came out to the races. He asked me to call him, notify him, at 5 o'clock, as he had another engagement to keep. He sat and watched those races, and at quarter of 5 I notified him. He said: "I am not going to leave here; I am so interested," and he remained.

The day after the races were over the governor sent for me and told me that he was so much interested in what he saw the day before that he wanted some of us to go into his schools at Guadalajara and arrange to have an athletic course, as he called it, and he could then understand why it was that these things appealed so much to the American people. As a result of the work at that time I received a medal from the Mexican Government, showing that at that time we Americans were not what we are considered to be to-day by the present Government.

Then, two months later, followed the anti-American riots. For two days and two nights the mobs just ran riot. Every American house was stoned. My house was stoned, and was not only stoned but was shot into. We got into a little trouble, for the reason that we met at the American Club, and we notified the governor that if he did not stop the rioting we Americans would take the streets ourselves that night, and we would stop it for him. This was after the second day. So the governor, knowing his American friends, and knowing they would carry out anything they threatened to do, saw to it that the rioting was stopped that night. In other words, there was no more rioting.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, patriotic pretext was there for this rioting?

Mr. SLATTERY. Absolutely none at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there no slogan or cry that they used?

Mr. SLATTERY. Well, of course, in some places it was "Viva Madero!" and "Mueran los Gringos!"—in other words, "Long live Madero!" and "Death to the Yankees!"

Mr. KEARFUL. What were your next troubles?

Mr. SLATTERY. Then came the four bad years. What I mean by the four bad years was that this life of security that I have spoken of suddenly disappeared. The flag of revolt seemed to be hoisted, and everybody in arms became nothing more than a downright bandit. You will recall that I said I consider the term "bandit" as used in that connection as meaning one who served in the armies of the various factions. There was never an outfit that rode into my place that did not have with them, flying, the flag of the Republic of Mexico.

I recall on one particular occasion when there were three different factions. They were the Villistas, the Carrancistas, and the remnants of the local faction out our way, which was called the Cervantistas; and each one of these three factions, while they were engaged in action, had the Mexican flag as their standard color.

During those four years we Americans always remained neutral. I remember that faction after faction would ride into our place and demand that we give them powder, and dynamite, and money, and all sorts of things, some of them even calling on us to shoe their horses and furnish iron and fix their guns; but we always stood on the principle that the revolution was none of our business, and that taking part in it would only get us into trouble, and we steadfastly refused to participate in it.

Some of the factions resented this, and as a result used to give us considerable trouble. Raids would take place. They would take place at the dead hour of the night, when we would be all in bed. They would come riding into the place, shooting it up, and then looting and pillaging and taking everything that they could get their hands on. The uncertain part of this whole thing was that nobody knew where we stood with our own Government. If an American got into trouble in Mexico, he just went to jail, and there he stayed. If an American defended his place, and if it happened that he killed, mind you, any of these bandits that rode in, he was arrested by the local authorities and put in jail, and there he remained until the local authorities felt good and ready to let him out, notwithstanding any appeal that would be made to have that man released through our own governmental channels. The consequence was that we did not have any security from the Mexican side and we had absolutely no security from our own side, and we were between the devil and the deep sea; so we just went on the even tenor of our ways, trying to work, and hoping that out of a clear sky there would some day come a pronouncement that all of this trouble in Mexico would have to stop.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did any such pronouncement ever appear?

Mr. SLATTERY. It has never appeared in my waking hours. I have often dreamed about it, but it has never appeared. The only pronouncement that has ever appeared from our Government—and I am very sorry I am forced to make this statement—was nothing but a proclamation of ridicule and of denunciation of that splendid type of men that went into Mexico to help develop Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Right there I want to ask you a question. It has been stated more than once, sometimes from high official sources, that the Americans operating in Mexico were not entitled to consideration because they were a class of speculators who had gone down there and obtained concessions from the Mexican authorities by means of bribery and fraud practiced on the Mexican people. What have you to say about that, with regard to the character of the Americans who were operating there?

Mr. SLATTERY. There is one man who has persistently made that kind of statements that I hope it will be my privilege to say to his face what I can not say very well here. That man is William Jennings Bryan, former Secretary of State.

If you will recall, some time in 1903 in his periodical called The Commoner, he wrote an article on Mexico. In that article, among other things, he said that he had been asked many times as to what advice he would give in regard to making investments in Mexico. He said that he had no general advice to give, as each would have to be judged by their own standards, but that the last consular report received showed that there were $511,000,000 invested in Mexico, and then he goes on in these nice, rosy terms that he can some times use when he wants to, and he painted a beautiful picture of Mexico. Well, from 1903 to 1910, considerable investments poured into Mexico. I do not want to give Mr. Bryan credit for being responsible for that, but it seems evident that somebody must have taken his advice, because in 1910 it was estimated that there was $1,000,000,000 of American capital invested in Mexico. Now, this same man has made the statement time and time again that the American flag should never follow any man that invests outside of his own country.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was when he was Secretary of State?

Mr. SLATTERY. That was while he was Secretary of State.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does that accord with the principle announced in the Democratic platform of 1912? Are you familiar with that principle?

Mr. SLATTERY. I am. That is why I hope I will not be getting away from this man Bryan. I hope you will bring me back to him.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have the platform there, have you not?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes; but I am almost trying to frame an apology. I was going to say I am a Democrat. I will say I was a Democrat.

When I went back to Mexico in 1912, after the election of Mr. Wilson, I had met all my friends gathered together in the American Club, and of course they were asking for the latest word from the States, and I told them that I believed we had a man now in the White House, or a man that would shortly go into the White House, that would take the proper stand toward the conditions affecting everyone who was living in Mexico. I recall this platform. Among other things it stated:

The constitutional rights of American citizens should protect them on our borders and go with them throughout the world; and every American citizen residing or having property in any foreign country is entitled to and must be given the full protection of the United States Government, both for himself and his property.

That is a beautiful paragraph, but so far as having been carried out is concerned, it is meaningless.

As I stated, knowing this, knowing the man as men meet their presidential candidates, I somehow got the conviction that with the election of Mr. Wilson things were going to change in Mexico; and I was just as anxious for a change not only for ourselves as I was for the Mexican people. When it is considered that I would estimate that not more than 400,000 men at the very outside have been engaged in rioting and revolution since 1910, and the other 16,000,000 people have been absolutely helpless, and we are not doing anything to save them.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think the sufferings of the Mexican people themselves are much more than the sufferings of the foreigners in Mexico, then, do you?

Mr. SLATTERY. My heart aches for them. I have often been asked, "Why is it that 400,000 people can dominate 16,000,000?" One must understand that during the lives of the Mexican people they have been brought up in fear. Mexico, almost from the days of the Spanish rule, has had a series of revolutions—revolution after revolution. I think there had been something like 300 revolutions in Mexico up until the time that Porfirio Diaz was elected president. He ruled them with an iron hand. When I say "he ruled them with an iron hand," I mean that he put into their hearts the fear that unless they obeyed the law they would not be given a jail sentence, but they would be taken out and shot. The consequence was that these people have been brought up with that fear. Now then, with these revolutionists, as we call them, the man with the gun, or the man on horseback, can sway five or six or seven thousand people.

That was the psychology of the Americans. That is, we fellows never had any fear throughout all this revolution. From 1910 to 1914, with all the raids, with all the holdups and all that sort of thing, during the trying days of 1914, there was never an American that I ever met that did not figure that he was capable of taking care of himself, no matter how big the crowd was that was attacking him, provided, of course, he was fully armed.

It is just like this: For instance, take Pennsylvania Avenue. I think that is one of your crowded places here. Take that avenue on a busy day. Let two or three drunken policemen, with a badge of authority on them, come riding up on that street with pistols in their hands, and ride through that mob; how many people back on Pennsylvania Avenue right here will undertake to take those pistols away from those two or three drunken policemen, particularly while they have a badge of authority? Now, you multiply that accordingly throughout Mexico, and you get the reason why 400,000 people under the badge of authority are able to dictate to and dominate 16,000,000 people.

These poor people, the rest of the people, have suffered, and suffered intensely. The best element of Mexico has been driven out of Mexico—the element which we call the 18 per cent, 18 per cent of the cultured class, the element that has been engaged in the arts and the sciences and the letters, the cultured people. Simply because they have had a little something, a little money or owned a little land, they were made the common enemy by all factions. As a consequence these people have been driven out, and are to-day on this side of the line, right here in the United States, hoping and praying in their own way that a remedy will be found some day to give back to Mexico the peace and prosperity that Mexico once enjoyed.

MR. KEARFUL. Coming back to Mr. Bryan, what was the first indication of his attitude toward Americans in Mexico that you received?

MR. SLATTERY. It was August 27, 1913, when we received or at least our consular agents received that famous telegram advising all Americans to get out of the country and to stay out until conditions were improved; and that telegram was so worded that he actually ordered you out by intimating that if you remained there you would get your country into trouble by remaining there.

MR. KEARFUL. He appealed to your patriotic sentiments?

MR. SLATTERY. He appealed to your patriotic sentiments to get out of the country so as not to endanger your Government by remaining there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the event occurring at that time that seemed to bring forth this telegraphic order?

Mr. SLATTERY. You will recall that it was in February, or just prior to the inauguration of Mr. Wilson as President, that President Madero and Pino Suarez and the whole Madero cabinet were overthrown by Huerta, and just prior to the inauguration of Mr. Wilson as President Mr. Madero was assassinated. Then followed those days of the Huerta régime. We Americans in Mexico, seeing the difference between Huerta and everything that preceded Huerta, from de la Barra's time down, realized that we had a strong man for President of the Republic, and deep down in our hearts we were all hoping that Mr. Wilson would recognize Mr. Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. Right there, what was the sentiment of the Mexican people generally with regard to Huerta?

Mr. SLATTERY. All over our section of the country, every place where I traveled, every place where I went, the hope and the desire was for Gen. Huerta. I will say that outside of those who were actually engaged in looting and pillaging, the sentiment would be unanimous. So, as I was saying, we were all hoping that Gen. Huerta would be recognized as provisional president. Then, like a bolt of lightning out of a clear sky, came the message from the President of the United States that he would not recognize Huerta, and shortly after that came a proclamation for us Americans to get out of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean while Mr. John Lind had been sent to Mexico to eliminate Huerta from the presidency?

Mr. SLATTERY. The President certainly picked—to use a slang expression, but it is the term we used down there—a lot of lemons in the representatives that he selected to represent him in Mexico, in the persons of Lind and Bayard Hale and others that he sent down there for the purpose of giving him information on the Mexican situation. You know John Lind's visit to Mexico City was a joke, and if it were not so serious it would be a comic opera. He came down there with his chest thrown out, that—well, he was a big fellow back in the United States, and he was coming down there to show those Mexicans how to do things, and he was the direct representative of the President, and all that sort of thing. He came there. Gen. Huerta met him and talked things over with him, and when he left Huerta and got through with that interview that swelling in his chest evaporated very quickly. Then when he attempted to bribe Gen. Huerta, practically bribe him—you can not call it by any other term—by saying, "If you resign, we will do so-and-so and so-and-so for you, and unless you do so-and-so, why I will go to Vera Cruz and leave," Gen. Huerta just called his bluff by pulling out his watch and saying to him: "Well, I think you have got about an hour and a half to make that train."

That is the kind of representative John Lind was. Had John Lind played ball with Nelson O'Shaughnessy, who was in charge of the embassy after Henry Lane Wilson had been recalled to the States, John Lind would have taken a page out of Mr. O'Shaughnessy's book, and all of us would have felt better. Many of us were personal friends of Gen. Huerta. I knew him intimately, and it is pretty hard to have a man like Gen. Huerta in private conversation turn around and ridicule the kind of men that were sent to Mexico to represent the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Recurring to the notice to get out of the country, what would have been the effect upon the properties of Americans there if they had obeyed the order and left the country?

Mr. SLATTERY. Absolute ruin. Mr. Bryan must have thought that we could take the mines that we owned and put them on our backs and bring them up here to the United States. He must have thought that such other men as were interested in business could just close the door, put the key in the door, and lock it, and get out. There was no notice with it of any time limit or anything of that sort, but to get out and get out immediately.

To answer the question more directly, I will simply say that the same thing would have occurred then that has occurred now, since we have been forced to get out.

Mr. KEARFUL. I was going to ask you what has happened to the properties of Americans who did eventually leave?

Mr. SLATTERY. That is the saddest story, I think, that has been written in the whole chapter of Mexico. Hundreds of Americans who have gone into Mexico, particularly in the mining field, with little or no capital, with that splendid opportunity of developing the country, took hold of these different little prospects such as I have described to you, paid their taxes and went right along and were all these years developing, and then came these days from 1910, but particularly from 1914, until this Carrancista régime—one law of taxation following another, absolutely impossible to operate, until finally one by one they are compelled to let go of their properties because they have not the money either to operate them or the money to pay the taxes on them. You can not raise a dollar, practically, for investment in Mexico, because everybody feels the insecurity of things in Mexico. Consequently, many of these boys who have struggled all of these years day after day—there is hardly a day passes that somebody is not wiped out. Those of us that have been fortunate are still hanging on, paying everything that comes along, but the great question is, When is the end going to be?

Mr. KEARFUL. You are hanging on at a distance, are you not?

Mr. SLATTERY. Well, I mean hanging on to what we have at a distance. We can not operate. I have been compelled to let six very fine properties go because I have not got the money to pay for them. I have not got the money to pay the increased taxes on them. I have not got the money to live up to some of the new laws compelling me to do a certain amount of work, and as a consequence I had to let go six very fine properties which I have spent considerable money in developing.

Mr. KEARFUL. If it had been possible for you to operate those properties, you could have made the payments without difficulty, could you?

Mr. SLATTERY. Why, if I had had two years more like the few years preceding, all of those properties would have been paying dividends to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. None of them have ever paid any dividends?

Mr. SLATTERY. Just one of them.

Now, then, to go back to your other question as to what damage has been done, I had one mine—the San Vicente mine—that it would take half a million dollars to unwater. There is a 900-foot shaft, with $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles of underground works. We were forced to flee; we were not able to keep our men there; I was not able to live there myself, and as a consequence we had to abandon everything. That mine has filled with water. The water is now flowing out of the collar of the shaft. The mill has been destroyed. All of our houses have been demolished; not only my own house, but the houses I had built for my neighbors and caretakers; they have all been destroyed. My fine laboratory and assay office has all been destroyed. Everything that was of value has been taken away from it. Now, that story is the story, I suppose, that you are listening to every day; so why should I repeat it?

Mr. KEARFUL. Not in respect to mines.

Mr. SLATTERY. Of course, you will understand that one of the reasons, perhaps, why you have not heard more—and I suppose you know this, too—is that every man who comes here and says a word about conditions in Mexico is practically a marked man. There is a peculiar law down there, known as article 33, the obnoxious foreigner. It is a law that the President has the power to exercise without explanation at any time; and anyone that speaks and tells the truth in regard to conditions in Mexico and says anything against the present Government finds, for instance, an order that "Your mine must do so and so." There will be some order issued that is absolutely impossible for you to carry out, and the next thing you know your property is confiscated.

That is my condition here to-day. If my story gets out to the world, I am a marked man so far as I am concerned; but I want to say to you right now that if what I am able to tell you here to-day—and I am telling you this under oath, all of my story—if it will be the means of making the American people realize what we have gone through in Mexico, I am willing to sacrifice every dollar I own in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are also aware of the fact that the Carranza government has recently issued an order that no American testifying before this committee will be permitted to return to Mexico?

Mr. SLATTERY. I only know that from hearsay. I never saw the order.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is a fact, and the committee has been very much embarrassed by it, particularly in getting mining men to testify.

Mr. SLATTERY. When I came out of Mexico in 1914 I had such a love and veneration, as it were, for the Democratic Party that all the way up on the trip I argued with the rest of the boys in my party that there was something wrong, to be patient, wait; there was a reason for all of it. We came up home and came down into Washington here with the greatest respect for everybody, hoping that we would be received, not as heroes—of course, not as heroes—but as American citizens, as men who had really risked their lives to carry out a principle for which all true Americans stand.

For instance, we fellows could have remained in Mexico. All we had to do was to put the British flag on us. If we had put up a British flag on us, or a German flag, or the Italian flag, we fellows could have all remained there, and remained there quietly; but have you ever heard of an American in Mexico that ever deserted his own flag in this crisis; that ever put any other flag on him to save himself?

Mr. KEARFUL. I will ask you that.

Mr. SLATTERY. I have never heard of one; and yet we have been called a lot of soldiers of fortune; we have been called speculators; we have been called gamblers. I do not know just exactly what the term is that we have not been called, and all of this has been brought about by this preaching of William Jennings Bryan.

I remember also, going back to his article, that he speaks of our soldier dead in the Mexican War that are buried in the suburbs of Mexico City. I know the spot very well. He tells that beautiful story in that article of how a representative of the Government every morning and every evening raises and lowers the Stars and Stripes, and how on Decoration Day flowers are put on the graves. Does any man know where Mr. Bryan has ever paid respect to some of our dead boys that have lost their lives while he was Secretary of State, who refused to have their flag insulted, to have their women insulted, who resented the outrages that were perpetrated on them? Has any man ever heard of where Mr. Bryan has ever said a kind word even for those men? Instead, he has slandered them by calling them "soldiers of fortune" and "representatives of material interests."

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the implication generally drawn by Americans with respect to what the United States was going to do when that order was given to get out?

Mr. SLATTERY. You mean that order of August 27, 1913?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. SLATTERY. It was the third-time "wolf." We had been told to get out on two previous occasions by President Taft, but, of course, in a different kind of language. This was the third time, and the funny part about it was that we in Mexico never desired to go out. We wanted to remain there. We felt that if the big show was going to be pulled off—we always called it "the big show"—we wanted to be there for it. None of us had any fear. In fact, when the proclamation came for us to get out on the 27th of August, the governor of our State, in the most sarcastic proclamation that I ever read, sarcastically replied to that, and begged and pleaded with us to remain there; that if our own country could not give us protection, he, the governor of that State, would give us protection; and that was Gen. Huerta's governor, Gen. Mier. He was governor of our State. So, when the cry of "wolf" came the third time, we had a meeting in the club, and we discussed it pro and con, and the American consul was present ready to receive suggestions, and so on, and he read the cablegram two or three times.

The one thing that seemed to stick in the craw of everybody was, "Your remaining there"—mind you—"will get your Government into trouble." In other words, "your remaining there will not get you into trouble, but it will get your Government into trouble," and that was the thing that was under debate: How could we possibly get our Government into trouble? Any trouble we had in Mexico since 1914 was given to us by the United States Government, by their meddling in the affairs of the Mexican Republic. As far as any troubles we got into were concerned, we could take care of our own troubles. When we had a bandit raid or a holdup on the trail—I think I know something about that kind of thing, as I have looked down into the barrel of a gun perhaps as often as any man in Mexico, as I always carried the pay roll myself so that I would not risk the life of one of my own men; I carried it for two years—we always, somehow or other, could take care of that kind of troubles; but once our Government interfered and commenced to tell the provisional President that he would not be recognized; commenced to tell him, “If you do not get out of there we will force you out of there,” commenced to tell some of these other officials where they were headed, and then finally going into Vera Cruz for the purpose of stopping the landing of arms from the Ypiranga, which the whole world knows were landed three or four days later at the port of Mexico, and then sacrificed the lives of 19 splendid American boys by that foolish piece of business—as I say, our troubles to-day, and the disrespect that is shown us to-day, are not because of what the Americans in Mexico did, but what the United States Government did in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had this meeting at the American Club, and what did you decide to do?

Mr. SLATTERY. Well, we discussed this thing from every angle. We had altogether in that section of the country about 700 people, American men, women, and children, and I think there were about 230 American men present at the meeting, something thereabouts. The discussion was: “This is the third time. There will be no action,” and they just seemed to be undecided; and I got up and I said, “Well, gentlemen, I do not want any man here to think I am denying my own country, but as this seems to be a question of getting my country into trouble, I think that for the time being I will align myself with a country that nobody seems to care to have anything to do with,” and I said, “That is the country that is known as Ireland,” and I got a green flag with a harp on it out there, and said, “That will be my country temporarily. I do not think that will get anybody into trouble.” The consequence was, they elected me Irish consul, you might say, there that afternoon, and they became my subjects temporarily. So we remained there, and we went about our business. Those succeeding days we seemed to be on more friendly terms with the Government because of our remaining there—I mean the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was Huerta’s government?

Mr. SLATTERY. That was Huerta’s government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive protection from the Huerta government?

Mr. SLATTERY. Oh, yes; absolutely. Then things went along all right, of course, up until the following April, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did anything happen that showed there was any real necessity for any American to leave the country?

Mr. SLATTERY. Absolutely nothing; and it was the old story, if you recall it, of trouble taking those that did go away. They left, and they lost thousands and thousands of dollars in their flight, because they took the order seriously. They got out, and of course their houses were sacked and looted while they were gone, and they suffered considerable damage.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was the next order to get out of Mexico?

Mr. SLATTERY. The next order came on about the 21st of April, 1914, and it came in the shape of a message that the fleet commander at Tampico had been ordered to have Huerta salute the flag by sunset of the 20th, I think of the 20th, and unless that order was complied with the armed forces of the United States would compel that salute. That cablegram was received 22½ hours after it was sent from Washington. We were called together by the American consul and the contents of that cablegram was made plain to all of us, and we felt that at last something definite was going to take place.

Many of us went down to the cable offices to send cablegrams home and get a line on what was going on. It was then that we had the first intimation that there was trouble. The man in the cable office refused to accept or deliver any cables.

That afternoon you could see in the faces of everybody the antagonistic feeling of the people. At this time we did not know what had taken place. That evening, the night of the 20th or 21st, conditions grew worse, and we could hear "Death to the Gringos," the old battle cry. The consequence was, the next morning we learned that Vera Cruz had fallen.

Then there was a wide expression of opinion as to really what we should do, and after discussing the matter very thoroughly, and taking the matter up directly with the governor of the State, the governor of the State said the best thing to do would be take our women and children to the seacoast town of Manzanillo. He said, "We have always been good friends and I don't like to make war on you, but if you see fit to return I will be forced to make war on you. But in any case I want to see that you get safely to the port with your wives and children. Your country has made war on Mexico. Your country has invaded our soil and have killed a number of our citizens."

And he went on in that way of his, describing what he considered insults to the Mexican people; at the same time, however, telling us he would do everything he possibly could to aid us to get out.

With those facts before us we realized that we were up against a different proposition than we were ever up against before. Mob rule was one thing, but mob rule with the government behind it was something else. Notwithstanding the fact, as I have stated, that we took care of ourselves, yet we knew that they could put cannon in the streets and on the housetops and could blow all the places of safety to smithereens. In addition to that, we also felt that he had acted so kindly and so decently toward us that, after all, we should take him at his word. Then again, the matter of what we would have accomplished ourselves by the sacrifice of one American life would perhaps not be worth it, because we were not an army, we were just simply a part of the American population that was in Mexico. So we decided to get out, and go to Manzanillo, which was a port down on the Pacific side.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far distant from where you were?

Mr. SLATTERY. About 160 miles or thereabouts. Oh, it is more than that. It must be at least 300 miles.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long did the trip take in ordinary time?

Mr. SLATTERY. In ordinary times it took about 12 hours to make the trip.

So we decided to assemble and make our getaway; that is, go to the port. We felt probably our warships were in the harbor, because they had been there three or four days before. Some of the officers and men we had entertained in our own homes. They had been there for two years. We decided that we would close up everything and go down to Manzanillo and put our women and children on board the ships, and those who desired to return might do so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you leave the property in the hands of Mexicans?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes. Do you want me to digress there and tell that?

Mr. KEARFUL. I think it would be well to state that.

Mr. SLATTERY. When the word came I called the storekeepers together that I have mentioned before. I had $7,000 in the safe. I turned the $7,000 over to these storekeepers, and said, "I want you to take care of my men while I am away. I do not know how long I will be gone, but I want my people to come to the store and get what they desire, and you take it out of this $7,000, and when that is out I will send you some more money." I figured to be gone only a very short time. I thought surely our coming into Vera Cruz, and not only coming into Vera Cruz but would come on into Mexico, come on into Tampico, and come down from the north. I thought they would go all the way; that no sane man would ever believe that they would simply go into Vera Cruz and stop, but they stopped just the same. So then I made all these arrangements with the men, and my own men begged me to stay there.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were loyal in the face of that condition, were they?

Mr. SLATTERY. They begged me absolutely to remain there; that they would give me every protection and so on, and appealed to me to stay; and I knew from the things that have followed that their promises would have been kept to give me protection, if I desired it. But, anyhow, I fixed everything up and came away.

Mr. KEARFUL. Proceed with the story of your trip.

Mr. SLATTERY. We assembled on that morning, I think of the 22d, from our various homes to the railway station. The lid was off, as we used the expression, and the whole town seemed to be up against it. Some of our best friends, as it would seem, not only pitied us but ridiculed us, that we were running away. They all looked upon us as in flight; that here are these braggadocio Americans that never had any fear, and are now running at the first sign of trouble.

We proceeded down to the railroad station. Coach after coach with Americans in them were held up, women and children were jostled about. The particular coach I was riding in, the mob attempted to hold it up, but by a little show of firearms we compelled the driver to take his choice of driving ahead and forcing his horses through the mob, or else to be quietly laid away in some quiet spot. He decided to go ahead, driving it, rather.

We got down to the railroad station and suddenly an order came that that train was not to go; that the train was needed for the moving of troops. Here we were, all huddled together in that railroad station, the mob on all sides of us, and we came back to the Cosmopolita Hotel, which was just across the street.

By this time the fury was just at its height. The mob stood outside the hotel, using the vilest kind of language, practically goading our people into resentment. Our men were not used to that kind of thing. I had lived a long time in Mexico, and knew what they would do, and I finally appealed to them that we were without organization, and it seemed to me every man was running the thing to suit himself; that one wild act might cause immense trouble; and that we should get down to an organization and select men to lead, men in whom we had confidence to lead, and to be guided by all orders that would be issued.

In consequence, I was selected to be the leader of that party, and I will say that every man, woman, and child obeyed to the last letter every order that was given. The principal order that I gave was that no matter what was said to us, no matter how they handled us, that we would not make reply and not use any display of fire-arms or go into a fight of any description, with one exception, and that was if they put a hand on any of our American women, then that order did not remain in force.

There were all sorts of threats of what they were going to do to our women, but we felt up until that time we would hold our position and keep cool. And I am happy to testify to-day that that was the kind of men I was associated with, and the kind of men that have been ridiculed in this country by our own Government officials.

The train didn't go. We were then forced by changed circumstances to get out of the hotel. It was a British-owned hotel. It was owned by a Britisher, and we were practically placing a boycott, as it were, on the hotel by remaining there. What I mean is, the impression would be gotten out that the hotel had taken us in, and that years afterwards the hotel would suffer because of that, because Mexicans, as a rule, never forget a wrong.

MR. KEARFUL. Or a fancied wrong.

MR. SLATTERY. Or a fancied wrong. At just about this time, Percy Holmes, the British vice consul, came along, and we got into a discussion. He knew I was on friendly relations with some of the officials in Mexico City, particularly Mr. O'Shaughnessy; and he said if I would take the full responsibility—would not put him in bad—we could all go out to the British consulate.

Well, it was a pretty hard thing to do, particularly for an Irishman, to go under the protection of the British flag. At the same time I did not have myself to consider. I had the lives of my people to consider; and we went out, and there we prepared for siege. We dug trenches, connected a water supply to the house, tapped the gas mains, so that we had a good flow of gas coming in. We had practically 300 people living in that house. In five or six hours we had everybody as comfortable as we could make them. We cooked and ate our meals there, and for a while it was like a picnic.

Then at night time, that same night, the mob kept up its fury, and about 10 or 11 o'clock word came to me that the Germans were down town celebrating with the Mexicans, and telegrams were being shown around how the Germans had assisted in the sinking of the Louisiana and some of our other battleships. The way the report came that day was that in the fight that had taken place the battleship Louisiana was sunk, and one or two of our other battleships got so scared with the fine marksmanship of the naval cadets in the Mexican Navy that they ran away and were beached on the coast; that their troops were then occupying Galveston, Houston, and New Orleans, and were on their way to Washington. Oh, it was great, the stories that appeared in the papers. By the way, I have those papers right with me, if you would like to look at them. It was the funniest thing that I ever read. That is, it was funny then. It is worse than our comic supplements that appear in the Sunday papers. You can look them over, about the Louisiana being sunk.

Mr. KEARFUL. I am familiar with the newspaper stories regarding that matter.

Mr. SLATTERY. Then came young Ahumada, the son of a former governor of the State. Young Ahumada was educated in the United States. He was educated in Harvard, and lived in the United States for years. He came out just about 11 o'clock at night. He always remained friendly right up to the last minute, but he said, throwing out his chest, "We are putting it all over you fellows. I have just got a telegram from my father." He showed me the telegram. His father was a Mexican senator. The telegram was from Mexico City, that the Louisiana was sunk, and these other battleships had been beached because of their fear. He was very much perturbed about us.

I just mention this little sidelight to show you, here was a man educated in the United States, at Harvard, lived here for a great many years, and with his intelligence he would believe rumors such as I have recited to you. Now, you can imagine the poor illiterate mind, the poor ignorant fellow, when he received that word, how it helped to fan the flame of passion, and so on.

I could not believe that story about the Germans sinking the battleships, or helping to sink the battleships, or that they were celebrating with the Mexicans in the cantinas. We had a kind of an underlying agreement with all foreigners, French, English, Spanish, Italian, and Germans, that if any trouble came everybody would naturally be taken for gringos, it being hard to tell the difference between an American and a Britisher, and so on, and we would all get together. And when the trouble came the French immediately volunteered, the British and all the others were absolutely at our disposal, but the Germans never came near us. At first I thought it was that old law of self-preservation, that they were looking out for themselves, and paid no attention to it. Then when I heard some of the names mentioned, I said, "No; that is not true." So I wanted to make sure about it, and I went down town to see for myself, and I found in the La Fama Italiana cantina and the Palacio cantina, here they were celebrating, all the Mexicans and the Germans. Even then I didn't think anything of it. I simply thought, "Well, oh, boy, you are just four-flushing in order to save yourself."

So it was not until this late war that I then understood what was meant by German propaganda; and then I understood why the Germans remained away from us; and then I understood why the Germans intermarried down there; and then I understood many things which I have never understood before about German interests in Mexico.

Well, to go back to my story, we had some night of it; up all night—the men—and the next day we were informed we could go to the railroad station, and a train would be waiting for us. Just before we started one of the most prominent lawyers in town came to me and told me the Quesaria bridge had been blown up and that we were taking chances going down. I then insisted that we must have a safe-conduct—that we must have Federal soldiers on our train. The governor received the request through the British consul. He would not deal with our consul or with us. It always had to be through the British consul. So we started, with the troops and the howling of the mob, in a wild flight to the seaport. When we came to Zaccalco the train was stopped, and all kinds of names were hurled at us. And then they capped the climax. The beautiful American flag—and you know the flag is always the most beautiful when you are in trouble, because every star means something to you, and every bar means something to you—and I remember how they took that flag and made that circle and applied a match to it and burned it.

You can imagine the feelings of every man, woman, and child on board the train, with that mob and soldiers out there, and as we started, the stones and bricks were thrown into the windows.

Well, we breathed a sigh of relief after we pulled out of that place. Every man remained cool. We started off, and with the exception of the burning of the flag, a repetition occurred at every station on the way down. We came into Colima, and we ran across the order of Gen. Delgadillo, the governor of the State. I don't know whether you ever saw that order or not, but it was an order where he gave us 48 hours to get out of the country, and if you didn't get out in 48 hours you had to become a Mexican citizen or something desperate would happen to you.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a copy of the original order?

Mr. SLATTERY. This copy was given to Mr. Stadden, vice consul, and I presume it is in his report to the State Department, if anybody is ever able to find it.

Mr. KEARFUL. This is written in Spanish. Will you please read it into the record in English?

Mr. SLATTERY. It says:

The citizen general of the State of Colima ordains to be communicated to you that I have conceded 48 hours from 12 o'clock this day for all individuals of North American citizenship to leave this country or to become Mexican citizens. I communicate this to you for your information. Liberty and constitution. Dated at Manzanillo, the 2d day of April, 1914.

I do not think this ever saw the light of day before in Government circles. It has always been denied, but this is a true copy of the original.

We came down to Colima, and were confronted there with that 48-hour order. That time had expired, and when our train came into Colima, which is the capital of that State, it was held up, and a general of the army boarded the train and he made a speech to us. He told us what a fine soldier he was, his love of his country, etc., the honor he had for the splendid Americans that have been in his country, but he says: "Your country is at war with my country." "This is a train supposed to be a safe conduct, given to you as a safe conduct, and you are traveling like an army. You all have firearms." He finally said, "I can not let you go through my State." We had passed from Jalisco into this other State. He said, "We can not permit you to go through as an army. You are practically combatants." So he made us a beautiful speech, and then ordered us to give up our firearms.

I immediately called a council and asked our boys what they thought. Our opinion was unanimous that it was a double-cross. I said: "It is true, but here we are in a box car, with a mob on each side of us, soldiers all around us, and he has given us 48 hours to get out of the country and the time is up. We may kill some of them, if a fight takes place, but they will get some who are near and dear to us. Let us give him the benefit of the doubt and take him at his word." So we gave up our firearms. He liked my gun so well that he strapped it on himself. I never will forget that particular incident.

After he got the guns, he went out on the station platform and he told the crowd that if that train was not out of there in 20 minutes the mob could do with us what they desired. Then action had to be taken, and taken quick. I saw the station master and train dispatcher, and finally got hold of the man that was supposed to be responsible for running the train. I went to him and I appealed to him to let us through. He refused to budge. Knowing some of the tactics of those men in high places down there, I said: "I will tell you what I will do. I will give you $350, all the money I have in my possession, if you will let this train through. Get us out of this station. It is only 20 miles outside. Let us get through." The $350 worked. The United States Government paid that same $350 later on.

MR. KEARFUL. The United States Government did pay the $350?

MR. SLATTERY. They paid all these bills. We paid the $350, and he permitted that train to move, much to the amazement of the governor and everybody else that was in the station.

Now, from that point we were absolutely helpless. There was not a gun in our entire party, but we were only a short distance from the coast of Manzanillo, and we started for Manzanillo. We arrived at Manzanillo at midnight, long after midnight, and instead of being greeted by the "jackies" that we expected to see around there, as we thought Manzanillo had fallen also, we were met by a mob far worse than anything we had yet encountered.

We also expected at least to see the American consul. We had telegraphed him we were coming. But, as I say, we arrived at Manzanillo, and we did not have a friendly face to greet us. There was an American consulate there, on a little knob upon the hill. I got our little party together and moved up, and here they were all around us, saying all sorts of things. We got up into that little place, and you would have to pass through a similar experience to realize what we went through with 239 people living in those three rooms all that night. We slept on the floor, those that were able to sleep, just as close as close could be, no word from anybody, not a friendly word from anybody; but outside was "death to the Gringos" from the howling mob.

Right next door down in the hollow was Simpson's Hotel. That place had been looted, as I found, and all the liquors in the place had been drunk up. So it was a wild, drunken mob. Speeches were made, that we could hear, of what they were going to do, how they were going to massacre us, etc.

The next morning we saw out in the harbor, just at daybreak, the outlines of a little tramp steamer, and immediately we tried to get into communication with that boat. We found on investigation that it was a tramp steamer, which was in the Chinese trade, and had on board 334 Chinamen. It was flying the German flag. It was called the Marie, a little 3,300-ton boat, that was bringing over 334 Chinamen to land in Mexico; but, on account of the quarantine regulations, it had to stay outside the harbor limits until the 10 days' time had expired before they could land and take on food and provisions.

It was time for us to get in communication with some one, so I made up my mind to go myself to the general commanding the troops. I went up to his office, accompanied by Arthur Earnest, right through that mob; the most bitter experience I ever had was the going through that crowd. We went in and saw him, and as soon as he saw us he began right away to insult me. Then I started in to give him my story. I told him what I wanted. I told him that our helpless men, women, and children only wanted a breath of fresh air; that I only desired to get my people out on board that boat; that his own Government gunboat was in the harbor, and we could not get away if they wanted to hold us; that we wanted to get on the boat so we could get some fresh air and some water to drink; that some of our folks had not had anything to eat since the day before.

He asked me what I wanted him to do. He asked me if I wanted him to go up and entertain us. He said: "Don't you know your Government is at war with my Government? I am glad to see you suffering, and I want you to suffer. The more you suffer the better I will enjoy it."

I happened to have in my possession a pass from Gen. Mier, which I had received but a few days prior to the outbreak of the hostilities. We were having some trouble at the mines, and there was a battle going on every day, and the government thought somebody was carrying information, so they put an embargo on the road, and that meant there was to be no travel over the road. So I appealed to Gen. Mier, who was a friend of mine, and he gave me this pass.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is a safe conduct, is it not?

Mr. SLATTERY. Practically a safe conduct.

Mr. KEARFUL. Dated April 7, 1914, signed by Gen. Mier?

Mr. SLATTERY. Gen. Mier himself. So I presented that. It was a risky thing to do, because it was two weeks before the uprising that I had received it, but I presented it. This seal in the corner is all I wanted him to get a glance at. I knew this man at Manzanillo was of very much lower rank than Gen. Mier. So I told him that Gen. Mier had given me that, and that if I had thought that was the way Gen. Mier's orders were to be respected I would not have shown that document.

As soon as he saw that document he immediately changed, and he told me that he did not have anything to do with it, but that the jefe politico was in charge. I located the jefe politico at the Simpson hotel, with 30 other scoundrels, and I never saw men that could possibly become so intoxicated in my life. These fellows were all well armed, with belts full of cartridges. I picked out the jefe the first of all. They started in to say what they were going to do with us, among themselves, to send me back as a horrible example. But I stayed with the jefe and told him the general wanted to see him. I did that because I wanted to get the two leading officials together and see which one was lying to me. I was not going to be chasing all over Manzanillo in that mob.

When I got the two together the jefe said, "You wished to see me?" The general said, "No; no." I said, "Yes; you sent for him." He said, "No; I didn't." I said, "Maybe I do not understand Spanish well enough." He said, "There is nothing wrong with your Spanish. You can talk good Spanish."

I said, "Gentlemen, I am going to be plain with you. I want my people on board the ship, and I want no more trouble. I will give you 1,000 pesos if you will give me the privilege of putting my people on board the ship."

There is the receipt for that $1,000. I knew it was a question of money. I knew you could get anything out of those in authority with money in a crisis like this. I felt that I was not taking any chances in doing it, because I figured I could get away with it, and the $1,000 worked, because when we went out after my interview an order was issued to put our party on board this ship.

We had to pass through a single file with this mob on either side of us. They formed a lane, and we had to go through it, and all the vile things that were ever uttered by human beings, those things were said to our women and to our children and to ourselves. We marched down that lane and got to the dock. They then started in to search us, to see that we were taking no firearms and no silver or gold out of the country. Everybody had to spread what possessions they had out on the dock, and they went through them just the same as if they were looting and pillaging in some of the raids I saw.

The ship was out quite a distance in the harbor, and we had to transport our people in little lighters. We put our women and children on the ship first, and put one man to go back and forth, so as to be sure that the fellow who was running the gasoline launch would not get funny.

After we had landed our people on board the ship, there were just 16 men left on the dock ready to be taken on the boat, and there was a commotion of some kind, which we afterward learned to be the signal that a warship was coming. The whole population became excited. That general came down on the dock on horseback, with his soldiers, about 1,200 of them, and charged all over that dock. They forced the 16 of us back over on the railroad track, up to the consulate and then back from the consulate to the railroad track, where they had a train under steam with flat cars.

And here was the prettiest example they gave us of what they were going to do with American invaders. The night before they were telling us how they were going to shed the last drop of blood to defend their patria and here, at the first sign of an American warship the whole kit and crew were running to the flat cars, with a train steamed up ready to pull away, and we fellows on board those cars were to be carted away with them and held as hostages.

After two hours we found it was not a warship at all, and we were brought back to the dock. While we were there they gave us what they said was something to go back home and tell. That something was to line us up in a semicircle, and they went into the American consulate and took down the three American flags that were on the wall and put them on the ground, and those soldiers marched over those flags. If you turned your eyes away you got a punch with a bayonet or the butt of a gun to make you keep your head up and look at it. They did that for 15 or 20 minutes. Then one of the girls of the street down there with the soldiers came up and put the torch to the flags, lit the match to it, and those flags were burned in our faces, while we listened to the insults of the soldiers and the mob. They took the ashes and threw them in our faces and said, "We have insulted your women, burned your flag, and thrown the ashes in your face. What must we do to make you fight?"

I have told that story and put it in writing. Here is a copy of the story complete, dated the 12th day of June, 1914, and handed to Mr. Bryan, your then Secretary of State, and he dignified that story with a three-line letter, which reads: "My secretary has handed me your report on conditions in Mexico, just prior to my leaving, and I wish to thank you for it. I have not had time to read it yet, but expect to do so shortly." The "yet" has never arrived, because he has never answered it. And notwithstanding that, for the four weeks following the time that report was given to Mr. Bryan the newspapers carried the story that he was out delivering chautauqua lectures; and yet he did not have time to listen to the story of 16 Americans being compelled to witness the desecration of his own flag.

We got on board that boat, and we found that it was a tramp steamer, 334 Chinamen on board, only 9 cabins. The captain of the ship, Theodore Davidson, said that he would take us out of danger, because the chances were that our fleet must be in the close vicinity.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his nationality?

Mr. SLATTERY. He said he could not take us to the States, because he did not have food and provisions, and did not have any water; that the water in his tank was low, and he could not replenish it until the 10 days' quarantine regulations were up.

So we started some scouts out and bought something, some eggs, some rice and flour, and things of that sort. We brought them on board the ship ourselves, through friendly native servants that we had brought along with our party.

We got out on the high seas, expecting, of course, to see one of our warships. But there was no warship in sight. It then became a question of handling the ship. The captain, hearing that I had been in charge of the party, asked me to also take charge of the ship. He said that he would see to steering the ship, but as far as the keeping of health and regulations and rules, he would look to me, notwithstanding the fact that he had two American consuls on board. We selected a committee of 25 or 30 men to police the ship. We kept the Chinamen down under the decks, and we took the top decks. The 269 men, women, and children slept on that top deck. We ate twice a day, a meal consisting of bread and potatoes. Breakfast was the same as our afternoon meal.

The water we had on board—we put a man in charge of the water, and he used to parcel out little drinks of water about that big. The most pathetic thing in the world, if you want to see real pathos, something which will really touch your heart, is to be in charge of a tank of water when it is low, and to see little kiddies coming up and begging for a second drink, and you can't give it to them. That was what we had to go through on that ship.

We picked up the Albany about the third or fourth day, supposed to be the flagship of the fleet.

Mr. KEARFUL. The American fleet?

Mr. SLATTERY. The American fleet, the Pacific Fleet. We hailed the Albany, and they came to, and a boat was lowered and came over and asked what we wanted. We said "First of all, if it is possible, to take us aboard. If you can not do that, give us food, provisions, and water, and give us blankets. Our people do not have any blankets." The boat went back to the ship, and in a short time came back and said, "We have instructions to give you food or provisions, or to furnish you with blankets. We can not take you on board. We will radio some of the transports that are coming down to be on the lookout for you." No transport ever received that radio, if it was ever given, because we didn't see anything until we reached San Diego, Calif.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the sanitary conditions on board the boat?

Mr. SLATTERY. There were only three toilets on the entire ship. One on each side of the ship, and one down in the hold. The one down in the hold we turned over to the Chinamen. Of the other two, we took one side for the men and one side for the women. And in order to keep that sanitary condition, keep everything just right, we put a man on guard. It was a very delicate thing to do, but fortunately our women understood, and we had it guarded so as to see that the thing was properly flushed and everything was kept clean and all that sort of thing.

The funny thing about it, we had a sort of bulletin that we typewrote and put out on the ship, and when you read it now it is very funny. This was one of the rules and regulations that we put up on board so as to keep it in sanitary condition. For instance, it says:

Buckets of water will be stationed at different points on the ship for washing purposes. Salt water will be used, because we find it necessary to conserve fresh water for drinking purposes only.

So we arrived at San Diego, and we expected to see everybody keen on the war situation, because of the bulletin we had received from the Albany. It was stated in this bulletin they gave us:

The following word was brought to the ship this morning from the United States Cruiser Albany, that President Wilson has received a communication signed by all the South American Republics, asking him to cease hostilities, and that they would use their good offices to bring about a peaceful solution of the problem. President Wilson replied he had not heard from Mexico, and was waiting for a reply on conditions, and when that was received if he found that any outrages had been committed on American citizens, the combined nations of the world would not prevent him from intervening.

That message was brought to us. Naturally, when we arrived in San Diego and we saw the flags flying, we thought war was on. Instead, we found it was simply a celebration of the G. A. R. or some anniversary or something out there, and instead of hostilities being on they were arbitrating the situation up in Buffalo.

Now, what we considered the most shameful treatment of all, was the reception we received was on our arrival in San Diego. Some of us had not had our clothes off for 10 days. We did not, of course, look like polished dudes. We had a growth of beard on our faces, and had been washing in salt water, and you do not shave very well in salt water. We looked like a lot of tramps when we arrived at San Diego, and that is the way we were treated. We were treated as such by the representatives of the Government who were spending that part of the fund which had been appropriated to take care of the refugees that were coming out of Mexico. For instance, they were giving 25 cents a meal for each person, and allowing them 25 cents for a night's lodging. When I heard of that—as soon as I arrived in San Diego, I thought our troubles were over, and I immediately went to a hotel. A short time afterwards, I was phoned for, and I was told of this condition, and I went down and I found the condition to be so. When I protested against it, I was told, "You are nothing but a lot of tramps anyhow. You had no right to go to Mexico or to remain in Mexico, and whatever suffering you have been put to was simply coming to you." That was the sort of reception we received. It was bad enough to get that handed to you down south of the Rio Grande, but when your own people tell you that when you come back to God's country, it puts you in a different humor.

So I looked up the leader of that whole program—I think it was Baughman, some name like that; anyway, he was a banker, the Baughman Trust Co., or something of that sort. I said to him, "this party represents a total investment in Mexico of $27,000,000. Now, they have been through a heavy strain, and they are not thinking just right, and for God's sake don't treat them like a lot of tramps. Put them in a hotel and treat them like white people. They can pay for it, but they are not just ready yet to make their minds function. They are just acting like a lot of children."

I made that appeal to him, and the consequence was that he did a little better for everybody, excepting that his instructions were from the State Department to send them back second class. In other words, no first-class transportation could be paid for out of this money, but we were all looked upon as second-class cattle.

From that day to this I have never accepted a dollar from the United States Government. I mean by that, that I refused to get back anything I had spent from the moment of my arrival in San Diego. I refused his offer to pay my transportation home. I have on more than one occasion been invited to go out on the lecture platform and tell of these outrages, for which I would be paid, and I have refused, and I have refused to accept money for such lectures. I have been asked to write newspaper articles, for which I would receive pay, and I have refused to accept pay for them. You have asked me to come here and you have said if I would come you would pay my expenses. I will tell you now, I will not accept any expenses you can pay me for the very reason that I never want to have it said that, when my story is presented to the world, "He is an ingrate; he has received this or that, and he is commercializing his knowledge of Mexico," and all that sort of thing.

So our people were treated in that way, by our own Government. We met the refugees from San Francisco, also those who came to

New Orleans and Houston, and heard their stories, and then we formed a committee to come down here to Washington.

Well, I had the feeling, with a Democratic administration in office, that the proper people to visit would be Democratic Congressmen and Democratic Senators. So I started to interview some of them. A feeling came over me one day that Peary did not discover the north pole at all. It seemed to me it was right here in Washington, so far as one American was concerned.

So it was not until I ran across one Congressman, who was persona non grata at the White House because he had voted against the tariff bill, against the Underwood bill, that any Democrat would be interested in our cause, because the present administration was fixed in its ideas in regard to Mexico, and any man who came here with a story such as mine would not be listened to.

I happened to learn that John Callan O'Laughlin was living here, and I concluded I would look him up. I remembered going down on the train with him in Mexico when he had his famous interview with Mr. Diaz. So I looked him up, and Mr. O'Laughlin made arrangements for me—I do not know through what channel—to see the Secretary of State. I came over at 10 o'clock in the morning and the Secretary was too busy to see me, notwithstanding the fact that an appointment had been made. I just managed to see him as he came out. I was in that big room and he came out of a little room on the side and snapped me off with a statement something like this, as near as I can recall it: "Well, you were told to get out of Mexico on the 27th of last August. Why didn't you get out?" That was the sort of reception I got; and then I commenced to meet some of the other boys from Mexico and their treatment was about the same.

One night I ran into Judge McConville, a resident of Washington, whom I knew in Mexico very well. He used to come down there and spend the winter there, he and his wife, and I got to know them very well. So I mentioned to him why I was here. I met him with two other gentlemen, Mr. Hoeing and Dr. Gleason, who were on the committee with me. Then he arranged an interview through Congressman Addison Smith, with Senator Borah and Congressman Mondell.

MR. KEARFUL. Borah and Mondell are both Republicans, are they not?

MR. SLATTERY. Senator Borah, of Idaho. I would not describe them as Republicans, but I would call them red-blooded Americans.

MR. KEARFUL. They are not Democrats?

MR. SLATTERY. I will still stick to my statement, that they are red-blooded Americans. In any case, to give them a political term, they are not Democrats.

I will never forget my interview with Senator Borah. It was on the balcony of the Senate. He listened to me. I did the talking for the committee. I was asked to do the talking. He asked some questions, and he got up with his two hands behind his back, and he turned to me and said: "If you had not come to me as well recommended as you have, I would think you were the most colossal liar I ever met." I said to him, "Senator, what I am telling you, what I have told you is so true that I am willing now to deed over to you in fee simple every piece of property I have in Mexico, if you can find any part of my story that is not absolutely true, or is in any way exaggerated." And I remember him also saying, "And yet we thought we knew something of conditions in Mexico."

We left him, and went to Congressman Mondell, who also received us very cordially and very patiently. He listened to our whole story, and the first question he asked was, "Is your story before the State Department?" We said, "No; they won't listen to us." He said, "Well, you must get it before the State Department." I said, "I will never go back to the State Department." He said, "You must do it, because when one gets on the floor of Congress and they are asking questions about this or that, some one will raise the point and ask us if the State Department knows about this. It will be difficult to do anything with it, if this matter is not in the hands of the State Department."

And it was for that reason that that story was written, that has never seen the light of day, that has been buried in the archives over there. And that was sent to Mr. Bryan. I took it to him personally, so as to give it to Mr. Bryan personally. He refused to see me, and I had to give it to his secretary. He took it, and I was compelled to write to get an acknowledgement of it.

It was after that that Senator Borah delivered that famous speech of his in the United States Senate, when he recalled some of the incidents that are recited in our story. One particular thing was that any flag that flies in the air that does not respect its citizens is nothing but a dirty rag and should be hauled down. That speech put hope into every American in Mexico that there was at least one man who was willing to believe our side of the case.

I suppose the newspapers will understand what I mean when I say this. It is not out of criticism of the press, but it seemed to me that even the press got a mistaken notion of it. They looked upon us, whether the articles were inspired or not, as if we were just so much riffraff.

Let me illustrate what I mean. The late Richard Harding Davis, the novelist, was sent to Mexico as a special newspaper writer to tell of the conditions in and around Vera Cruz. The articles written by Mr. Davis would always wind up: "This is the story of a refugee, and you can take it for what it is worth." It was that sting, it was that insinuation, that when an American in Mexico related his experience it was something you could take for what it was worth. Yet four days after he wrote that kind of an article he was caught himself. Here is an article he wrote, and if you compare his own story, the story he told in his own case, some one could very well say, "This is the story of a special newspaper writer that was sent down there, who has met with the same experience as the Americans who have been down there." I recall also the time of the special newspaper train that came, how a number of newspaper men of the United States accepted the invitation to come down there and see and write up conditions. I remember meeting those gentlemen in Guadalajara, thinking there might be some one from my own home town. I went down to see the outfit. I didn't meet anybody I knew, but at the same time I went up and extended them the privilege of coming to our American club and said we would like to have the privilege of entertaining them. But the consequence was we were told they were in charge of the Government party and could accept no invitations. Some of us had been reading some of the truck they had been writing, and we appealed to them to give us a chance and we would tell them some inside stuff. We were adventurers, soldiers of fortune, and all that sort of thing, and no attention was paid to us.

And yet, when that same outfit was caught at San Luis Potosi—that was the funny thing about it—they were taken around the circle of territory that was not having any trouble, and I volunteered to take them four hours from where we were standing and to show them a real insurrection. Anyhow, going up to San Luis Potosi, a part of the program slipped, and they had a real fight, and these fellows were captured and put in jail and were kept there about a week. I will never forget Leslie's correspondent, in particular, the correspondent of Leslie's Weekly. He was man enough to say that, "All the stuff I have been writing heretofore was simply manufactured, but had I taken the word of those that were willing to give it to me I could have written as I am writing now." From that time on he commenced to tell it, but it took that experience for him to get started right.

Another thing that is running through my mind. The curious thing of the whole thing has been the attitude of the American people toward this situation. We did not expect to be wined and dined or to be made heroes of, but yet when the real story is written you will find there were some boys down there who did deeds of valor far better than some for which the award of Congress was given, and they have never been recognized. And instead of being treated as common, ordinary, everyday citizens, we were looked upon as trouble-makers.

You are the ones that are causing the trouble. You fellows own oil lands, the mines, the investments there. You are stirring up trouble. You want your Government to go in there and do all this. You are nothing but troublemakers and we have no time for you, and our flag does not follow investments anyhow. You ought to have stayed back in your own country.

I will never forget one visit in New York in 1914, and I had with me Jim Gibson, one of the greatest sheriffs that the Texas southwest ever had, a man that is in his seventies now, a man that has seen all the things I am telling you, a man of wonderful reputation, and a man who was with me in Mexico, lived with me. We were in New York with our committee, and we had Jim. We went out to have lunch. It was around 3 o'clock. The first thing we knew they commenced to dance. That was something new to me—dancing at 3 o'clock in the afternoon—and I called the waiter over. I had been out of the country a long time. I said to him, "What is this going on here? Dancing right in the middle of the floor of the restaurant, and at 3 o'clock in the afternoon?" He looked at me as if I was some horrible example escaped from the asylum, and he said, "This is the business men's dance." I said, "The what?" and he said, "This is where these men come out and relax for an hour, from 3 o'clock to 4."

Then, when I saw the kind of dancing, not the old-style waltz, but this tangoing, as they call it, I will never forget the remark of Jim Gibson. It was very characteristic, and was a summing up in his mind the attitude of the American people. He said, "By God, the patriotism of the American people has gone to their feet." That is the attitude that Jim took toward that; that they were not interested, were so mad making money and keeping up with the wild rush of things that they didn't want to be bothered, didn't want to be troubled, didn't want to hear about those troubles the Americans were having down there.

So we suffered in silence, and I would like to ask the world if ever in the history of any nation, there has ever been a case where men, women, and children have suffered, suffered in silence, like the Americans in Mexico.

My own wife for four years has been under the doctor's care. She lived in Mexico, because she refused to desert me. She wanted to be right with me. She knew my future was tied up in Mexico. She had confidence that my people around me loved me and would take care of me. She suffered there. During the bandit raids time and time again she was in the house when it took place. She saw the horrible way in which these fellows went through the houses and looted and pillaged and destroyed. At different hours of the night she would have to jump up from bed with a rifle in her hand, to be ready to take her stand to help defend the home. She lived through all that. She went through all these conditions from 1910 to 1914.

When she came out, as every woman on the ship will tell you, she was practically a mother to everybody, and yet she a young woman. She never went to bed at night on that trip until everybody was covered. She never whimpered, never complained, she was always standing beside me in a crisis. The most wonderful woman in the world.

It was not until Villa made his famous raid on New Mexico that she collapsed. Then she repeated to me almost word for word the very same things she said to me in Manzanillo. Going back to that incident, when it looked as if the mob was going to get to us, she said to me, "I beg of you to kill me, and not let me fall into the hands of these people." The night Villa made his raid on New Mexico, she woke up and repeated that same thing, word for word.

For four years we have been trying to find something that will cure her—her nerves are shattered. I have had the best doctors I can find, and for four years that woman has been an invalid, the direct result of what she has gone through in Mexico.

About the same time President Wilson was stricken last year, she had a cerebral hemorrhage and was unconscious for 41 days. She is slowly recovering from that attack, so you can see what anguish I have suffered, yet I have remained patient and hopeful.

Jack Delaney, my superintendent, is to-day the inmate of a sanitarium, an insane asylum, as a direct result of the strain he has been under.

Billy Hoeing, another man associated with me, died of a broken heart a few weeks ago, and is now buried in the lonely hills of Mexico.

I could go right on down the line showing you that Americans in Mexico have never committed any crimes; they have paid for everything they got, and their own Government has gotten them into all the troubles that have taken place within the last five or six years, and they are passing out one by one.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there a number of other matters subsequent to that time that you have not been able to follow?

Mr. SLATTERY. Of course, you understand that after my wife was taken sick correspondence practically stopped. My wife corresponded with almost all these women.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there a number of women and children in the party?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes. I have a letter here which I appreciate more than a medal. During those bad days on the ship we had a bulletin board, and on that board we used to put the items of interest. The ladies placed this paper on the board, written and signed by all the women on the ship. It reads:

In appreciation: There is no circumstance nor group of circumstances that can show the general character of the dramatis personae more than when sudden action is demanded. We have experienced it; and the spirit and disposition of the American men was plainly shown. After the quick flight and the strenuous circumstances, when patience, endurance, bravery, diplomacy, and courage were necessary, our men were not found wanting. The women interested are both thankful and grateful from the depths of their hearts that they have men to whom they have looked and have not been disappointed.

That was signed by every woman on the ship.

Mr. KEARFUL. About how many?

Mr. SLATTERY. About 125 to 150.

We kept quiet, as I said, and suffered in silence and all that sort of thing until after Huerta was overthrown and forced out, and then Mr. Carranza took over the reins of government, and then came these attacks on the churches. I felt then that it was beyond the bound of reason to expect silence any longer. In other words, they were doing some things—making attacks upon churches—which were so vile that any American with red blood in his veins should talk. And I made up my mind that, so far as I was personally concerned, it was immaterial to me what happened to me, and I was going out to tell the story as well as I could. When the raids on the churches took place, I wrote to my agents down there to find out if there was any truth in it. The replies received were to the effect that the churches were closed; that some of the churches—in particular, the cathedral—were used as stables; that they were not only used as stables and barracks, but the beautiful pictures and paintings had been destroyed; that all those beautiful things which Catholics hold near and dear were being desecrated; that these outrages were being committed on religious orders and sisterhoods. So I made up my mind that if all the teachings that I had learned in my early childhood meant anything to me, it was about time I put some of them into execution; that above everything else principle stands out in a man's life; that if he is going to be selfish where his own property is concerned, and is going to keep quiet simply because it is going to save himself, then real manhood goes out of a man's life and selfishness takes its place. I made up my mind, irrespective of what it was going to cost me, I was going to go out on the public platform. And wherever I went I have paid my own car fare and taxi fare and railroad fare and hotel bills; so that no man in public or private life could say I was commercializing the work—getting profit from it. Yet the Secretary of State never made a speech while he was Secretary of State that he did not collect for so doing.

As a consequence, I remember walking into a meeting—I am a Catholic—I remember walking into a meeting of the Federation of Catholic Societies holding a session in Baltimore, and I learned there that even these men did not believe that such things were going on in Mexico. “Well, that is hearsay. That is the word of a refugee.” Everybody seemed to just have that opinion of everything that came from Mexico, that it was nothing but a lot of lies. Even that Federation refused to believe that such things were happening down there until I took the liberty of taking the floor. I had no right to be there. I was not a delegate or anything of that sort. I simply told them in my own way some of the things I knew.

Then it was that a committee was appointed to see the President, or to convey to the President of the United States that these outrages in Mexico would have to stop, or to ask him to see that they were stopped. Whether any action was ever taken or not I do not know, excepting I was told afterwards that they—these bandits—had the idea that the desecration of these churches was sort of welcomed by the people of the United States, and that was one of the reasons why they were doing it, but just as soon as they got the order to stop, they stopped—or Villa stopped, but Carranza never did stop.

And so it was that I invited trouble for myself. I invited denials from the State Department, I invited charges from my own Government, I invited trouble for myself from Mexico, and I am getting it, so far as Mexico is concerned. But I have never had any of my statements denied. Whether they have read them or not, I do not know, but, thank the Lord, I have always carried my proofs with me.

MR. KEARFUL. I want to ask you an important question. It was reported at one time in the newspapers that the Carranza soldiers had been guilty of violating the nuns in Mexico, and, as it threatened to become an important part of the campaign issue in 1916, with reference to the party of President Wilson, that statement was denied by Mr. Tumulty, the President's Secretary, upon the authority of the Catholic archbishop in Mexico. The committee considers that a very important point. Can you undertake to name any witness, or procure any witnesses who can testify directly upon that subject?

MR. SLATTERY. I would like to know just what proofs the State Department would call “proofs.” Personally, if we get right down to it, personally I never saw an outrage committed. If a man is murdered out there in that corridor, and I am told by somebody around here that that man was murdered, I do not see the actual killing take place, and yet I see the actual body lying there, and all the evidence pointing to it. I naturally come to the conclusion that the man is dead—is murdered. Now, the thing that gets me raving with the State Department is what the State Department wants, what they call proof.

Influential residents of Mexico have time and time again, from all parts of the Republic, in writing to me, have written to me of the outrages that happened to the nuns, the sisterhood of Mexico. I think I have a letter with me to-day from the British consul at Guadalajara, reciting in his letter how he escorted the nuns under the protection of the British flag to Manzanillo. Is there anyone who doubts the truth of the stories of the attacks on these nuns?

Why would they want to fly? Why would they want to leave Guadalajara?

I could not go out and put my hands on a sister, one of those saintly sisters, and say that this one or that one was attacked. I can't do anything like that. But, gentlemen, so far as the proof is concerned, to get these saintly women to testify, nothing on earth will ever get them to testify.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is not necessary, but there must be witnesses in existence who have seen them, and who can testify to these attacks, to the situation in which they were found, what had happened. If these outrages have been committed on the scale that has been stated, there must be witnesses who can testify to such facts as would render the matter incontrovertible.

Mr. SLATTERY. Then you would either have to get the saintly women to do it themselves, or you will have to get some of the cutthroats that did it. Then you will get back to the question, "Can you take the word of a cutthroat?"

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there no men who saw these women taken out, and saw their condition?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And knew what had happened to them?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes. I think if you could get hold of Chaplain Joyce, you could get some information.

Mr. KEARFUL. You can perform no greater service to this committee than to get some witnesses who will testify to that effect.

Mr. SLATTERY. I will attempt to do it.

Mr. KEARFUL. I understand Father Joyce was chaplain at Vera Cruz?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes; and who received most of the nuns that were coming out.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever apply to the State Department, after the experience that you have related, for advice as to going back to Mexico?

Mr. SLATTERY. On several occasions.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is not necessary to read the correspondence, but give the effect of what occurred.

Mr. SLATTERY. On the 19th day of August I wrote to the State Department, addressing my letter to Mr. Bryan, and asked him if it were possible for us to get passports to go back to Mexico. My correspondence will show, not only the correspondence, but in all my dealings with the State Department, even my reports that are on file, that I never wrote in a fault-finding sort of way; that it was always for the purpose of helping or assisting. Somehow or other I had the feeling that if we would help those who were in the dark, maybe they would come around some day and give the fellows who are in Mexico a chance to lend them assistance and cooperation. So in my letter of August 19, I asked to go back to Mexico, because of certain conditions that prevailed down there. I reiterated these promises of being of assistance to them. I received a reply on the 21st of August, in which the department advised that it did not deem it advisable to withdraw the advice previously given to Americans still remaining in Mexico.

Shortly after that, on October 28, I wrote again, and I received a reply to the effect that they were sending a vice consul to make a report on conditions. On November 10 I received a further letter that all the courts, both civil and criminal, had been closed; that the feeling toward Americans was bad; that minor uprisings were occurring; that loans were being forced from the inhabitants; that few of the churches had been permitted to reopen during the past two weeks; that petty robberies had been numerous; and that martial law prevailed. It does not say, "You can not go back," or "We will give you passports," or anything else.

On November 12 I acknowledged the receipt of that letter, stating that I wanted to go back to Mexico, to which I received no reply.

I then went down to El Paso and hung around on the line, because our troops were along the border, and I thought if the troops went in I would take the chance and go in with them. I thought I could be of some assistance for the reason I knew the trails, knew the water holes, knew the mountainous country; and I thought I could perform some act of service and also get into Mexico and see how things were getting on.

But, as things were going from bad to worse, I took a chance and went into Mexico myself; and I was caught at Aguas calientes, at the time Villa had been attacked by Obregon at Celaya, and his entire forces were on their way north. We were detained at Aguas calientes and remained there three weeks, could not go south or north. Then we came back to Chihuahua, which is the capital of the State and was Villa's capital. I then came back to El Paso and remained there a while and came home disgusted.

On March 11, 1916, I called attention to the new laws that were going into effect, increasing taxes, and which were of confiscatory character. On March 18 I received a reply from the State Department saying that they had repeatedly endeavored to obtain a modification. "Repeatedly endeavored," but they never could say "we have accomplished it." They were always "endeavoring." We are always in a state of turmoil, so far as this Government is concerned.

On September 30, 1916, I wrote again an appeal to them to give me the right to go back to them, and also calling their attention to the fact that they wanted us to resume operations at the mines, and saying we were holding back these operations and keeping many people out of work. We got in touch with the State Department and called attention to it, and the State Department said on October 5, 1916, that the department had sent instructions to its representative in Mexico City directing him to make representations looking to the annulment of this decree.

Let me digress for a moment, and say that we were also charged with holding back the economic development, like all Americans were charged with, for the reason that we could not operate if we wanted to operate. We were producing gold. We were 18 hours' ride from the nearest railroad station, out in the heart of the lonely hills, surrounded by every cutthroat in the country endangering life and property. We appealed time and time again for protection, and it was never given to us.

Up until two or three weeks or a month ago the Carranza forces had never been north of the Santiago River in San Cristobal. That is between the Zacatecas mine where we were located. We could never get protection. The protection we got would be they would send the soldiers out there, and they would do more damage than good. In fact, I would rather trust a civilian bandit than a soldier bandit.

During all these years that we were not in operation I saw to it that our men were fed; that we furnished them with corn. We shipped corn to them and distributed it absolutely gratis. We turned our land over to them and let them raise their own crops on it. So far as I was personally concerned, individually concerned, so far as those I represented were concerned, that has been our policy, to keep the men who worked for us and were loyal to us from starvation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it now possible to operate your property?

Mr. SLATTERY. Absolutely impossible. My latest advices last week show they came out and threatened to burn the mill and destroy the place, and there was a general scrap that took place and killed my head miner. There is an element of unrest there. The people have been deprived really of the right to live by the present Government. It is reaching a period where men are fighting for their existence.

Conditions to-day at my mine are worse than they ever were, and are growing worse every day. There is no developing going on. There is not a thing that stands out in the whole Carranza administration that any man can consider as constructive legislation. Everything has been destructive. He took over the courts, he assumed jurisdiction of the house of congress and of the senate, he controlled the bankers, he closed the banks at his will, he dictated the terms under which you operate, he dictated the policies of the oil companies, he fixes taxes to suit himself, he fixes the rate of exchange.

Let me give you now just a slight sidelight on it. Mexico hasn't any gold to-day, hasn't any reserve. Yet to-day he arbitrarily fixes the rate of exchange. And the rate of exchange to-day in Mexico is such that the American dollar is not worth as much in Mexico as it was in the beautiful and prosperous days of Porfirio Diaz. In other words, the American dollar in the old days was worth two Mexican dollars. To-day you take an American dollar into Mexico, and you have to go to a representative of the Carranza Government who sells the exchange, and he gives you whatever he likes for it, usually $1.80 or $1.90, and then you get Mexican bills. When you take these Mexican bills—for instance, you are operating a mine, and you have to pay in silver, so you have to pay a premium on the silver. These are conditions that are confronting us to-day. There is no planting going on, and the people are coming from the mountains, from the valleys, and crowding into the cities, and the result is that every day those conditions are growing worse and worse.

Mr. KEARFUL. What prospect do you see for any improvement?

Mr. SLATTERY. There will never be any improvement while Mr. Carranza is occupying the presidency in Mexico and the present outfit is in power. There is no use of anybody fooling themselves that there will.

Mr. KEARFUL. What prospect do you see for a change? Carranza, in power, can reelect himself or any follower he chooses, can he not?

Mr. SLATTERY. I was going to say intervention, but I hate that word "intervention," for the reason that the people living in Mexico hate the word "intervention." We Americans sometimes have a peculiar way of expressing ourselves. We do not mean just what we say. Our liberty-loving foreigners in the United States to-day hate the word "Americanization." Yet all of our welfare bodies lay great emphasis on the word "Americanization," when the word should be "citizenship."

"Intervention" is meddling in somebody else's affairs. That is what intervention in Mexico means. No matter how poor and illiterate the peon is, he has a certain amount of dignity that he wants you to respect. When you take that right on up to the better class, you can see how farreaching that is. So that when you use that word "intervention," you are using the wrong word. I would say use the word "Mexicanization." Mexicanize Mexico. What have we done, for instance, for the large number of Mexicans that have been forced to flee out of Mexico? You have neglected us, but what about the Mexicans, themselves, that have been driven out of there because of your policies? These men that I am speaking of are men who have kept Mexico alive in the early days. They represent the arts and literature and science, and so on, and they ruled and ruled well when they were in power.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that the class that will have to be depended upon now to stabilize that condition?

Mr. SLATTERY. I would say yes. I would say men like de la Barra, Ahumada, Prieto. These are men whose names come to my mind, and there are numbers of them. The question is asked, Is there anybody in Mexico that is any good? We had good government under Diaz.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had good government under Huerta?

Mr. SLATTERY. Pretty good government under Huerta, and very good government under de la Barra. We have neglected these Mexicans, and if all this time, instead of trying to "Americanize" them, if we had educated them and put out a program of "Mexicanization," shown our friendship for Mexico—that we had no ulterior object in view—we would have built up an army right here in this country of five or six hundred thousand Mexicans that would fight our battles in Mexico, if we had any battles to fight. In any case, we should "Mexicanize" Mexico by driving out of Mexico the people that are tearing it down, and have driven out of Mexico the traditions for which the Mexican people have always stood.

Carranza, with his highfaluting ideas; Carranza is an agnostic; Carranza is a foe of education. When he was governor of the State of Coahuila, can anybody show where he ever spent a nickel for education in that State? Can anybody show where he ever spent a nickel as President of the Mexican Republic for education, or has ever done anything for education? Yet that fellow can go out and make these speeches and he gets away with it. Look at the men he is surrounded with, living on the fat of the land. They don't care a damn for the Mexican people or Mexican conditions. Every one of them is getting rich. If they can't do it honestly, they will do it dishonestly. That is the kind of people we have running things down there.

What we should do, if you ask me for a remedy, what I believe should be done, the first thing I would suggest would be that we close with that fellow, bring that fellow up to a sharp turn, and tell him "You can't slap us in the face any longer; you can't spit in our face any longer. We have been good friends of yours and tried to help you, and you have discredited us on every occasion. If you expect support from this Government it is time for you to show some respect." If he refuses, I would close every port of entry and every customhouse he has. Then, second, I would seize on deposit in this country the money that he has in the banks of this country.

I think there is the greatest weapon. I know how those bandit leaders used to come across the line and make deposits right in the banks along the Rio Grande of their stolen plunder. There ought to be some agency of the Government that could find out where the money on deposit that belongs to these fellows in every bank in the United States, and then issue an order: "If you don't do so and so, if you don't respect law and order, we will take away from you every dollar you have on deposit in the United States." Then you will be talking a language they will understand mighty quick. Refuse to let out of Mexico any of the stolen plunder and don't permit it to come into this country. One of the reasons why the Villa and Carranza rule kept up so long was because there was so much loot, and they could take it out of Mexico and bring it over and sell it on this side of the line. Keep them from having a market for everything they steal, and they will soon stop that.

Then I think all shipments of arms and ammunition should be stopped, not only from the United States, but not let it go through any port. Pick out a man of the de la Barra type, and get behind him and support him. Ignore all present factions. Forget there are such individual groups as Villistas, Felicistas, Carrancistas, Obregonistas, cut out all the "istas," the same as we should cut out all of the "isms" in this country, and deal only with the Mexican people as a people. Do what we did in Cuba and the Philippine Islands. It took Spain 300 years to try to put law and order in Cuba and in the Philippine Islands, and we have done it in the Philippine Islands with less than a brigade of soldiers. In Cuba we all know how we are getting on with that.

Select a man, or let the elements in that country get together and let them select the man. Don't let us do the picking, but let them select their man, and then give to that man the support that we have given to these other fellows. Take away from this lawless element, claiming to represent authority, their guns and pistols and rifles, and give these 16,000,000 people a chance to say "You have no longer the badge of authority. You can no longer shoot me on the street, no longer enter my home and defile it." Give these people that have never had a chance, give them a chance, and you will find that there is a solution of the difficulty in Mexico.

And should we have to go in there with an armed force, you will find that it is a mistaken impression that it is going to take a half million men five years because of the bandits and the mountainous country. You will find that it is simply a myth. You will find, like Pershing found, when it was said, when he went in supposedly for Villa, that the people would rise up against him, you will find as he found that the peons came and helped to build the road, the peons came and helped to find the waterholes; after the first scare they came and offered assistance, and that is what you will find from the rank and file of the Mexican people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it your view that this country is under the duty to the Mexican people to drive out the bandits, as you call them, who are now in power, because we are responsible for their being in power?

Mr. SLATTERY. More so than ever, because of that very reason. We forced it on the Mexican people. We forced upon the Mexican people Carranza and all his clans, and in doing so we are directly responsible for everything that has happened down there under Carranza. If we have made a mistake, don't let us keep on trying to cover it up, but let us be men, let us be real men, let us come out and say we have made that mistake. I think the man is a big man when he finds he has made a mistake if he will come out and say so. The whole world knows we have made a mistake, and what is the use of bluffing and camouflaging? Why don't we come out and say we have made a mistake with this fellow and we are going to undo what we have done; that we are going to help them get a stable government, going to lend them money, going to make up for the mistakes we have made, going to get them back on their feet just as quick as we can, and then you will find a solution of this problem.

I am speaking as an American citizen; I am speaking as a man who loves the Mexican people; I am speaking as a man who has had thousands of their men in his employ and under him. I have ridden over the best part of the Mexican Republic on horseback. I have mingled with the people and know their condition. They have trusted me and I have in every way tried to be worthy of that trust. When I am denouncing and condemning and criticizing conditions in Mexico I am not condemning and criticizing and damning the Mexican people, this 16,000,000; I am damning the group that I call bandits, whether they wear the uniform of Carranza or Villa or any other kind of uniform, that are going around preaching and yelling about "Libertad y constitucion" and "Viva la Republica," and all that sort of thing.

Mr. KEARFUL. And "Mexico for the Mexicans"?

Mr. SLATTERY. "Mexico for the Mexicans." I am speaking as one who is interested in the development of that country. We have been paying too much attention, perhaps, to our commercial relations with the other side of the world, when the treasure house of the world is at our back door, looking at it from a commercial standpoint. What have we done to develop those commercial relations? We have slapped them in the face prior to this. And now we have become the man with the big stick and say, "This is our man. He is going to sit in this chair, and he is going to represent you." And the result has been that Mr. Carranza, our hand-picked candidate, at every turn has slapped the United States Government in the face, and he never goes out of his way to do it, either.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you understand to be the real meaning of the Carranza slogan, "Mexico for the Mexicans"?

Mr. SLATTERY. Please don't ask me to interpret any of his utterances.

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, judging from his acts?

Mr. SLATTERY. Judging from my experience with Mr. Carranza, I would say that anything any foreigner has or possesses in Mexico belongs to the Mexicans. Therefore, "Mexico for the Mexicans." Take it away from them. If he has no right to take it away under the law, he will decree it. That would be my interpretation, from my own experience.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is "Mexico for the Mexicans," as applied to you and other foreigners?

Mr. SLATTERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further you care to state?

Mr. SLATTERY. I think that covers the story pretty well. So far as I am personally concerned, I want to feel that my visit here to Washington to-day has done two things, and it is really after all what I am most interested in: I hope my story to-day will have some effect, as I feel it my duty to my Government to come here and testify, notwithstanding what the consequences might be to me, as far as my property relations are concerned in Mexico. I feel very strongly that obligation. And the second reason why I am glad to come here is that I hope I have thrown some light on the situation, so far as the Mexican people themselves are concerned. I am interested in their welfare, and I hope any words of mine may be a beacon of hope to them that there are some Americans still alive to-day that appreciate their plight, and that some day that hope will be further kindled in the American Nation, as a Nation, and will recognize that a grave injustice has been done, and will right that injustice.

Mr. KEARFUL. I want to assure you that the committee greatly appreciates the spirit of real Americanism you have shown in coming before it to testify. It is a spirit that has been shown by very few of those who are interested in Mexico, and who have placed their material interests before their feeling as an American. I want to thank you very much for it.

Mr. SLATTERY. I thank you. I say, I have hopes that some day everything will come around all right. I have come here with a full knowledge of what I am doing, and what it means, and what I am going to be up against if I ever go back into Mexico. If these words of mine to-day will be the means of creating a different spirit, and will give, not only to Americans in Mexico the chance they are looking for, but will also help to save Mexico from the cut-throats that are now ruining its very life, I will feel that my visit has not been in vain.

(Whereupon, at 2 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned.)

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
San Diego, Calif.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman at 10.30 a. m., in room 566 of the U. S. Grant Hotel, San Diego, Calif., Senator Albert B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senator Albert B. Fall, chairman; Senator Marcus A. Smith; Maj. Dan M. Jackson, secretary.

TESTIMONY OF MR. GERALD BRANDON.

(Witness sworn by the secretary.)

The SECRETARY. Please state your name.

Mr. BRANDON. Gerald Brandon.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you born?

Mr. BRANDON. Englewood, N. J.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. BRANDON. New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. BRANDON. Newspaper man.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask you if, in following your profession or business as a newspaper man, you have had any business with the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir; a great deal.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you first become acquainted with that country?

Mr. BRANDON. In 1906.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you on the border or in Mexico about the time of the Madero revolution in 1911 and 1912 and following years?

Mr. BRANDON. I accompanied the Government revolutionary forces at different times during those years in their camps throughout Mexico, on the border and in the interior.

The CHAIRMAN. Where have you been during the recent Great War?

Mr. BRANDON. In France.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity.

Mr. BRANDON. I enlisted in the French Foreign Legion at the beginning of the war, when France entered the war.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain in the Foreign Legion?

Mr. BRANDON. Almost three years.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you a private soldier in the Foreign Legion?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the Foreign Legion of France, briefly? Of whom is it composed?

Mr. BRANDON. The Foreign Legion is a regiment composed of volunteers of any nationality which France maintains in its colonies, and which is continually in active service. Before the war there were perhaps 20,000 men in the Foreign Legion, mostly German, Swiss, and Spanish nationalities.

When the war started a great many foreigners desired to help France, and, according to the law, they could only be admitted into the Foreign Legion. There were sixty-odd thousand foreigners enlisted for the duration of the war, and they took part in most of the important battles, suffered very heavily; in fact, only 1,300 men were discharged at the end of the war out of the sixty-odd thousand who had enlisted.

The CHAIRMAN. What other service, if any, did you see?

Mr. BRANDON. No other real military service with an organized army, although I accompanied revolutionary forces in different parts of Latin America as an observer.

The CHAIRMAN. After you retired from the Foreign Legion, did you have any other service at all in this last war?

Mr. BRANDON. No, sir. I was rejected by the United States examining board.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you serve in the Foreign Legion?

Mr. BRANDON. Almost three years.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you rejected by the United States examining board on account of disability?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. I have a wound, and also my eyes are not up to the standard.

The CHAIRMAN. When were you last in Mexico, Mr. Brandon?

Mr. BRANDON. I left Mexico on the 4th of this present month.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what circumstances did you leave Mexico?

Mr. BRANDON. I was expelled by the Carranza Government as a pernicious foreigner, being taken to the border at Laredo, Tex., by armed members of the Mexican secret service.

The CHAIRMAN. What had you been doing in Mexico at that time, or prior to that time?

Mr. BRANDON. I had been observing conditions and giving my opinion of them in the Los Angeles Times and other papers that published my work.

The CHAIRMAN. How long had you been in Mexico before you were expelled?

Mr. BRANDON. Almost three months. I went down to Mexico City in the middle of last December. I made that my headquarters, and at two different times I went into the country—once into the city of Puebla and entered into the States of Vera Cruz and Puebla.

The CHAIRMAN. What particularly called you to the city of Puebla or the States of Vera Cruz and Puebla?

Mr. BRANDON. I was interested in investigating the attitude of the Mexican criminal court, which is the court trying American Consul W. O. Jenkins in Puebla. My idea was to find evidence which would substantiate charges made by the American State Department that Jenkins was not receiving justice at the hands of the court. I was not interested in whether Jenkins was guilty or innocent; I wanted to know if the United States had any right to interfere in what Mexicans claim is entirely interior matter, appertaining only to the Mexican criminal courts.

The CHAIRMAN. This investigation was in connection with the trial of Jenkins for perjury, was it?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He was arrested for perjury, or charged with perjury, in having testified that he had been kidnaped and had been compelled to pay a ransom?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand the charge against him was that he had not really been forcibly kidnaped, but was a party to his own kidnaping?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And of course this is a public matter, upon this country having demanded that he be discharged. The answer of the Mexican Government was that they could not interfere with the local courts which had jurisdiction of the case upon a charge of perjury; and that is what you were investigating?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What methods did you pursue in your investigation? Where did you go and what did you do?

Mr. BRANDON. Well, I spoke to Jenkins; I managed to get access to the court records; I spoke to witnesses who appear on those records as testifying that Jenkins was guilty of complicity in his own kidnaping; I spoke to other witnesses who Jenkins told me were ready to testify to the contrary but had not been heard by the court, or had been tortured and in other ways forced to testify to what the court desired; and I spoke to the prosecuting attorney, and a great deal to the judge, and got their opinions.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you happen to get the opinions of the officials there—the prosecuting attorney and others? What did they understand as to your activities? Did they know what you were doing?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir; they knew I was a newspaper man. I am fairly well known in Mexico as a newspaper man, and owing to the fact that at the time Carranza and most of the present Mexican officials were revolutionists, and not government officials they were friendly to me personally. I was thought to be what they call in Mexico an unconditional friend of Carranza. I used the name of another newspaper man who is an unconditional friend of Carranza, a Mr. DeCourcy of Mexico. I said I was a friend of his, and that helped me a great deal.

The CHAIRMAN. He is a correspondent of the New York Times?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And is an unconditional friend of Carranza?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you used his name?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You speak Spanish, of course?

Mr. BRANDON. As well as I do English.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you learn from these various sources and what conclusions did you arrive at with reference to the arrest and trial of Jenkins, as to his guilt or innocence?

Mr. BRANDON. Could you specify a little more clearly what you would like to know?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, he was charged with complicity in his own kidnaping. Now, you talked to witnesses, you say, some of whom had testified against him; you talked to the judge, to the district attorney, and to others. What conclusion did you come to with reference to his guilt or innocence of the charge against him?

Mr. BRANDON. I will admit that I know of no proofs that will absolutely clear Jenkins of the charge of being concerned in his own kidnaping. It is practically impossible to prove that a man is not guilty. But I can also say that all the supposed proofs that figure in the testimony that has been compiled against Jenkins have proven unworthy of credit. Jenkins has an unusual reputation as an honest man and a friend of Mexico. He is perhaps the most popular foreigner in Mexico, certainly the most popular foreigner in Puebla. He is reputed to be a very wealthy man. And he is charged with trying to get money from the Government. With this excuse it falls of its own weight. He has no reason to be unfriendly to the Carranza Government and to have done this, because it is under the Carranza Government that Jenkins has made most of his money, and in fact he always had been rather friendly to the Government. That is all I can say as an indication that he would not have been guilty of doing this. On the other hand, the testimony that figures in the court records is composed entirely of sworn statements from perhaps 200 witnesses, nine-tenths of whom were illiterate, perhaps one-third of whom can not even speak the Spanish language. These men appear as having seen Jenkins in friendly intercourse with his captor during the time that he was in Cordoba's hands. They mention cases of having seen Jenkins drinking beer with his captor. They claim that he was not blindfolded, as Jenkins has stated, and that he knew perfectly well where he was.

Some of the witnesses testify to the fact that two years before the kidnaping they saw Jenkins give ammunition and arms to this bandit leader Cordoba. They claim that he was in constant communication with the bandits during the past two years. Up to very recently, up to the time that I investigated the case, there was no real testimony against Jenkins. Even such testimony as had been collected was not definite nor very damning. I spoke to a good many of the witnesses, and they told me that they had never seen Jenkins, that they didn't know anything about him, and that they had testified according to instructions.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were these witnesses who you say told you they had testified according to instructions? Where did you find them?

Mr. BRANDON. Some of them I found in the city of Puebla, living on a daily wage given them by the court because they were afraid to go back to their home towns after having lied as they did. I have a number of photographs of those witnesses. Others have returned to their towns. And when I spoke to them alone they were perfectly willing to tell me the truth.

There were three men who testified to having been tortured, deliberately tortured; one of them, who is perfectly worthy of credence, because he is the leading man of his town, he is municipal president of the town of Santa Marta, assured me that he had been called before the court at Cholula and had been told by the judge that it was his duty as a Mexican to testify that Jenkins and Cordoba were in his town in openly friendly intercourse on certain dates. He answered that it was impossible for him to testify to this effect, as he had never seen Jenkins and did not know who Jenkins was; whereupon after proving impossible to convince, Maj. Sosa, of the Puebla State forces, put a pistol to his breast and told him he would be killed if he didn't sign this statement, which had already been prepared. He said that he agreed in order to save his life. The secretary, Justino Hernandez, showed a welt around his neck, proving his statement that under the same circumstances he had been hung to a rafter in the court room until he agreed to sign the statement; and another man had been beaten with a cartridge belt until he agreed. Those three cases of torture seem to have been sufficient to make all of the 16 witnesses who were called from this town agree to sign the statement concerning Jenkins's presence there at that time without any more pressure. The men had been taken on December 3 to the court in Puebla and confronted with Jenkins. They broke down and admitted what I have just said to Jenkins and his lawyer.

The Mexican judge in charge of the case was satisfied as to the veracity of their statements, and he congratulated Jenkins, telling him that he had no doubt that the case would be thrown out of court on the following day; that he was about to make that recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. This was in court?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. This happened in court. I am now telling the story that happened in court, although I proved the truth of it by personal investigation. Jenkins, as he is entitled to under the Mexican law, had asked for a certified copy of this testimony. He was told that on the following day it would be given him. On the following day he appeared, asking for his copy, and was told it was impossible for them to get a copy of that testimony as it did not exist, that there had been no court session held on the previous day, and they didn't know what he was talking about. He asked to see the judge, and was told that the judge had been given unlimited leave of absence. He asked for the secretary, and the secretary was also out of town. He asked to see the records and was told that the records were inaccessible except to court officials. He thereupon, through his lawyer, accused the court of having lost or abstracted documents relative to his case.

This is a very serious crime in Mexico. His accusation is on the shelf; absolutely nothing has been done about it. He told me this story, which was corroborated by his lawyer, who was also present during the hearing, and I saw the men concerned and they corroborated it and said they were perfectly willing to swear to it at any time. Later I managed to get into contact with the secretary of the court who had taken down this testimony, and he told me that every word of it was true, and that for 2,000 pesos he would get me the missing evidence—not the original sheets, which had been torn out, but the certified copy which had been prepared and certified to by the judge and himself, and which he still kept in his possession; and he also showed me that the pages had been torn out by order of the prosecuting attorney after consultation with the governor of Puebla.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is the governor of Puebla?

Mr. BRANDON. Dr. Cabrera, brother to the present minister of finance, Luis Cabrera.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a conversation with the prosecuting attorney concerning the Jenkins case?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. I was continually conversing with Mr. Mitchell during the first three or four days of my presence in Puebla when he thought I was against Jenkins and was a Mexican propagandist; he definitely told me that Jenkins was guilty, and offered me all sorts of nonconvincing arguments to prove his statements. When he found out that I had photographed some of the records which absolutely proved that documents had been abstracted he sent for me one evening and asked me to call at his home. I went, in a very worried state of mind. I asked him, "Can I see you to-morrow?" He says, "No; I want to see you to-night." It was 11 o'clock in the evening. "I want to see you to-night in my home." I begged him to wait until the following day, when I would see him in court. He says, "No; this is a very private and personal matter. I must see you in my home to-night." And when I went there he told me that he knew or had information to the effect that I was friendly to Jenkins, and he didn't blame me, on account of my being an American, but that there was a misapprehension somewhere. Jenkins seemed to think that he was his enemy, and he was not Jenkins's enemy. In fact, owing to his being half Anglo-Saxon, he would very much like to see Jenkins proven innocent; that Jenkins had several times made the statement that he was willing to spend half of his fortune, if necessary, to come out clean in this matter; that he would very much like to have me tell Jenkins that he was his friend, and that it depended on him entirely to have the case thrown out of court or to have it prosecuted to its limit. He asked me to call the following evening and tell him Jenkins's answer.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you do so?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. I saw Jenkins, and Jenkins says, "I will not give one penny to Sosa." He used some very strong language. Jenkins said, "I knew something of that sort would eventually come out, but this is the first definite offer I have received from them."

The CHAIRMAN. What was the cause of your departing from Mexico, if you know?

Mr. BRANDON. Perfectly frank expressions of opinion on the situation, which were not particularly complimentary to the Carranza Government; although I have not definitely attacked them in any way, but I have told the truth about the Jenkins case, and I said a few things about the present governor of Vera Cruz and the secretary of state and general of division in the army, and a few other things that candor and sincerity to President Carranza required.

The CHAIRMAN. When you were in Mexico at this time did you meet Mr. Wilbur Forrest?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You know him?

Mr. BRANDON. Mr. Wilbur Forrest, whom I see present in the courtroom, was in Mexico as correspondent of the New York Tribune, and also did some work in connection with the Jenkins case previous to my presence there.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know when he left Mexico?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. On the 31st of December last I accompanied Mr. Forrest to the train which was to take him to the border.

The CHAIRMAN. He was not deported, was he?

Mr. BRANDON. He beat the deportation by 24 hours. I understand that there was an order for his arrest and for search of his quarters.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you understand so?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. I was told so by a member of the police force in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. How are the judges of the State of Puebla appointed or elected, do you know?

Mr. BRANDON. The judges in the State of Puebla are appointed by the governor. The criminal court judges are appointed by the governor.

The CHAIRMAN. The governor is the brother of Luis Cabrera, member of the Mexican Cabinet?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. In connection with that, I asked the governor how it happened that Judge Gonzales Franco was a Puebla criminal judge, as I understood that in the constitution of the independent and sovereign State of Puebla it was specified that no one could be a judge unless he was a citizen of the State, and this judge was a citizen of the State of Jalisco, and the governor of Puebla answered me that the legislature and senate of the State of Puebla had given him extraordinary powers in all branches of the Government, whereby he was legally authorized to do anything he pleased, whether it was in conformity with the constitution of the State of Puebla or not.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, the legislature authorized him to set aside this State constitution?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. Extraordinary powers, as they call it. The national legislature of Mexico has done the same with President Carranza, giving him extraordinary powers, on matters of finance only. Carranza is authorized to impose taxes or change the amounts of taxes. He can do anything he wants to do in the branch of finances. The Governor of Puebla is authorized to do this in all branches of the Government. He is an absolute dictator.

The CHAIRMAN. The President of Mexico is also authorized to put in effect, by decrees, the provision of the constitution until such time as the congress itself may put them into effect by law, is he not?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. The Mexican constitution of 1917 has several articles which are not very clear, and the matter of the interpretation is in Carranza's hands until congress passes definitely upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the conditions existing in the districts where you were, and of which you obtained information which you regard as reliable, concerning peace and order or violence and unsettled conditions in the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. BRANDON. The State of Puebla is one of the most central states in the Republic of Mexico, and one of the most, if not the most, thickly settled. It is right near the capital of Mexico. Nevertheless, when I expressed my intention of visiting several villages which are only 25 or 30 miles away from Puebla the governor told me it was necessary to send a military escort with me to protect me. I objected to this and he promised he would not do so; nevertheless, I found that a military escort had preceded me on my trip and had warned witnesses not to speak to me or to be very careful what they told me. Despite the fact that this military escort had preceded me, when I was about 12 miles out of Puebla city I was fired upon by a Government force ensconced on the top of a hill. I rode right up to the entrenchment or fort and protested, and was told that that was my own fault; that I was alone, I was on horseback, and naturally they thought I was a revolutionist. This will indicate to you what chance a man has going around in the country in Mexico alone. The second time I left Mexico City I went through the earthquake zone in the borders States of Puebla and Vera Cruz. There I found all the villages, or most of them, garrisoned by government troops; but I was in three villages which were in revolutionary hands despite the fact that they are but 10 to 12 miles from Government garrisons. There was one town I went to, named Ixhuacan, which has never been in the possession of Carranza during all this six years of his predominance in Mexican affairs.

I asked the people there, "Are you revolutionists?" They said, "We are not exactly revolutionists, but we don't want any garrison in our town. We are hard-working farmers, and we find that the soldiers rob us with such freedom that we prefer to fight against them. We lose less life and less of our property by fighting the Government than if we accepted the Government." These men are working hard; they are cultivating their little patches of land in a perfectly orderly fashion.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether that condition of affairs exists in other portions of the Republic?

Mr. BRANDON. Frankly, I wish to be accurate in my statements, and I will say I do not know. I have been told that it is so, but I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. You have heard of the organization of citizens in different districts known as the Defensas Sociales and similar organizations?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. I know of those organizations, some of which are Government organizations and some of which are revolutionary ones.

The CHAIRMAN. Depending on the locality?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir. In the State of Chihuahua these organizations are supposed to be Government ones, and I understand that on the Gulf coast they are mostly revolutionary organizations. It is significant that I traveled from town to town on this 12-day trip through the mountains of the Gulf slope and was given letters of introduction by the military commander of each village to the military commander of the next village. This happened often in the cases where I left a Carrancista town to go to a revolutionary town. There seemed to be perfect accord between the garrisons. In one case I was lent four soldiers, who carried packs for me—packs of medicine that I was distributing—and also two horses, one for myself and one for my mozo, and the revolutionists returned the horses and soldiers to the Government troops, knowing that they were Government property. In the following town the Zapatistas gave me horses and men to go to a Carrancista village, and I had a very hard time to prevent the Carrancista leader there from stealing the horses and shooting my men. If he had not happened to have a wounded leg, and I happened to relieve his pain somewhat, I am sure he would have kept the horses and shot my men.

There was also another incident in the town of Ahueyayulco. That town was menaced by the rising of the river, which had been dammed up by a landslide, and they asked for help from a Zapatista town, and 200 men from the Zapatista town and 200 Zapatistas from the oil fields were sent over to that town and worked for two days with pick and shovel clearing away the debris from the bed of the river to save the Carrancista town.

The CHAIRMAN. So far, then, as your observation goes, if the people themselves were let alone there would be no revolution at all?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir; that is my idea.

The CHAIRMAN. It is simply agitation by demagogues and leaders that is keeping up this dreadful condition?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir; that is my true opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you notice a statement in the paper—a telegraphic dispatch—to-day with reference to some reported statement of a Mr. Palacios, who claimed to have been the second under command of Cordova, who was accused of kidnaping Jenkins?

Mr. BRANDON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Palacios, or did you ever come in contact with him?

Mr. BRANDON. I didn't know him personally, but I am acquainted with the facts concerning his appearance in court. Palacios, as I am creditably informed, had been a revolutionist, but two months before the Jenkins kidnaping he had been amnestied by the governor. This amnesty was kept under cover, and Palacios has since been acting as a spy for the Government. Toward the end of January Palacios presented himself to the court, claiming that he had been with Cordoba during the time of the Jenkins kidnaping, and that he was in possession of evidence to the effect that Jenkins had arranged the whole kidnaping himself. Jenkins was called to the court and confronted with Palacios. Palacios gave his testimony, and Jenkins was asked if he didn't want to cross-examine him. Jenkins said, "No; I have nothing to ask him." The judge insisted. He said, "Do you realize that this man's testimony seems to be conclusive and that it will probably cost you your liberty?" Jenkins said, "Yes; I realize that if it could be proven, but I have nothing to ask him." The judge insisted, and Jenkins told him, "Well, I have something to say regarding this matter, but I am afraid that, with my poor knowledge of Spanish, I may offend the court unwittingly, therefore I prefer to keep still." The judge assured him that he would not be offended unnecessarily, whereupon Jenkins begged him not to put his following words on the record, but translate them into more polite Spanish than he was capable of using; and he told the judge that he had documentary proof to the effect that the governor of Puebla and the court had promised Palacios 5,000 pesos for this testimony, and he would bring that proof forward at the time of his definite trial—his oral trial—and therefore it was not necessary to cross-question the witness at that time. The judge thereupon fined Jenkins 50 pesos for contempt of court, and the next time Jenkins was called before the court he refused absolutely to say a word, claiming that he had instructions in the first place from the embassy not to pay any more attention to this court, and, secondly, that it was too expensive to talk in court.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILBUR FORREST.

(Witness sworn by the secretary.)

The SECRETARY. Your name is Wilbur Forrest?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of the United States, are you?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State?

Mr. FORREST. Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. FORREST. I suppose my residence at present would be in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your profession or business?

Mr. FORREST. Newspaper man.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been in the newspaper business?

Mr. FORREST. About 10 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been in Mexico at any time during this period of 10 years?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. FORREST. For about 40 days previous to the 3d of January.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, this last January?

Mr. FORREST. This last January, 1920.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you prior to that time in the performance of your duties?

Mr. FORREST. For five years, with the exception of three months in the United States, I have been in Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity were you in Europe?

Mr. FORREST. Newspaper correspondent; about three years for the United Press, with headquarters in London and Paris, and with the armies in the field at various times; and later with the New York Tribune. For the last two years with the New York Tribune.

The CHAIRMAN. In your capacity as newspaper correspondent, have you been stationed at Washington at different times?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir. About two years in Washington—in 1912 and 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. What were your particular duties there?

Mr. FORREST. I have had various assignments in Washington, including the White House for six months, the Supreme Court for a short length of time, the House of Representatives, the Senate, the State, War, and Navy Departments, the Department of Justice, and other assignments. Practically all of the assignments, from time to time, in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. How long had you been back from Europe when you went to Mexico upon this last trip?

Mr. FORREST. I should judge about three months. I came back from Europe in September.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you sent down into Mexico by your paper?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you go into Mexico?

Mr. FORREST. I went first to Monterrey; from Monterrey to Tampico; from Tampico to Yucatan and the cities of Progreso and Laredo; back across the Gulf to Vera Cruz; from Vera Cruz to Mexico City; from Mexico City on two occasions to the District of Puebla, and on other short trips from Mexico City; and later from Mexico City to Laredo, Tex., and across the border back to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. While you were in Mexico did you make an investigation of the facts concerning the arrest or the different arrests and trial or different trials of Mr. Jenkins, consular agent of the United States in Mexico?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir. Not so much the trials. I did not make an investigation in the Mexican courts. I took the results of investigations by American officials and others.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, those attached to the American State Department?

Mr. FORREST. Those attached to the American State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. To the American embassies. Did you hear of a man by the name of Cordoba in connection with the Jenkins case?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir; he was the rebel leader in the State of Puebla who kidnaped Consular Agent Jenkins and held him for some time, until a ransom was paid, when he was released.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever have your attention called to any letters published by officials in Mexico purporting to be facsimiles or photostatic copies or translations of letters from Cordoba or other Mexican officials relative to the Jenkins case?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir. After the kidnaping of Jenkins, and after he had been released, and when the controversy between Jenkins and the State of Puebla was in progress, there appeared in one of the Mexico City papers—I don't remember exactly which paper—a letter which purported to be a letter from Cordoba saying that Jenkins had been with him; that is, had connived with him to arrange the kidnaping, and this letter was signed "Federico Cordoba," a signature in ink, which had been reproduced.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see any circulars or pamphlets of any kind issued, purporting to contain this letter or photostatic copies of it?

Mr. FORREST. No, sir; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not know that such a letter had been circulated among United States Senators?

Mr. FORREST. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you undertake or pursue any investigation as to whether that letter was a genuine letter or a forgery?

Mr. FORREST. I discovered it by accident, I might say, through an arrangement which I—after investigating the Jenkins case and thoroughly interviewing the consular agent at length on two or three occasions, twice in Puebla and once in Mexico City, and having investigated the case through the American Embassy and in other ways until I believed that Mr. Jenkins was being persecuted and was absolutely innocent, and that the charges against him were ridiculous, I felt that there was just one thing that remained for me to do in Mexico, and that was to have an interview with the rebel Cordoba who kidnaped Jenkins. I went to Puebla with that purpose in view and ascertained after some effort there and a little trip to the country, that Mr. Cordoba was not in his camp near the city of Puebla, but was spending the Christmas holidays in Mexico City itself, where his enemies held forth, and that he was there for the purpose also of arranging his affairs to leave the district of Puebla and go back to his headquarters in the Tampico area under the leader Manuel Pelaez.

I went back to Mexico City and arranged for an interpreter and a man who could guide me to Cordoba. I made an arrangement whereby I was to wait on the corner of Avenida Juarez in Mexico City at 8 o'clock in the evening of December 29. I was to wait on the corner at that time until an automobile would pass and a man in it would make a sign, and I was to get in.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the 29th of December?

Mr. FORREST. The 29th of December. The purpose of the automobile was to carry us to the rendezvous. And I did so at 8 o'clock, and promptly an automobile came up and the door opened—it was a Ford, incidentally—and I jumped in and we turned and went by the Alameda, which was very near the place, and in 10 minutes we got out at the corner of—it seemed to be a rather respectable part of the city—and walked hurriedly I should judge for three or four minutes and came to the place the man pointed out as the place where Cordoba was staying. There were men around the corner who appeared to be the guard, and we did not go in, but passed by, walked a block, and as we came back the men had disappeared and we knocked at the door. After some little time a very pretty young Mexican girl opened the door, with a candle in her hand. We entered, and the house appeared to be entirely bare, except one small room, with a table with a candle on it, and a little luncheon on the table, and three chairs.

That room through which we passed to go into the room that had the furniture in it, had armed men in it. We sat down at a table, and from the room to the rear, where he evidently had been watching us all this time, came the rebel leader Cordoba. We shook hands and started out with our interview. In the course of the interview Cordoba told me that he had been offered, orally and in writing, 200 pesos to come to Mexico City, accept immunity, and testify that Jenkins had connived with him in the kidnaping; that he had the intention at first to accept the money and tell the people that were bringing it to go to, but he decided later that since he had the money from Jenkins—he showed me a sack of gold which he said was the last of the ransom money; that it had been entirely paid—he decided not to accept it. I tried to get him to show me the letter. He left the room to search for the letter and came back and said that his papers had been packed up by his secretary and that the letter could not be found easily, but he was certain he had it. I asked him who had written this letter, and he said he assumed it came from either the governor of the State of Puebla or representatives, but he could not prove it absolutely; but he assumed they were the people most interested in having Jenkins declared guilty and therefore he thought it came from them.

Then, after the interview, which was rather lengthy—about an hour we talked—or, incidentally, when Cordoba came back into the room after searching for the letter, he left the door open. It was quite draughty and my interpreter got up to close it. That took him back of Cordoba, who—to show that he was rather nervous—turned and kept his eyes on the interpreter every minute he was behind him until the door was closed, and then he sat down and the conversation commenced. After that interview, I asked him to write a statement which would show that I interviewed him in the City of Mexico, in the center of his enemies, and he did. He wrote a statement which I have now, signing it “Fed” Cordoba. That is a signature which, as I understand, the American embassy and the State Department have to-day, and it agrees with that signature. The signature of the forged letter, or the letter alleged to have been forged, was signed “Federico Cordoba.” He assured me he never signed his name that way, but always “Fed.” Cordoba.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you mention this letter to him, this supposedly forged letter that had been filed there?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What did he say to that?

Mr. FORREST. He said it was an absolute forgery, and that it was ridiculous that it could have come from him; that he kidnaped Jenkins, and that he did it merely for the purpose of showing that the Carranza government could give no guarantees to foreigners in Mexico. He said he could have kidnaped any number of rich Mexicans but nothing would ever have been heard of it in the United States. He thought the way to call the attention of the people of the United States to the fact that the Carranza government was absolutely impotent when it came to giving protection, was to kidnap a representative of the United States Government, and that for that reason he kidnaped Jenkins. He also admitted under questioning that it was planned and arranged by other rebels, and that he was only one of a band who had planned and arranged, to kidnap our representative, Mr. George S. Summerline at Mexico City, and also the American consul at Guadalajara, the Spanish consul at Puebla and the British Consul at Puebla. These were all to have been taken on the night Jenkins was kidnaped. I asked him if it were true that Bernardo Reyes, a rebel from the hills near Mexico City, remained in Mexico City 10 days trying to grab Summerline, and he became very excited when I asked him that and jumped up and said, “How did you know that?” very excitedly. I told him I didn’t get my information from the Carranza government. That seemed to reassure him, and he admitted that the plan had fallen down. He told me that the reason he was in the district of Puebla was that he had been sent there by Manuel Pelaez, his leader, to unify the rebel movement in four States—the States of Puebla, Oaxaca, Morelos, and one other State, the name of which I do not remember—and that he had succeeded in that unification and was going back to join Pelaez at Tampico. After the interview we left, and our parting was very cordial. He hoped I would tell the people of the United States what the situation was in the Jenkins case, and also about the revolutionary movement in Mexico. He seemed to be very anxious that they should know that the rebels were unified, and also that Jenkins was absolutely innocent and had been the victim. He said he was very sorry that Jenkins had to suffer, but he felt it would be worth it to the rebels to show just what a small hold the Carrancistas have on the country.

The CHAIRMAN. He seemed to think that although Jenkins was only a consular agent, he was a representative of the United States?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And it was for that reason that he desired to follow out this plan?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the impression made upon your mind as to the respect for law and order as exemplified by the Carranza government in Mexico?

Mr. FORREST. The rebel Cordoba seemed to have the utmost contempt for their ability to catch him or to bring about law and order in Mexico. He told my interpreter and myself that the rebels could blow up trains and bridges and do most anything they desired to do at any time, and in his answers to questions he admitted that they could perhaps take most any city in Mexico at any time, but on account of the lack of munitions they could not hold these cities when the Carranza reinforcements came; but they could take these cities and hold them for 12 or 24 hours. He said he had no sympathy with the blowing up of trains and the injury of innocent people, but that that did occur; that sometimes it occurred as a result of irresponsible acts and that it had nothing to do with the rebel movement; that at other times it had been necessary. This was done mostly, though, to show that the Carranza people could not control the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the feeling of respect, if any, that the people of Yucatan—the Yucatecans—have for Mexico and the Carranza government, if you ascertained?

Mr. FORREST. The Yucatecans appear to have very little respect for the Carranza government and would like very much to be left alone. It seems that Alvarado, a representative of the Carranza government, came to Yucatan and got their affairs in very bad shape by trying to form a hemp combine, that happened to be the principal crop of Yucatan, and their affairs are now in very bad shape as a result of that, Alvarado having left Yucatan and gone back to Mexico. The Yucatecans, however, refuse to be called Mexicans in most cases and want to be called Yucatecans. They feel that they are apart from Mexico and are capable of conducting their own affairs without the interference of the Carranza government. They take a certain pride in being called Yucatecans. A great many of them are highly educated, and the native Yucatecan is either a pure Maya Indian or a mixture of Spanish and Maya Indian and a higher-type native than you find in a great many other parts of Mexico. They are industrious and hard working and, above all, very clean personally.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any particular reason for leaving Mexico at the time that you did leave?

Mr. FORREST. Well, I had a suspicion, through recognition of various faces which had followed me, or seeing these faces in various places, that I was being watched, and having various documents on me, including the Cordoba signed statement, which, of course, would be an admission that I had been in consultation with the rebels, enemies of the Carranza Government, I felt that it would not be good for me to remain there very long after that interview; and on the night of December 31, New Year's night, Mr. Brandon, Mr. Turner, who is correspondent of the United Press, and myself, were around during the celebration, and having these papers with me I felt that I ought not to give them up if I were arrested. I asked them to accompany me to the train at 6.30 next morning, so that in case I might be arrested I could get these documents to them and they could get away with them. But although I saw what I thought was one of the familiar faces at the station, nothing occurred and I got on the train and made the trip to the border without incident, carrying the documents with me.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you the original Cordoba letter in your possession?

Mr. FORREST. No, sir; I have not. I sent it to New York and it was reproduced in my paper and printed. They still have the original. I have a reproduction.

The CHAIRMAN. And that we can get at any time?

Mr. FORREST. Yes, sir.

(A recess was then taken until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS—2.30 P. M.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HENRY L. TOLEN.

(Witness sworn by the secretary.)

The SECRETARY. Your full name?

Mr. TOLEN. Henry L. Tolen.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Tolen, you are a citizen of the United States?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And a native of what State?

Mr. TOLEN. Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. TOLEN. At the present time at Yuma, Ariz.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. TOLEN. Inspector in the Immigration Service of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your district?

Mr. TOLEN. Yuma and vicinity, down to the border, about 25 miles south, and as far east as—we are supposed to meet the jurisdiction of the inspector stationed at Ajo. There are only two of us over there. That is about 125 miles east.

The CHAIRMAN. And how far west along the border?

Mr. TOLEN. To the Colorado River. Well, on the California side also.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been in the service?

Mr. TOLEN. Since 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been in the district that you represent at present?

Mr. TOLEN. On the 27th of August I was moved from San Diego over there.

The CHAIRMAN. And what are your duties, generally, along the border?

Mr. TOLEN. Immigration matters—train inspection, border inspection, border riding, investigations of aliens supposed to be illegally in the country, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. In the performance of your official duties along the border south of Yuma, have you met a man by the name of Calles?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is his full name?

Mr. TOLEN. Carlos G. Calles.

The CHAIRMAN. What official position, if any, does he claim to hold?

Mr. TOLEN. Captain in the Mexican Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The Carranza army?

Mr. TOLEN. The Carranza forces; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is he stationed, if you know?

Mr. TOLEN. San Luis. San Luis is just a little cluster of a few huts on the Mexican side of the international line, where Sonora joins Arizona and corners in with the Colorado River.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many men has he there?

Ms. TOLEN. He had about 100 at first, and then some of them deserted, and he went back and got 80 more, and they nearly all deserted, so he hasn't any now, to amount to anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did the soldiers who deserted from his command go?

Mr. TOLEN. They came into the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of the officers desert?

Mr. TOLEN. Several of them. I would have to go back a little further to tell the history of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I was going to ask you about that. They did desert, some of the officers?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of the officers come into the United States?

Mr. TOLEN. They are all in the United States now.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is Calles?

Mr. TOLEN. In Mexico, the last time I saw him.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the cause of the desertion of his soldiers, if you know?

Mr. TOLEN. They claimed that he appropriated the money for their pay to his own use. They formed a colony, or were supposed to form a colony, when they came over there—

The CHAIRMAN. That is, in Mexico?

Mr. TOLÉN. In Mexico. These soldiers were brought from Navajoa, most of them, down on the Mayo River, and they came with the intention of just soldiering as a side issue, and they were to be paid $2 a day, so they say, and be allowed to cultivate land on a cooperative basis. They formed an agricultural association of some kind to purchase implements. They told me the money was turned over to Calles to purchase machinery with, and they never got any machinery—never got any implements—and that, coupled with the fact that they did not get any pay as soldiers either, they protested to Mexico City, or to their superior officers at Ortiz, in Sonora—I think that is where their headquarters are. They sent telegrams, and followed it up by letter, and a great many of them signed it. All the officers and men signed it, protesting Calles's actions, and Calles was incensed at that action on their part and he went to Hermosillo, as the saying is, to square himself. Evidently he made a good impression down there, because when he came back he came back by the way of Guaymas and the Gulf to Hermosillo, bringing about 80 men with him, and before he arrived there all these deserted in a body and walked across to the United States and were picking cotton in the valley.

The CHAIRMAN. Officers and men?

Mr. TOLÉN. Officers and men; all with the exception of one officer, a fellow by the name of Juarez. He stayed with Calles some time longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Did these men bring arms or accouterments with them to this side?

Mr. TOLÉN. I don't think any of them brought anything in the way of arms.

The CHAIRMAN. And they went to work for the American farmers on this side?

Mr. TOLÉN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In the State of Arizona?

Mr. TOLÉN. Many of them, in the early part of August, when cotton picking was started, had permission from Calles to come over and make a few dollars for themselves. Some of them came over and went to work. There was one man, I don't know what the man's name is, wanted some cotton pickers and he went to Calles and got them.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an American on this side of the line?

Mr. TOLÉN. An American on this side of the line, yes. And Calles sent the men over, but says, "Don't pay them, pay me," and he said that he did pay Calles for the work, at $3.50 a day.

The CHAIRMAN. Among these men who were over on this side, did you ever know a man by the name of Ybarra, a Mexican?

Mr. TOLÉN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what has become of him?

Mr. TOLÉN. I don't know for sure, but they all seem to think he is dead.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know a man by the name of Jose Maria Luguen?

Mr. TOLÉN. Only by hearsay.

The CHAIRMAN. Feliciano Herrera?

Mr. TOLÉN. I only heard about those two. They were taken from the United States before I went to Yuma.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have anything to do with the investigation, either in your official position or otherwise, of what became of this man Ybarra?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes, sir. On Monday, the 1st of December, 1919, James Tucker and his son, Wyatt Tucker, brought Catalina Amada de Ybarra to my office in Yuma.

The CHAIRMAN. Catalina Ybarra was a woman?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes. Wife of Rodolfo Ybarra. And she made a statement before me to the effect that on the night of the 29th, Saturday night, three men had driven up to where they were employed on a ranch picking cotton, 2½ miles west of Somerton, known as the Squire Munro ranch, and had knocked at the door, and one fellow stuck his head in the door, and he flashed a light also in their faces, and he says, "Is this the ranch that is run by"—some name, I forget now what it was. Anyhow, she heard some one say—not that name, but some name that sounds like it. He says, "It is Ybarra." And then this fellow that had his head in the door said, "Yes, Ybarra." They were sleeping on one floor there. "Yes, I am Ybarra," he said, "what do you want?" "Well," he says, "You are the man we want to see. Get up." And he got up, and without giving him a chance to put on his clothes, they took him out of the house, and she ran to the neighbors—when they took him out of the house she had an idea of who it was I suppose, and she ran to an American there by the name of—well, the fellow in charge of the ranch, the cotton man, I forget the name now, and called him and he came over and wanted to know what was going on, and the fellow says, "Why, we are officers from Yuma. We came after this man and are going to take him away." And they did take him away, and as they carried him away she says they pulled him between two of them, and as they carried him away he hollered to her, he says, "Come on and go with me; don't let them take me alone. They are taking me to San Luis. They are from San Luis." And they took him to an automobile some distance from the house—well, she couldn't see the automobile, because there were no lights, but in a short while she couldn't hear his cries any more; the automobile began to run and she could hear the automobile, and they went away, and that is the last she has ever seen of him.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about any proceedings in the courts of Arizona against Mr. Calles with reference to this Ybarra case?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he indicted, or was an information filed against him?

Mr. TOLEN. An information was filed against him, against Carlos G. Calles, Francisco Moreno, and Ernesto Teran for the kidnaping and murder of Ybarra. They claim he was taken to San Luis, Mexico, and executed.

The CHAIRMAN. The result of the examining trial in that case was the discharge, in that particular case, of Calles?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes. They discharged him in that particular case because they were unable to prove, so the judge held, the corpus delicti. Calles alone was held for kidnaping Luguen and Herrera. This was an instance of a similar kind to that which took place in February, 1919, I think, where they claim two of the soldiers committed some trivial offense on the Mexican side and then came across into the United States. I think they robbed a valise or something like that—cut it open—and they came on to the United States and Calles came over and got them, so they say, and took them out of a wagon in the road west of Somerton, which is about 9 miles from the line, and, as the evidence came out in the case, that they could prove that very readily, that he did take them from the United States and took them into Mexico and held a public execution, and they held him in that case and put him under $5,000 bond. When he got out on bond he went back to San Luis, and he has been there ever since. He has not been back in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. At this point, in connection with the testimony of the witness, Mr. Secretary, please file a copy of the complaint in the case of Calles, charged with the murder of Jose Maria Luguen and Feliciano Herrera, together with a stipulation, an order holding the defendant to answer, and an information, attached, and let them be copied into the record.

(The documents last above mentioned, filed as Exhibit 1, are in the following words and figures, to wit:)

In the justice court, first precinct, county of Yuma, State of Arizona.

The State of Arizona, plaintiff. v. Carlos Calles, defendant. Complaint, criminal.

Personally appeared before me this 7th day of February, 1920, W. F. Timmons, upon information and belief, who, being first duly sworn, complains and says: That one Carlos Calles, on or about the 7th day of February, 1918, at the county and State aforesaid, committed a felony, to wit, murder, as follows, to wit: The said Carlos Calles did then and there wilfully, unlawfully, feloniously, premeditatedly, deliberately, and of his malice aforethought made an assault in and upon the persons of other human beings, to wit, Jose Maria Luguen and Feliciano Herrera, and did then and there wilfully, unlawfully, feloniously, premeditatedly, deliberately, and of his malice aforethought seize, bind, kidnap, and carry away the said Jose Maria Luguen and Feliciano Herrera without the borders of Yuma County, State of Arizona, into the Republic of Mexico, and then and there of said wilful, unlawful, felonious, deliberate, and premeditated malice aforethought kill and murder them, the said Jose Maria Luguen and Feliciano Herrera.

All of which is contrary to the form of the statutes in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the State of Arizona.

W. F. TIMMONS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 7th day of February, 1920.

CHARLES M. SMITH.

Justice of the Peace of Said Precinct.

In the justice court, first precinct, county of Yuma, State of Arizona.

State of Arizona v. Carlos Calles, defendant. Stipulation.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 13, 1920.

The honorable the GOVERNOR OF ARIZONA,
Phoenix.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a letter from the Treasury Department, dated January 5, with inclosures, concerning the execution of one Rodolfo Ybarra subsequent to his alleged abduction from the American side of the frontier by Mexican military authorities.

I have the honor to request that an investigation and report be made relative to this matter, and, assuming the facts are found to be as stated, that I be advised as to what action, if any, it will be practicable to take in the courts of Arizona against the abductors.

In this connection you are advised that, by treaty between the United States and Mexico, there is made extraditable "kidnaping of minors or adults, defined to be the abduction or detention of person or persons in order to exact money from them or their families, or for other unlawful end."

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

ROBERT LANSING.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 5, 1920.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith for such action as you may deem proper letters dated the 11th and 18th ultimo from the collector of customs at Los Angeles, Calif., and the report therewith, relative to the shooting of one Rodolfo Ybarra, who, it is alleged, was abducted by the Mexican military authorities from the American side of the line and later executed.

By direction of the Secretary.

Respectfully,

JOUETT SHOUSE,
Assistant Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES CUSTOMS SERVICE,
Los Angeles, Calif., December 11, 1919.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg to invite the attention of the department to the following report from the deputy collector in charge of the port of Andrade, in regard to the shooting of one Rodolfo Ybarra, who, it is alleged, was abducted by Mexican military authorities from the American side of the line and later executed:

"One week ago to-night men acting under the orders of Capt. Calles, commander of the San Luis, Sonora, garrison, entered the United States and forcibly abducted a man who had formerly been an officer of the San Luis garrison by the name (I am told) of Rodolfo Ybarra, took him over the line at San Luis, and shot him. I am told that this man is not the first man that Capt. Calles has executed that has taken refuge in the United States, but it is the first man I believe to be abducted by Capt. Calles and taken to San Luis for execution. This man Rodolfo Ybarra paid head tax at this office on October 20. As far as I know nothing has as yet been done about this piece of lawlessness. When Ybarra paid his head tax here he stated that it would be impossible for him to remain in Mexico because Calles would shoot him. He said it was impossible for any self-respecting Mexican to remain in San Luis, more especially if he had a wife or daughter. Since that time many Mexican laborers have left San Luis and they all tell tales of oppression at the hands of Capt. Calles, some of them almost unbelievable. When such things as these are going on at our very doors can you wonder that we ask for protection? The better class of Mexicans, and especially the Spanish element of Lower California, are very much worried at the present time, the collector of customs at Algodones telling me himself that he feared for his life. They seem to have no confidence in the garrison here or at San Luis and fear trouble among themselves."

I am forwarding his portion of Deputy Collector in Charge Sayles's report in order that it may be called to the attention of the Department of State, if that seems desirable.

I have also requested Deputy Collector in Charge Sayles to furnish me with any other information he may have on this occurrence.

Respectfully,

JOHN B. ELLIOTT, Collector.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES CUSTOMS SERVICE,
Andrade, Calif., December 13, 1919.

The COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Los Angeles, Calif.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, in which you request me to furnish you the facts concerning the abduction and shooting of Rodolfo Ybarra. My information is direct and positive, inasmuch as it is based on the affidavit of Ybarra's wife, and she was certainly in position to know the facts.

According to her affidavit, the following are the facts in this case:

Mr. Ybarra and his wife were employed on a ranch known as the "Squire Munro" ranch that some time between 11 and 12 o'clock on the evening of Saturday, November 29, they were awakened by a man who asked if Mr. Ybarra lived there. Mr. Ybarra replied, "Yes; I am Mr. Ybarra." The man urged Mr. Ybarra to get up, as a gentleman in the auto wished to talk to him. He informed Mr. Ybarra that the men were officers of Yuma County and Mr. Ybarra reluctantly got up and put on his pants and shoes but he was hurried to the car before he had a chance to tie his shoe laces. When he reached the car he evidently saw who his captors were, for he called to his wife that Capt. Calles had got him and was going to take him to San Luis.

Mrs. Ybarra ran to the car and protested, but to no use; she then called an American who was near by and told him her fears. He went to the car to investigate, but was told by some man who spoke good English that they were officers and that Ybarra was under arrest. This man who spoke English was undoubtedly Capt. Calles. Mrs. Ybarra says she recognized one of the men as the chauffeur of Capt. Calles, but was unable to recognize any of the rest because they kept pocket searchlights directed on her face and kept their faces in the dark. As the machine rolled away, Mr. Ybarra called to his wife that they were going to San Luis and to notify his friends, and he kept calling to his wife until the machine had passed beyond hearing distance.

Mrs. Ybarra lost no time in visiting the constable at Somerton and poured out her troubles to him. Either from inability to understand her or from sheer indifference, he did absolutely nothing, and by so doing just cost Capt. Ybarra his life. He said afterwards that he had neglected to call up the sheriff's office at Yuma because it was late at night and he hated to wake them up. In the morning he called them up, and was told that no officers from their office had been sent after Ybarra. It is altogether probable that had the officer at Somerton called Sheriff Greenleaf at the time Mrs. Ybarra visited him, the sheriff would have been able to prevent Capt. Calles from carrying out his fell purpose. Capt. Ybarra has not been seen since. People living near Capt. Calles's headquarters at the ranch San Luis heard a volley of shots about 3 a. m. Sunday morning. This was, no doubt, the time when Ybarra's life was snuffed out.

On Monday morning Mrs. Ybarra visited Yuma and appealed to the authorities for help. She made a deposition before Immigration Inspector Tolen, copies of which were forwarded to his official superior at Los Angeles. You can no doubt secure a copy of this deposition from the immigration inspector, Tolen, copies of which were forwarded to his official superior at Los Angeles. You can no doubt secure a copy of this deposition from the immigration office in Los Angeles. I was told to-day that Sheriff Greenleaf was making an effort to see that justice is done in this case, but that any effort to prosecute Capt. Calles would be resisted by E. F. Sanguinetti, because Calles was a good customer of his and at the present time owed Sanguinetti money. You will recall, no doubt, that about two years ago I sent your office a considerable amount of correspondence and other papers taken from the office files at Calles's store at the San Luis rancho. These papers showed that Sanguinetti and Calles had very extensive dealings with each other and were violating the war-time export regulations. It is almost a certainty that it will be impossible to bring Calles to book for his crimes if the prosecution is undertaken in Yuma County.

For your information,

Respectfully, yours,

M. E. SAYLES, Deputy Collector.

P. S.—I am told that the "Squire Munro" Ranch is located about six miles from the border and not far from Somerton.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
IMMIGRATION SERVICE,
OFFICE OF IMMIGRANT INSPECTOR,
Port Yuma, Ariz., December 1, 1919.

Statement of J. W. Tucker, farmer, near the border, south of Yuma, Ariz., re conditions at San Luis, Mexico, made before Immigrant Inspector Henry L. Tolen, at Yuma, Ariz., December 1, 1919:

My name is J. W. Tucker. I am 55 years old. I was born in Fresno County, Calif. I live now, and have been for the last three years, about 3 miles from San Luis, Sonora, Mexico. I have owned this place since the year 1900.

Some time during the night of November 29, 1919, as I learned yesterday, some parties in an automobile took a Mexican cotton picker from his bed and carried him to San Luis, Mexico, and they have executed him.

This man's name is Ybarra, and I am informed that he has a passport and was legally in the United States. It was a plain case of kidnaping by Capt. Calles or some of his men.

I have come now to you to see if we can have a guard of some kind and sufficient to regulate the crossing back and forth at San Luis. I understand that the immigration office has more to say than any other department as to who shall or shall not pass back and forth on the border.

We who live near the border in the valley feel that our property and lives are in constant danger from these Mexican soldiers which are crossing back and forth at their own will. Calles very frequently comes to Gadsden with four or five soldiers as a bodyguard. I have been informed that these soldiers always carry concealed weapons; Calles would be afraid to come where so many deserting soldiers of his are, without a bodyguard and himself being armed.

About five days ago a band of three mounted Mexicans came near to my house while I was away, and, as my wife says, looked all around, making a survey of the surroundings. They then departed without coming to the house to make their business known. As we live off the main road, it makes it look more queer that they should act so. The next day after they were there I asked a Mexican, who had seen them, who they were, and he said that one of them was the chief henchman of Capt. Calles.

As for myself, I have been informed by my friends that Calles has threatened me personally, because he says I am a Villista, a revolutionist, etc. Of course, it does not make any difference to me who rules in Mexico, but they got that idea in their heads and once detained me in San Luis for a short time. I have been informed since that Calles said I should have been shot when they had me. Naturally I feel uneasy without any protection when we live so near the border.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
IMMIGRATION SERVICE,
OFFICE OF IMMIGRANT INSPECTOR,
Port Yuma, Ariz., December 1, 1919.

Statement of J. C. Adkinson before Immigrant Inspector Henry L. Tolen at Yuma, Ariz., relative to crossing and recrossing of international line south of Yuma, Ariz., by Mexicans supposed to be armed:

My name is J. C. Adkinson; I am 41 years old; I was born in Orange County, Calif.; I live now and have been for last five years 1½ miles south of Gadsden, in Yuma County, Ariz., about 4 miles from the international line. I have frequently seen Mexicans, whom I know to be soldiers under Capt. Calles, at San Luis, Sonora, Mexico., passing my place, generally mounted on horseback, sometimes on foot. I have seen them in other parts of the valley also, and at Gadsden. It is generally supposed that these soldiers always go armed. I have seen Mexicans with guns, but am not sure that they were soldiers. It is well known that when the military guards were stationed on the line they frequently took arms from the soldiers from the Mexican side. I, as well as many of my neighbors, feel that we are menaced in a great degree by these roving bands; they travel in groups of from 2 to 10 and are liable to do us personal violence or steal our stock.

We all feel that we should have a sufficient guard in the valley to prevent this indiscriminate crossing.

Exact copy as signed by J. C. Adkinson.

Statement of W. A. Tucker, relative to movements of Mexican soldiers near the border in United States territory:

My name is W. A. Tucker; I am 27 years old; I was born at Azusa, Calif.; I live at my ranch near the international line south of Yuma, Ariz. I have lived there for one and a half years. Statement made before Henry L. Tolen, Immigrant Inspector.

I wish to state that I have seen Mexican soldiers in San Luis, Sonora, Mexico, riding in the United States, and that they were armed with revolvers. I have seen them along foot of the mesa apparently with no business, just riding around. About a week ago one of them came over to my place. I had a Mexican girl working for me, he came to see her. He was sitting in the kitchen and I saw a gun on his hip. There were two men with him and I asked the girl who they were and she said they were all soldiers from the other side.

I have seen them under the influence of liquor here on this side of the line. I never feel safe near a drunken Mexican when he is armed.

We feel that we should have some kind of protection against these fellows, who seem to wander back and forth as they please. Our lives and property are not safe unless there is some restriction on the crossing and recrossing at San Luis.

County of Yuma, ss:

Catalina Amada de Ybarra, being first duly sworn, upon oath, says:

I live in Somerton, Ariz. On the night of November 29, 1919, on Saturday night, at from 11 to 12 o'clock some one knocked at the door where my husband and I were living on the Squire Munro place in Yuma Valley, Yuma County, Ariz. My husband was very sound asleep. I awoke but did not respond to the knock. Then some one opened the door, put his head inside, and said "Good evening." My husband then awoke. The person then asked, "Who runs this ranch, is it Sabala?" Then some one outside said "It is not Sabala, it is Ybarra." Then the one inside said, "Are you Ybarra?" My husband said, "Yes." "Then you are the one we want; get up, we want to talk to you." I ran to the house of an American close by and called him to come quick. He came, but as he did not understand Spanish he could not know what was passing. The one who had hold of my husband told the American that he was a sheriff from Yuma.

The American believed this, and said "All right," and went away. They—there were three of them—then took my husband to an auto which stood some distance away from the house; as they took him away he called to me, "They are taking me to San Luis." This he called several times. I sent some boys on horseback to Somerton to call the deputy sheriff. He came about 2 o'clock in the morning, talked with the American whom I had called, and then he went away, saying he would phone to Yuma in the morning; he was convinced that the parties were officers. When they were taking my husband away I called to them to let him go, and then one of them grabbed at me and I ran and hid myself in the privy. Next morning, not hearing from the sheriff at Somerton, I telephoned to the sheriff's office in Yuma and was informed that no officers had made any such arrest. Then I went to San Luis, demanding that my husband be given up, but I was told that he was not there.

I recognized one of the party as Francisco Moreno, who is chauffeur for Capt. Calles. As Calles is the only enemy my husband has, I do not doubt that he had my husband taken to Mexico and there shot.

CATALINA AMADA DE YBARRA.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 19th day of January, 1920.

[SEAL.]

W. F. TIMMONS, Notary Public.

My commission expires January 18, 1922.

OFFICE OF THE COUNTY ATTORNEY, YUMA COUNTY,
Yuma, Ariz., January 31, 1920.

Hon. WILEY E. JONES,
Attorney General, Phoenix, Ariz.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Referring to your communication of January 23, 1920, inclosing communication to you from the office of the governor of Arizona, transmitting communication from the Hon. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, in regard to the matter of the kidnaping of Rodolfo Ybarra on the night of November 29, 1919, from his home between Somerton and Gadsden, Yuma County, Ariz., and his subsequent assassination on the Mexican side of the international boundary line by Mexican authorities, I have the honor to retransmit to you the papers forwarded, together with the affidavit of Catalina Amada de Ybarra, taken before me on January 19, 1920, together with copies of affidavits of Catalina Amada de Ybarra, J. C. Atkinson, W. A. Tucker, and J. W. Tucker before the United States immigration inspector, Henry L. Tolen, on December 1, 1919, together with copies of letters written by B. F. Fly, also a copy of complaint sworn to by Catalina Amada de Ybarra, which thus far has been withheld from filing, and issue of warrant pending further investigation and advice from your office. This complaint is premised upon section 808 of the Penal Code. I am also inclosing copy of report made by United States Immigration Inspector Henry L. Tolen, December 2, 1919, to whom the report of the occurrence was first made.

In regard to the extradition of Capt. Calles, upon the charge of kidnaping, under section 135-6 of the Penal Code, I beg to report that in my opinion such action would result in his giving bond through the influence of influential business men in Yuma in whatever amount such bonds might be fixed; but that upon the charge of murder he may be apprehended on this side of the international boundary line and held without bail pending proceedings and that such action would be more likely to effect complete discovery of the evidences of the execution of Ybarra.

The following facts and circumstances which I believe sufficient to convict Calles and Moreno of the murder of Ybarra are as follows:

(1) Capt. Calles attempted to secure an arrangement with Immigration Inspector Tolen for the deportation of his deserting soldiers and officers, that he (Calles) might execute them.

(2) On January 23, 1920, Capt. Calles urged the same request to R. H. Colvin, agent of the Department of Justice at Tucson, Ariz., and Inspector Tolen of the Immigration Service.

(3) Capt. Calles left San Luis, Mexico, in his automobile driven by his chauffeur, Francisco Moreno, about 7 p. m. on the evening of November 29, after having given orders to Leopoldo Lorona to saddle three of his (Calles's) horses and leave them at the Lorona ranch on the American side of the international boundary line.

(4) Francisco Moreno was recognized by Catalina Amada de Ybarra as one of the party who, representing themselves to be officers from Yuma, seized Ybarra from his bed on the Squire Munro ranch 2½ miles west of Somerton, Yuma County, Ariz., between 11 and 12 o'clock on the night of November 29, 1919.

(5) Ybarra was taken to the Lorona ranch in Capt. Calles's automobile, and his automobile remained at the Lorona ranch until the following morning.

(6) The three of Capt. Calles's horses, saddled according to his order, were mounted by the three men who came with Ybarra to the Lorona ranch, Ybarra traveling on foot, went in the direction of the mesa and the international boundary line.

(7) Shots were heard about 2 a. m. November 30, 1919 on the mesa in the direction in which Ybarra was taken, to the south of the international line, by Cruz Rosas, who was at the time one of Capt. Calles soldiers on guard, and who later went to the place where he had heard the shots, saw the tracks and a place having the appearance of a freshly made grave leveled off and unmarked, about 90 feet southerly from the first international boundary line monument to the east of San Luis, Mexico.

(8) Officers of the Yuma County sheriff's party followed tracks of three horsemen from the Lorona ranch in a southerly direction to the international boundary line, near the first monument east from San Luis on December 1, 1919.

(9) Manuel Alvarez now being held in the Yuma jail pending investigation, has made statements to Cruz Rosas that he (Alvarez) helped to bury Ybarra and that he was executed by the order of Capt. Calles. (To the officers Alvarez denies any knowledge of the affair.)

(10) It is my belief that additional evidences of necessary facts might be secured if Capt. Calles and Francisco Moreno were known to be lodged in jail without bail so as to relieve certain persons from their influence and from fear of harm from them, particularly the Loronas on the American side, and a number of persons still in San Luis, Mexico.

You may recall that on the occasion of my visit to Phoenix on December 6, 1919, we very briefly discussed this incident, and upon your suggestion I, at that time, handed Mr. Flynn copies of the affidavits of Catalina Amada de Ybarra, J. O. Atkinson, J. W. Tucker, and W. A. Tucker, with a request for advice as to whether this matter should be taken up with the State or Federal authorities, not desiring to proceed in any manner that might possibly incur international complications, but to this time have not received any communications from Mr. Flynn concerning the matter.

Realizing the gravity of the situation and the possibility that it would endanger certain residents of the Yuma Valley near the international boundary line from knowledge of an investigation on this matter, and the interest taken by persons making the affidavits, I made every effort to maintain secrecy in such steps as were taken by me; but on my return from Phoenix I was called upon by Col. B. F. Fly, who appeared to be advised of all steps that had been taken and informed me that he had taken the matter up personally both with the State and Federal authorities at Phoenix and had straightened the matter out so they had understood the situation, and that the rumors of the abduction and execution of Ybarra were malicious and false.

Regarding the vindication or defense of Capt. Calles by Col. Fly, as appears by the inclosed letters, I have no doubt that they were dictated by Capt. Calles, and that Col. Fly has been acting more or less as an agent and employee of Capt. Calles, and that he has acted at times in a similar capacity for Gov. Cantu, of Lower California. It also appears from the statements made by Col. Fly to R. H. Colvin, agent of the Department of Justice at Tucson, Ariz., and Henry L. Tolen, immigration inspector at Yuma, Ariz., on January 23, 1920, that Mr. Fly himself, together with some Mexican officer from Algodones, Lower California, during the month of September, 1919, kidnaped one Acero and two other Mexican deserting soldiers from the garrison at Algodones, Lower California, handcuffed them after they were released by the chief of police at Yuma, taking them back to Algodones, where it is said Acero and one other were immediately executed, while the third was taken to Mexicali, Lower California.

While it is true that a strong influence in and about Yuma is intimately connected with Capt. Calles through friendship arising from business relations, I am not of the opinion that such influence would sufficiently justify the conclusion reached by Deputy Collector M. E. Sales, that it will be impossible to bring Calles to book for his crimes if prosecution is undertaken in Yuma County; but, to the contrary, I am of the opinion that a successful prosecution may be had upon the charge of murder, and that upon the early filing of a complaint already sworn to and the issue of a warrant thereon both Calles and Moreno may be apprehended within a few days on the American side of the line. To accomplish this result, however, the utmost secrecy will be necessary, as no doubt Calles has many friends and agents in Yuma alert to give him immediate notice of any proceedings about to be taken.

Should you deem it proper and wise to proceed along this line, I would thank you to wire me upon receipt of this report simply the word "proceed."

Very respectfully,

W. F. TIMMONS,
County Attorney of Yuma County, Ariz.

P. S.—The copies of Col. Fly's letters to United States Attorney Flynn, attached, were procured from Col. Fly himself by United States Immigration Inspector Henry L. Tolen, who has been unceasing in his efforts, and through whose aid and cooperation I have been enabled to secure practically all of the valuable information in this case. It should be borne in mind that we have no military and no adequate gun power in the hands of citizens to take care of a possible assault from Calles's men upon detention of their commanding officer.

Hon. W. F. TIMMONS,

County Attorney, Yuma, Ariz.:

Letter and papers in Ybarra case received. Gov. Campbell and I advise you to proceed quietly, as you have suggested.

WILEY E. JONES, Attorney General.

FEBRUARY 3, 1920.

DEAR GENERAL: Have read the communications, etc., of the Ybarra case and advise proceeding as outlined by county attorney of Yuma County. A trial will clear the muchly affected atmosphere along the Yuma County border.

Yours,

CAMPBELL.

The CHAIRMAN. Has more than one kidnaping occurred along there on this side of the line?

Mr. TOLEN. There were two cases as against Calles, and what I would call a kidnaping case occurred on September 9 last year, when there were two Mexican soldiers taken from the streets of Yuma down to Andrade. That is on the California side of the river. I have no official knowledge of that, only just hearsay.

The CHAIRMAN. What has been the course of the sheriff and the officers of Arizona and of Yuma County with reference to those charges of kidnaping by the Mexicans from the other side?

Mr. TOLEN. Well, it seemed to me they were a little lukewarm on this other case; it was in abeyance so long. I sent my report to my superior officer in Los Angeles and got a letter back from him approving the action I had taken in it, and with notations as to just what he had done about these reports, but nothing more was heard of it for quite a while.

The CHAIRMAN. Was anything ever done with reference to it or in an endeavor to punish Calles until these complaints were filed by District Attorney Timmons?

Mr. TOLEN. Nothing whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Was Mr. Calles in the habit of coming into Yuma?

Mr. TOLEN. Oh, he came back and forth all the time there.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know when he was arrested at Yuma?

Mr. TOLEN. I know when he was arrested at Yuma; yes. I pointed him out to the county attorney. He didn't know him personally.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he armed or not at the time of his arrest?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes; he was armed, and both of his cohorts were armed, too, Moreno and Teran.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are the American soldiers there?

Mr. TOLEN. There are none on the Yuma side of the river.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been any attempt on the part of any of the citizens there to secure the placing of soldiers along the border?

Mr. TOLEN. I think some of them have asked for soldiers. There have been several military officers around there; but until Col. Scott came I never noticed any of them much. I was with the official when he investigated the—

The CHAIRMAN. I notice among these papers here that Mr. Atkinson, I believe it is, among others, states that the Mexican officers, Calles's command, Calles and officers and others are constantly crossing the line there armed.

Mr. TOLAN. Well, they did go back and forth until this kidnaping happened, as they pleased. There was nobody to stop them. There was only one immigration officer in Yuma, and the line is 25 miles below, and at that time they didn't even have an automobile allowance or any way to go around without you would bum a ride from a friend or walk, and a man can't stay down there all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no port of entry there?

Mr. TOLAN. There is no port of entry there; just the same as any other place along the line.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice that the complaint against Calles is dated the 7th day of February, 1920. That is this year.

Mr. TOLAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Accusing him of the murder of Luguen and Herrera, placing the date of that occurrence as of the 7th day of February, 1918, a year prior. Then this kidnaping has been going on for a year there without interference—or two years?

Mr. TOLAN. Two years. Ever since he has been down there he has been going back and forth without let or hindrance.

The CHAIRMAN. And there are no soldiers there?

Mr. TOLAN. No soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. And the peace officers have not interfered with him?

Mr. TOLAN. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know personally, or know of, a man by the name of Calles in the cabinet of Mr. Carranza at this time?

Mr. TOLAN. Only by hearsay.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what position he formerly occupied, before he went into the cabinet?

Mr. TOLAN. Governor of Sonora.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is regarded as the strongest man in Sonora, aside from Obregon?

Mr. TOLAN. Calles.

The CHAIRMAN. Adolfo de la Huerta is the present governor, is he not?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And succeeded Calles?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is understood he is rather a protégé of Calles. Calles was taken into the cabinet and he was put in as governor, and he is the present governor?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What relation is Capt. Carlos G. Calles to Gen. Calles, formerly governor and now minister in Carranza's cabinet?

Mr. TOLAN. Nephew.

The CHAIRMAN. The Ybarra case was dismissed by the magistrate because of the act or the fact of death was not sufficiently proven, according to his judgment?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But by a stipulation in the case when it went to the superior court I notice that the attorney for the defendant agreed with the prosecuting attorney that the evidence which was taken in that case should be submitted in the Luguen and Herrera cases to the magistrate?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the magistrate held Calles under $5,000 bond for murder in the Luguen and Herrera cases, while he decided the evidence was not sufficient in the other case—that is, that the corpus delicti had not been proven?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But in the Luguen and Herrera cases, they were executed publicly?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes; they were proven.

The CHAIRMAN. So that they proved the death in those cases?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You may also, Mr. Secretary, file the stipulation attached to the information in this case. It is not necessary to file the order holding the defendant to answer.

(The stipulation will be found among the documents last copied in the record.)

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know when—or possibly you do not know the dates—Mr. Calles was to appear to defend against this case?

Mr. TOLAN. He has been cited three times to appear, and he was to appear to-day, the last time. On two different days he has been cited to appear and did not appear, and he has been ordered to appear to-day or forfeit bond.

The CHAIRMAN. I have a communication here from the prosecuting attorney in which he says that "The date has been set by the superior court on two occasions requiring Capt. Calles to appear for arraignment, and his counsel notified. Thus far he has not appeared for arraignment, and our superior court has fixed next Monday, March 15, 1920, as the final date in which he may appear for arraignment, at which time his bond in the sum of $5,000 will be forfeited should he at that time fail to appear."

I will ask that this telegram be read into the record.

(Telegram read, as follows:)

Yuma, Ariz, March 15, 1920; a. m. Senator Albert B. Fall, U. S. Grant Hotel, San Diego, Calif.: Capt. Carlos Calles refused to appear for arraignment at 10 a. m. to-day, and bond in the sum of $5,000 forfeited. Full transcript of case with letter mailed you at Van Nuys Hotel, Los Angeles, Calif., last Friday. Did you receive same? Answer. W. F. Timmons, county attorney.

The CHAIRMAN. This transcript was received and will be filed, but not made a part of this record.

In your judgment, Mr. Tolan, for the peace and safety of the American people—there are people living along on the line there, are there not?

Mr. TOLAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. These Mexicans coming over from Mexico have been employed by and working for them?

Mr. TOLAN. Very many of them; nearly all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice Mr. Timmons speaks of the safety of those people along the boundary. In your judgment, would it be better for the safety of those American citizens on the boundary if a military detachment were sent down there to watch that border?

Mr. TOLEN. Oh, certainly; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not possible for you, with your force, and the other inspectors there, to prevent raids across the border or prevent kidnaping of citizens?

Mr. TOLEN. I am the only inspector there. There are no others there that are of any help.

The CHAIRMAN. And you can not catch these fellows?

Mr. TOLEN. I can't catch all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. And you think as an officer that there should be—

Mr. TOLEN. Well, many of the farmers down there keep asking me, "What are you going to do with that fellow? If they don't put him in jail or if they don't get rid of him some way or other, I have got to move away." Mr. Tucker says he is afraid of his life all the time. He has been threatened by him, and several times they rode up back of his house and behind there on horseback, standing looking over the valley, looking over there, and I know—

The CHAIRMAN. He didn't like the looks of them?

Mr. TOLEN. No; and they reported Tucker as having arms in his house, but I went there with a Department of Justice agent to search the place and never found a trace of anything like arms.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is he—on this side?

Mr. TOLEN. He is about 3 miles from the line.

The CHAIRMAN. On the American side?

Mr. TOLEN. On the American side.

The CHAIRMAN. Would he not have a right to have arms?

Mr. TOLEN. I suppose so. He ought to have, if they are going to go around like that. If he is being menaced by them, he has a right to have arms in his house.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Tolen, of course some people might not understand exactly why this condition is allowed to continue there. Have these Mexicans been spending much money in Yuma?

Mr. TOLEN. All their supplies have been bought in Yuma; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any Americans there who are very close to them or intimate with them?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes; some of them. Those that they trade with, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anyone there who seems to come to their assistance if they need assistance?

Mr. TOLEN. Well, I don't know about that.

The CHAIRMAN. If Gov. Calles or any of his officers get into any trouble there, are there any Americans with whom he corresponds with reference to it?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes; he corresponds with Col. Fly. That is, he made a report to Col. Fly that came into my hands officially, and I investigated it, and also the letters that—Col. Fly furnished me a copy of letters that he had written to District Attorney Flynn.

The CHAIRMAN. That is United States District Attorney Flynn?

Mr. TOLEN. United States District Attorney Flynn at Phoenix.

The CHAIRMAN. What was this correspondence about?

Mr. TOLEN. Calles claimed that these deserting officers and men were I. W. W's and revolutionists, and were buying arms and ammunition and were gathering it up for the revolutionists in Sonora and Lower California, and that James Tucker's place was a station where they had their arms and ammunition cached, and that Tucker employed these men. That is what he charges. And that a woman by the name of Mrs. Victoria Sloat, who lived down close to San Luis, about a mile from there, was inducing his soldiers to desert and bring over their arms and ammunition; that they would buy it. One Mesique Corlis, is a fellow who lived with Mrs. Sloat there, or close by, and ran her farm, and Calles claimed that he was an agent of the revolutionists, buying arms and ammunition. I have investigated those people, in company with an agent of the Department of Justice, Mr. Colburn, at Tucson, and we did not find anything.

The CHAIRMAN. But the United States has been called upon to investigate the actions of its own citizens in the Tucson territory at the demand of Mr. Calles?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Calles has not been interfered with in coming over here and seizing people without process of law on this side and taking them back on the other side and killing them?

Mr. TOLEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you heard from any other officials down there? Do you know anything about any other Mexican officials at all calling upon Americans along the same line for help?

Mr. TOLEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever see any correspondence between Gov. Cantu and any Americans there?

Mr. TOLEN. I saw a telegram from Gov. Cantu asking to—and Benjamin F. Fly—asking them to take it up with the proper officers and have a fellow by the name of Marquez who was in jail in Yuma, delivered to him at his office at Andrade, that he was under a charge of murder. That is, he was concerned with—I don't know whether he was under a charge of murder himself or not, but he was concerned in the uprising at Algodones among the Mexican soldiers on September 8, 1919, when a captain was killed.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is Col. Fly?

Mr. TOLEN. Well, I don't know him, or who he is, only Ben F. Fly.

The CHAIRMAN. What is his business?

Mr. TOLEN. He has been employed by the Chamber of Commerce of Yuma in some capacity, and he has been active in the sale of mesu lands, which are Government lands there on the mesa.

The CHAIRMAN. Who gave bond for Calles?

Mr. TOLEN. Well, I only know one man who was on the bond, and that is Magisi.

The CHAIRMAN. Who secured the bond for him; do you know?

Mr. TOLEN. I don't know. There were two merchants from Somerton on the bond. One of them, I think, was a Mexican. I don't know their names.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what remuneration of any kind Col. Fly was to get for his services?

Mr. TOLEN. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. How far east and west does the line run there, where there are no American soldiers on this side? Where are the first American soldiers—

Mr. TOLEN. The first American soldiers are at the Colorado River, but they are on the California side, opposite; but there are only 10 of them with a noncommissioned officer in charge. Those squads are sent out and changed every 30 days from Calexico.

The CHAIRMAN. How far east do they patrol?

Mr. TOLEN. Well, they are right there; they can't go farther east, because that is the river; and they can't go west, because it is right in between the river and the sand hills. All they do is to watch that Hanlon headgate there.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, going east from this squad of soldiers, where do you find the next soldiers?

Mr. TOLEN. I don't know whether there are any more before you get to Nogales or not, which is about 170 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you hear the evidence, or do you know the evidence, that was given in the Ybarra case in the examination and trial of Calles?

Mr. TOLEN. I heard most of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Who, if anyone, was with Calles at the time of the kidnapping of Luguen and Herrera in the automobile; do you know?

Mr. TOLEN. Francisco Moreno.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not speaking of the Ybarra case now, but the Luguen and Herrera cases.

Mr. TOLEN. Oh, the Luguen and Herrera cases?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. TOLEN. I don't know who that was. I remember that the witness who testified to that more particularly than anyone else was a man by the name of Salvador Holguin at Somerton.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all for the present, Mr. Tolen. We have not had time to go through this record of the trial and would like to have you remain in attendance upon the committee at least until to-morrow.

Mr. TOLEN. All right.

(A recess was thereupon taken until 4.30 o'clock p. m.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1920.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Los Angeles, Calif.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 9 p. m., in Room 622, Van Nuys Hotel, Los Angeles, Calif., Senator Albert B. Fall presiding.

Present: Senator Albert B. Fall, chairman; Senator Mark A. Smith; Maj. Dan M. Jackson, secretary.

TESTIMONY OF REV. EDWIN R. BROWN.

(Witness sworn by the secretary.)

The SECRETARY. Your full name, Mr. Brown?

Mr. BROWN. Edwin R. Brown.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of the United States, are you?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. BROWN. Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you lived in California?

Mr. BROWN. I lived in California two and a half years before going to Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. And when did you go to Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. In 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. What portion of the Republic did you go to?

Mr. BROWN. I lived in the capital and in Puebla.

The CHAIRMAN. How far is Puebla from the capital, approximately?

Mr. BROWN. About a hundred miles south and east.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you remain in Mexico at this time?

Mr. BROWN. I was there for nine years.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your business or occupation during your residence in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. I was first pastor of the English-speaking Baptist Church of Mexico City, and then missionary in the native work in Puebla.

The CHAIRMAN. In following your work, both as a pastor and as a missionary, did you come in contact with the native people of Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; especially the last five years I worked among the native people only.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you then learn or did you understand prior to that time the Spanish language?

Mr. BROWN. I learned Spanish in about six months after I went down there, so that I speak it now as well as I do English, I guess.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your present work?

Mr. BROWN. I am now a general missionary among the Mexicans in the southwest for the American Baptist Home Mission Society.

The CHAIRMAN. You belong to the Baptist denomination?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. When were you in Mexico last?

Mr. BROWN. I left there the last of April, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you leave from Puebla; that is, were you in Puebla at that time, in April, 1918?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you leave Mexico, if there was any particular reason for your leaving?

Mr. BROWN. Well, the Home Mission Society recalled me because of a threat made by the authorities to arrest me and send me out of the country as a pernicious foreigner for preaching the gospel to the contrary of the constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. Contrary to the constitution of 1917?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; the new constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Carranza's constitution?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What authorities made the threat?

Mr. BROWN. The municipal authorities.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the city of Puebla?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They would have had no jurisdiction to expel you except through the action of the central Government of Mexico; that is, to expel you from the Republic?

Mr. BROWN. No. But I think the constitution gives the governors and the presidents of municipalities the right to arrest anyone that is acting as a minister, and then Carranza can send them out.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar with this clause of the constitution under which they proposed to expel you?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; I have translated it into English, and have it with me.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the particular clause of the constitution to which you refer?

Mr. BROWN. Well, it is article 130. It says:

It is necessary to be a Mexican by birth in order to be a minister of any religious creed in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. And how was the threat to expel you communicated to you? By whom?

Mr. BROWN. It was communicated indirectly to me by the agent of the Puebla Light & Power Co., who heard it in a meeting that he had in the city hall with the presidente municipal, and he came and told me and warned me to get out.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he tell you that the presidente municipal had expressed himself with reference to your expulsion at this meeting?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You communicated, then, with your home board, and they recalled you?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Had you in your teachings there, or in your sermons, attacked the constitution or the laws of Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any particular reason further than that you were simply not a native of Mexico and were preaching the gospel?

Mr. BROWN. No. We never preached on politics at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever interfere in politics while you were there?

Mr. BROWN. I never had anything to do with political questions in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, the threat to expel you, and which caused you to leave there, was simply and solely based upon the clause of the constitution that none except native-born Mexicans or Mexican citizens should be allowed to preach the gospel?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. I think it was caused, perhaps, by some Catholic inciting some of the members of the city council to make those threats, because we were converting some of their people.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had your attention called to the minutes of any of the meetings before this committee? Have you read the minutes?

Mr. BROWN. Very little.

The CHAIRMAN. Testimony has been offered and given before this committee by other ministers or teachers not residing in Mexico, but having to do with work there, particularly with educational work. For instance, I recall the testimony of Dr. Inman, who, I believe, is now residing in New York, who testified that he and some of his associates engaged in such work had received assurances direct from Mr. Carranza that this clause of the constitution would not be invoked against them, nor would that provision of the constitution with reference to schools being conducted by ministers or preachers, nor would that clause be invoked against denominational schools being run by them, and that they relied upon that promise. No such promise was made, generally or publicly, to your knowledge, was it?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I only know that our superintendent of missions claimed to have received some such assurance as that from Carranza in a meeting where he and some others had a conference with Carranza.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was after you left there, or before?

Mr. BROWN. Well, no; I think that was before. But we didn't have any faith in those assurances at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any of your associates there, the other ministers who were engaged in the work, and whom you doubtless knew, to your knowledge, place any confidence in such assurances?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I think some of them did; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. From your knowledge of the reputation of Mr. Carranza, would you credit such general assurance or particular assurance in the event he became personally interested in any way in revoking such assurance? In other words, the constitution being written, and being presumed to be the law of the land, what reliance could you place upon the word of Carranza that would justify you in believing that you would be protected as against the constitution or the law?

Mr. BROWN. Well, there wasn't anything in Mr. Carranza's character that would give you such assurance, but his management of affairs in Mexico would give you that assurance, because he was a virtual dictator, and whatever he said went.

The CHAIRMAN. And so long as he remained of the same mind you could depend upon the assurance?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But you have no assurance that he would remain of the same opinion for any length of time when it suited him to revoke such assurance?

Mr. BROWN. No; when it suited him in any way to please any of his favorites by revoking that assurance—and he refused to put it in writing—

The CHAIRMAN. He did refuse to put it in writing?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And to your knowledge, never has put it in writing?

Mr. BROWN. No; not that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has no evidence that it was ever placed in writing at any time.

Mr. BROWN. It makes Mexico practically the only place in the world where an American missionary can not go and become the pastor of a group of people to whom he preaches the gospel.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the general conditions in Mexico now, if you know, as to peace and order, or as to violence, and what assurances have we, if any, from your knowledge of Mexico and its people, that a condition of violence, if it exists, or peace and prosperity, if it exists momentarily, will continue under the present régime in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. Well, of course, my personal knowledge would not date back further than 1918, but among the Mexican people that I meet continually the reports always are that things are very bad in Mexico, and I know, of course, as all people know who meet the Mexican immigrants, that they are continually fleeing from the terrible conditions there. I don't think there is any guaranty in the character of the men that are conducting the revolution to give us any hope for any state of peace. It is simply a state of war there now.

The CHAIRMAN. You speak of those who are conducting the revolution. What of the character of those who claim to be conducting the Government?

Mr. BROWN. Well, the Government, of course, is the revolution in a certain sense. These other fellows are the counter-revolutionists.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there really what the American people would know as a government in existence in Mexico; that is, is there a republican or democratic government in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. No. I think the American people look at the situation in Mexico through their own glasses. They do not see conditions as they really are there. The true Government of Mexico today is a military hierarchy, with an absolute dictator in command; but he is only absolute in so far as it suits the wishes of his leading men to let him be absolute.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, by "his leading men" do you speak of his leading military men?

Mr. BROWN. His leading military commanders.

The CHAIRMAN. Then he is absolute so long as he has the support of the military commander of what are known as the Carranza forces?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir. I don't think he has the support of more than a very small percentage of the Mexican people.

The CHAIRMAN. From your knowledge of the leading men remaining in Mexico, up to the time you left in 1918, do you see any hope for a democratic government, or the establishment and maintenance of democratic government or any government of law and peace and order being established by any such men in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. No; I am entirely pessimistic as to the outlook for Mexico. In the beginning I was heartily in sympathy with the ideals of the revolution, both the Madero revolution and the Carranza revolution. I was in favor of the Carranza revolution. After studying it closely and seeing the hypocrisy of the leaders and the fact that they used patriotism for their own ends as a means for looting and despoiling the country, and when we see, for instance, the issue of paper money and the things that were done—five different times Carranza issued paper money and then repudiated it, and that is just one of the many things—I don't think there is any hope of any of the men that are in power to-day ever bringing order out of chaos in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Nor is there any hope, so far as you know, or are able to judge, from any of the men who are not in power—that is, any of the so-called revolutionists or any of the other Mexicans in Mexico to-day—that they may be able to bring order out of chaos?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I believe that a stable government in Mexico can only be brought about upon a basis of morality, and I do not believe that the system of religion and education in Mexico for the past 400 years has produced either individuals or a public opinion sufficiently moral to hope for any man being able to lead the people. If there was a moral man those in power or the armed forces to-day would not follow him. Just as I told Mr. Bryan. I had a conference with William Jennings Bryan two years ago in June next, and he asked me that same question, if I thought there was any moral man in Mexico to whom we could turn and give our support and who would lead the people out of their troubles, and I told him there wasn't any such moral man in the first place, and in the second place the people didn't want to follow that kind of a man.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what is the first necessity, in your own judgment, in establishing a condition under which the people of Mexico might be taught and led into the proper spirit so that they might establish and maintain a democratic and moral government? What is the condition?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I think the first condition would be a protectorate of the United States over Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. In your judgment, based upon your information and experience and knowledge, would it be possible now for the church people of the United States or of the world to carry on any educational or religious campaign in Mexico through any source under conditions now existing or likely to exist in Mexico for the uplift of those people? Suppose that the good church people of the United States would raise a fund of a hundred million dollars, or of any number of millions of dollars, for the purpose of carrying on educational work and religious work in Mexico for the uplift and the betterment of the Mexican people themselves, what opportunity offers itself for the carrying on of such work? Is there a condition which would justify you in believing that the expenditure of that money would achieve any end?

Mr. BROWN. Well, in the first place, the conditions are so abnormal in Mexico that that work could only be carried on in the larger centers; it could not be carried on in the outlying districts to any great extent. In the second place, it is a work of years to regenerate and reconstruct a nation. I know, for instance, Mr. Inman and others—I read, I think it was in Colliers, some missionary lady and some of our missionary leaders have said that what Mexico needs is Bibles and not bullets. Well, I believe that, too. But some of the men down there, like Villa, and some of those that are around Carranza himself, can never be reached by Bibles. I can't imagine Villa, for instance, joining a Bible class or old Candido Aguilar taking a course in agriculture in Mr. Inman's agricultural schools. I do think if there is any hope for Mexico at all it will come through the evangelical and protestant teachings and the protestant evangelical churches.

The CHAIRMAN. Can such work be carried on under the present conditions in Mexico, in your judgment, successfully?

Mr. BROWN. Well, it is being carried on there; yes. For instance, there are a number of missionaries there that are at work. Our Baptist denomination retired all of its American missionaries, putting the work into the hands of Mexican leaders, the Mexican preachers, and the work is going on very well, indeed. But if the Christian people of the United States were to raise a hundred million dollars and proceed to send a number of missionaries to Mexico to inaugurate an intensive campaign for religious propaganda and education connected with it in that country I believe that the Catholics and those that do not believe in any religion at all would be aroused to insist upon the enforcement of this article 130; and, furthermore, there would be great opposition aroused to it under the plea that it was a pacific conquest of Mexico, just as they have said more than once—I have in my papers here statements where a preacher, for instance, is called a paid agent of the United States Government and those that believe in his teachings or doctrine are called traitors to their country. I don't think that program could settle the difficulties of Mexico in a hundred years, although I would very much like to see it begun.

The CHAIRMAN. So long as article 130, to which you have referred, remains unrepealed, what must its effect be or what is its effect and what will be its effect, so long as it remains unrepealed or unamended, upon the American missionaries or teachers who continue their work in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. I am glad you asked that question. It legally makes every one of them an outlaw and a "pernicious foreigner," every one. The girls in our mission schools are pernicious foreigners because they are teaching religion in a primary school. Every man that is preaching in Mexico—the way they do is they camouflage it now and they don't say they are preaching; they have all resigned their churches, but they give "conferencias de la Biblia" or Bible conferences; and even then, just as they have expelled, under that act, Spanish bishops, so under that act also every foreign superintendent of missions, like Mr. Inman, or Bishop O'Connell, or any of the other superintendents of missions, are liable to be expelled at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. At the whim or caprice of any authority who has the power to put article 130 into effect?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. A successor of Carranza, for instance, might be some one who might say he knew nothing about Mr. Carranza's assurances, and he could apply that law and expel everyone, even the general missionaries and Methodist bishops, and people of that kind, and they are all technically, and under the law, according to that constitution, lawbreakers, because they are breaking the law to-day. That is the reason our society withdrew all of its Americans, because they said we don't want any of our workers arrested as lawbreakers in Mexico, and as long as that article was in effect they were liable to arrest.

The CHAIRMAN. If you had continued your American workers there, realizing that you were lawbreakers and knowing that you were dependent entirely upon the present good will of Carranza or of the local or other authorities, what effect would it necessarily have had—or would it have had, whether necessarily or otherwise—upon your missionaries as to the support of the Carranza government by quietly accepting acts of that government or as to exposing publicly in the United States acts against which they should have protested?

Mr. BROWN. Well, very naturally the people that are there now under those assurances and with that sword of Damocles hanging over their heads are all of them compelled to speak in favor of Carranza and the conditions down there; if they did not, the law would be in effect against any one of them and they would be sent out of the country as pernicious foreigners.

The CHAIRMAN. So that, naturally, and necessarily, good, sincere Christian men or women doing work down there now, having that sword hanging over their heads, and yet animated by the desire to do good to those poor people there, must, if they desire to remain at all, submit to things and see things done which otherwise they would protest against?

Mr. BROWN. And they must send out biased reports of conditions down there, because if they did not they would get into trouble immediately; and that is too bad, too, because it makes liars out of good Christian people.

The CHAIRMAN. And eventually must have its effect upon the character of those people and upon mission work generally?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, we realize that you are leaving to-morrow, and that you have been very kind in attending this late session to-night, and we do not care to detain you by asking you any further questions. If you have any papers or documents that you would like to file with us we would like to have them, or if you have any statement of your own that you desire to make, further than you have already spoken, we will be glad to have you make it now.

Mr. BROWN. Well, I would simply make this statement: That during my stay in Mexico I feel so keenly disappointed in the failure of the revolution to live up to its ideals, and I sympathized so greatly with the common people, the poor people of Mexico, in the terrible sufferings that were brought upon them and the deception which they suffered at the hands of the present Government, that I take the stand that I take to-day in regard to conditions in Mexico simply because I feel that that is the only possible way to save the people of Mexico from the hands of those who are their worst enemies; that anything would be preferable to the conditions as they are there to-day; and because of my desire to do something to help Mexico out of its trouble I come before the committee and make these statements.

So much for a statement.

I have here some interesting documents that I thought you might like to see. I don't know whether they have ever come to your attention or not. You read Spanish, of course?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

(Witness hands papers to chairman.)

Mr. BROWN. I attended that meeting, a German propaganda meeting in Puebla, at which there were probably 3,500 Mexicans, and some Germans, and my wife and myself and two missionaries were the only Americans, and it was the hottest anti-American demonstration you ever saw.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a poster or circular?

Mr. BROWN. It is a poster. They were posted up out on the streets.

The CHAIRMAN. Calling a meeting for Wednesday, the 21st—what month was that, do you remember? I don't see the year, either. Tuesday, the 19th, at 7 a. m., first conference; second conference Wednesday, the 20th, and the third conference Thursday, the 21st. Do you remember what year that was?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I think it was the first part of 1918, but I don't remember what month. They showed views, as you can see there, of the Crown Prince and of the Kaiser, and they had views in which they showed the troops marching through Belgium, and the attack on Liege, and then a Spanish speaker got up and tore into the United States for the black list.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I notice the black list and the boycott in Mexico mentioned here.

Mr. BROWN. Yes; it was a very bitter speech against the United States. And just to show you that my ideas of the graft that went on there are not particularly American or not animated by any desire to harm Mexico, there is a clipping that I preserved out of a paper in which one of the Mexican papers down in Mexico tried to show how the graft on corn out in the field—you see here is $10 a carga, which is two sacks.

The CHAIRMAN. A carga is 300 pounds?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. And here are the different hands that it went through: The conductor of the railroad, the municipal president, the chief of the station, the chief of the guard, the general, and the engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. They all had their rake-off?

Mr. BROWN. They all got their rake-off, and when the corn got to the retailer it was $50 a carga.

The CHAIRMAN. This was a Mexican paper, published in Spanish, to show the graft going on there among the Mexicans themselves?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. I cut that out of a paper down in Mexico.

Now, I have a lot of other things here; I don't know how much they will interest you. Here, to my mind, is the most important of all of the things that I have got in Spanish, because it shows how that new constitution and that article in the constitution contravenes the treaty with the United States, and it is written by a lawyer down there and is a very careful opinion. I made a translation of it into English, and I also sent it to the embassy and tried to get the embassy to back me up in a legal fight to declare whether that was constitutional or not, because it abrogates the treaties, which, it says, "stand on foot," or which still remain.

Now, that treaty with the United States has never been abrogated, and yet the constitution denies those rights under it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Mexicans claim that the treaty of 1831, which was renewed in 1846, was abrogated by denunciation by themselves. There was, of course, a dispute about it. It was attempted to be abrogated for the purpose of escaping the payment of certain claims for damage which were made under it and which are insisted upon by our State Department; but their Government had a right, under the constitution, to denounce the treaty by a certain time, and Mexico did denounce the treaty of 1831, which was renewed in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848. So that that is the claim of some of them, that that treaty has been abrogated.

Mr. BROWN. Well, I think it is acknowledged by our State Department, because I quoted the section from that treaty and then applied it to this and asked the United States State Department to back me up, and they sent back a simple dry statement saying that "we know of the existence of no such treaty"; and yet I copied it out of the book of treaties in the consular office.

Now, here is another one: "All foreigners will be held as pernicious who officiate in Mexico."

The CHAIRMAN. What is this article you refer to about "pernicious foreigners"?

Mr. BROWN. Well, that is with regard to ministers, you see.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. This article you have just referred to with reference to the constitution is signed by Don Manuel Aguirre Berlanga, a subsecretary?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. He was very antiforeign and also antireligious. He said, "Mexico and the Mexican people have avowed above and beyond the need of any religion."

The CHAIRMAN. I notice from reading this article in Spanish which you have just handed me that it is a proclamation issued by Don Manuel Aguirre Berlanga, subsecretary to all the governors of the States, calling their attention to article 130 with reference to the exclusion of ministers of the gospel not native Mexicans from any right to hold services or to teach religion in the Republic.

Mr. BROWN. Yes. Now, that would indicate that Berlanga, as one of the cabinet officers, attempted to put into force what Carranza said would not be put in force.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. This is an official declaration in writing, and the declaration on which some of our ministers are relying is only a verbal declaration by Mr. Carranza or Mr. Osuna, or some other authority, not put in writing. Now, shall I return this article to you, or may I have it translated?

Mr. BROWN. You may have it.

The CHAIRMAN. The translation of the article above referred to follows:

(The document last above mentioned is in words and figures as follows, to wit:)

[Translation of clipping from El Democrata, of Puebla, dated Dec. 13, 1911.]

THOSE CLERGYMEN WILL BE CONSIDERED PERNICIOUS WHO ARE OF FOREIGN NATIONALITY AND EXERCISE THEIR MINISTRY IN MEXICO.

Manuel Aguirre Berlanga, subsecretary of state in charge of the department of the interior, sent to all the governors of States the following important circular telegram on the 6th of this month:

"Considering that article 130 of the general constitution of the Republic provides that only native Mexicans may exercise the ministry of any cult (denomination), and in view of the fact that a great number of foreign clergymen, in violation of this proscription, are executing the various acts which constitute the exercising of the ministry of their respective religions—

"By order of the Citizen President of the Republic I hereby instruct you to inform all foreign clergymen who are practicing their profession in your State that unless they immediately cease all such practices the executive of the Union will consider them violators of Mexican constitutional law and apply to them the thirty-third article of the constitution as pernicious aliens.

"MANUEL AGUIRRE BERLANGA,

"Subsecretary of State in Charge of the Department of the Interior."

Mr. BROWN. Now, I have here a number of interesting things to show you, some of which I have cut out and saved from different papers to show the conditions down there. Here is one about the burning or attempted burning of the Queretaro Boys' School, a Methodist institution in Queretaro. It is from the Record of Christian Work. You can have that if you want it.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask the reporter to copy this. It will be marked "No. 2."

The Queretaro Boys' School is attached to the American Methodist Mission in Mexico. Queretaro, a great Roman Catholic center, has been roughly treated by the Carrancistas, who burned confessionals and otherwise showed their hatred of Mother Church. When they were compelled to evacuate, Mother Church took her revenge, not on the hostile Mexican faction, but upon the American mission. A mob, 3,000 strong, shouted, "Long live religion! Death to the Protestants!" broke into the schools, tore organs, benches, and pulpit into the street to a bonfire, heaped them with armfuls of books, clothing, dishes, household linen, and piled shavings and kindlings to fire the building, when, presto! a townsman not connected with the mission shot a rifle into the air and the whole cowardly pack vanished like coyotes. They abandoned the banner which they carried. Its staff proved to be the pole of a baldachin borne in the Catholic processions of the town and witnessed to the authoritative inspiration of the proceedings.—Record of Christian Work.

Mr. BROWN. I have here a statement of Rev. A. H. Sutherland, dated September 4, 1916, about the terrible conditions he found there when he went down to Queretaro. One is in English and one in Spanish. I have another statement by a missionary down there in Mexico—he is still there, so I didn't mention his name, saying that—this was in 1919.

Now, I know this man; he has been down there working every day. But this came in a private letter.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask that that be copied into the record.

Missionary in Zapata country says the country is laid waste and untilled for six years. Scarcely anything has been raised and that little has been stolen. "We would go for miles without seeing anything planted, and when we came to the site of a cornfield we knew a town was near, for the people did not venture far out of the town. The people are starving almost to death. In these parts many of them are merely skeletons." Some of the towns were almost entirely destroyed.

Mr. BROWN. I think it would not be wise to use his name, because they would get right after him down there if you did.

Now, here is an official statement gotten out by the Carranza government just before I left in regard to the percentage of illiteracy throughout Mexico. [Handing paper to chairman.] I would like to ask if the reports to Mr. Wilson of Mr. West, Mr. Hopkins, and Mr. Lind have ever seen the light of day.

The CHAIRMAN. They have never come under my observation. The Senate of the United States requested the reports of the special representatives of the President of the United States upon one occasion, and especially the report of Mr. West, and they were not given to the Senate, and so far as I know no Senator and no Congressman has ever seen either of the reports you have referred to, nor have they ever been published, so far as I am aware.

Mr. BROWN. Now, here is a subject that interests me very much [handing large white poster to chairman]. Have you gotten any facts and figures on that? Mr. Jenkins and I were good friends there for a number of years.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Doctor, where did Mr. Jenkins live in the United States, do you know? Did you know him before you met him in Mexico?

Mr. BROWN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the character of Mr. Jenkins?

Mr. BROWN. Why, he is one of the most splendid and most upright men that I know. He is a man without any bad habits of any kind. He is not a Christian in the orthodox or evangelical sense at all. His father was a Lutheran minister, but his own personal, private life is largely governed by the moral teachings that he received in his father's home; and the whole family, every one of them, are just splendid. I know them all intimately now. And Mr. Jenkins sent to me, in order to preserve them, copies of his first reports to the chargé d'affaires and to the vice consul. He was afraid they might not see light if he sent them to the State Department, so he sent them to me to keep for him, and I have them here.

Mr. FORREST. May I tell Dr. Brown that the reports have seen light?

Dr. BROWN. I think those same reports have since been published.

Mr. FORREST. They have been published in the New York Tribune as an interview with Jenkins, using the same wording as you have there, exactly.

Dr. BROWN. Yes; I think I saw that somewhere, that they had been published. He asked me to keep them as confidential, so I never turned them over to the newspapers at all.

Mr. FORREST. Yes; he did the same thing with me, but he allowed me to print them in another form.

Dr. BROWN. Now, there is another thing that I wanted to bring before the committee, and that is the utter violation of the United States consulate and the threatened shooting of Mr. Jenkins at another time.

The CHAIRMAN. No; we have no evidence about it.

Mr. BROWN. Well, you see, the Carrancistas came into Puebla, and the people didn't like them and didn't want them, and they didn't receive them nicely. Gov. Cos was the governor, and he was just a man of the lower class who had been thrown up by the fortunes of the revolution to occupy the place of governor, and his wife was a common woman, and the aristocracy of Puebla would not receive them into their homes nor invite them to their social functions, and that made Cos so mad that he said, well, he would retire from the city and show the people of Puebla what it meant to fall in the hands of bandits; then he would come back and take the city by blood and fire, and they would receive him then with open arms. And he did retire from the city, and the Zapatistas and the Villistas came in, and they were there for 20 days. I had some very interesting experiences at that time. Well, as soon as the Zapatistas came into town an ex-Federal general took command of them and established order by noon. By 10 o'clock they had fine order in the city, and everything was just like it was in the days of Diaz. We walked around the streets, and the people were so happy and contented that they made a voluntary offering of quite a large sum of money to pay the Zapatista troops, in place of loot, and for 20 days everything went just lovely in the city.

Then, one morning we woke up and Cos was madder than ever, and he demanded the surrender of the city. Well, just at that time was when the division between Zapata and Villa happened, and the Villista troops withdrew the day before, leaving the Zapatistas, and when the Carrancistas came they had been strengthened by this time by having the United States return Vera Cruz to them, and they came up there and attacked the city. The consulate was in the house of Jenkins, the same place it is now. When Cos first came into the city he did that thing which the Carrancistas have been trying to do ever since—disarm the entire population. He issued a decree saying that anyone found with arms or ammunition in his possession would be shot, and that they would begin a search and seizure of all houses. Well, all of us Americans that were there were more or less armed, and some of them became alarmed, and finally we went to see Gov. Cos and asked him for permission to—we said if we would give up our arms we would never get them back. Let us place them in the American consulate, where they will be safe, and where you know we will not be using them against the revolution, and he consented. For instance, my wife was nervous, and I had a little .22 rifle and a beautiful Marlin shotgun repeater, and she asked me to take those over there.

I took them over, but I kept my revolvers; and different Americans in the city took their guns—one or two of the men had collections of those antique fowling pieces and old blunderbusses of ancient times and they took them over there, and some had high-power rifles, and a good many of them took them over there and left them in the consulate, and they were put away in one of the rooms. When the Zapatistas were driven out and the Carrancistas came back in, the fighting took place around the corner upon which Jenkins's factory is located, and they were shooting around both sides. The Carrancistas were trapped there in front of the factory, and 27 were killed by the Zapatistas, who then retired. Well, when the Zapatistas had retired the Carrancistas came in and accused the factory hands, and especially Mr. Jenkins, of firing on them. They said he had a rapid-fire gun upon the roof. And so they seized him because the general had said that any snipers would be executed immediately without further orders. They carried him across into a vacant lot and stood him up in front of a wall and were about to shoot him when one of the officers told the soldiers that they should not do it because he was the American consul. So they carried him off to the Palace of Justice, and there he was confined all afternoon.

In the afternoon he was taken out by a squad of soldiers, taken downstairs and stood up before a stone pillar in the patio, and they had their guns pointed at him, when a general sent by Gen. Cos to liberate him, came in and stopped the execution, or he would have been executed right there. As it was they kicked him and spat on him and pounded him with the butt ends of their guns and took him back up into the cell, but he was released presently at the instance of the German, French, English, and Spanish consuls, who went to see Gen. Cos and insisted that he be released; and they telephoned over to me, and as soon as I heard that I went right over there, or just as soon the fighting stopped at noon, I went right over there and took Mr. Jenkins's daughters over to my house; then I went back to stay with Mrs. Jenkins, because I was a very intimate friend, and while I was there, just after I had returned the second time, a squad of soldiers knocked at the door. I went out and said, "What do you want?" They said, "We come to search this place." They had already been about five searching parties in there, and they had gone right into the consulate and carried off all of these arms and ammunition that were there, these old blunderbusses and old revolvers, these old-fashioned guns that have a flintlock on them, and everything of that kind—carried off every single thing.

Then this squad came. They said they came to find the consul, and grabbed hold of me, but I persuaded them I was not the consul; so they said they came to search. I said, "Well, where is your search warrant?" They said, "This is our warrant," and they tapped their guns and pointed them at me. So I said all right, I couldn't keep them out; and a fellow says, "Now, show me where the rapid-fire gun is. We want that rapid-fire gun." "Well," I said, "there is no rapid-fire gun here." I said, "If you can find a rapid-fire gun, I will give you 1,000,000 rounds of ammunition, if you can find a rapid-fire gun in this place anywhere." Then they grabbed hold of me, one on each side, and said, "Give us the ammunition." "Well," I said, "you find the gun and I will give you the ammunition," or, I says, "If you will find one round of ammunition for a rapid-fire gun on this place"—and it was a great big factory—"I will find the gun for you." "Well, find the gun." And they threatened me in every way. "Well," I said, "but there is

TESTIMONY OF MR. HENRY W. KELLER.

(Sworn by the secretary.)

The SECRETARY. Your full name, please?

Mr. KELLER. Henry W. Keller.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. KELLER. In the city of Los Angeles.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. KELLER. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what State are you a native?

Mr. KELLER. Of California.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. KELLER. I am a land owner, farmer, and real estate man.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you at any time been interested or engaged in business in the Republic of Mexico or any portion of it?

Mr. KELLER. I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was the place of your business there and in what did your interest consist?

Mr. KELLER. In the northern district of Lower California.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you become interested there?

Mr. KELLER. In 1911.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the nature of your interest?

Mr. KELLER. We formed a corporation under the laws of the State of California, protocolized the articles of incorporation in the Mexican courts at Ensenada, which permitted us, under the Mexican laws then existing, to transact business in Mexico, own lands, and, in fact, entitled us to all of the privileges of Mexican citizens excepting the right of franchise.

The CHAIRMAN. How far were your holdings from the international border?

Mr. KELLER. We have one strip of land, containing a thousand hectares, which adjoins the American boundary line, with the exception only of some 60 or 70 yards which, under the laws of Mexico, is reserved unto the Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the capital stock of your company, paid in?

Mr. KELLER. $80,000, originally, and it has since been increased to $116,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was that stock held—by whom? I don't mean the individual names.

Mr. KELLER. No; but it was held mostly by prominent people here in Los Angeles. The property acquired was acquired because of its agricultural value and also for recreation purposes. There are some 29 stockholders in the company.

The CHAIRMAN. And are you in possession of that property now, or is your company?

Mr. KELLER. We are in uncertain possession of it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the character of your possession?

Mr. KELLER. We have employees on the various properties, and caretakers there, but as early as 1916 Gov. Cantu, at that time de facto governor of the northern district of lower California, issued a proclamation which was known as the "hacienda remuenda," which provided for the establishment of military colonies on Government and vacant lands. Of course, so far as Government lands were concerned, they had a right to enter upon them, but the protocol itself provided that upon entering upon vacant lands privately owned an arrangement should be made with the owners, and a contract of lease drawn up by the judge residing in that particular district where the property was situate. In our case they failed to carry out that latter provision, and as soon as we were notified that a military colony had been established on one of our properties, first, we immediately sent our attorney to call upon Gov. Cantu and ask him why he located upon our lands, and he said if he was upon our lands it was through error. But within a few months he moved his colony from the edge of the ranch to the very center of it and proceeded to till the land, erect farm buildings and fences, etc.; and that condition has continued up to a short time ago, the difference now being only that after inviting settlers, squatters on the property, Gov. Cantu finally informed the American consul, Mr. Boyle at Mexicali, that he had no further claim to the property; that he had turned it over to the department of fomento of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, the department of fomento of the Carranza or central government of Mexico?

Mr. KELLER. Yes. It corresponds to our Department of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. Then he recognizes the jurisdiction of the Mexican Government in some respects in lower California?

Mr. KELLER. Well, I think he was pressed by the Department of State to give a valid reason for his occupation of the lands, and I think the situation was becoming embarrassing to him, and that he turned the burden over to the department of fomento.

The CHAIRMAN. He was pressed by the Department of State of the United States, you mean?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir; or by our consul at Mexicali, Mr. Boyle.

The CHAIRMAN. Then your company had, of its own motion, made a protest to our Government, had it?

Mr. KELLER. The procedure was this: In 1916, as soon as we found that Gov. Cantu's occupation was not temporary but permanent, we addressed a protest to him, and copies of all of these protests are on file in the Department of State at Washington, and Gov. Cantu replied that if we felt ourselves aggrieved the courts were open to us and we had but to present our claims there; that the procedure was simple. But for the information of this committee I want to say that the law of Mexico provides that courts and judges of courts shall be appointed by the Congress of Mexico and not by the Governors of the respective States, and those courts were subsequently declared illegal, and to-day there are legal courts in the northern district of lower California which have been appointed by the Federal Congress at Mexico City.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, those courts are now legal, having been provided for by the congress because of the status of lower California. That is, it is a Territory and not a State?

Mr. KELLER. Exactly. We did not wish to avail ourselves of the Mexican courts because we knew that they were illegal and that any judgment they might render, whether for or against us, would be declared invalid subsequently when the legal courts were established. We then had an opportunity of having our protest carried to Mexico

City by a gentleman and a friend of ours who was going to Mexico City on business, and our protest to President Carranza was presented to him in person, and he deprecated the actions of Mr. Cantu, but no action was taken by him, and the correspondence which I have here shows that subsequently he declared that the lands were public lands and that we had no title to them.

The CHAIRMAN. Carranza?

Mr. KELLER. Carranza; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How did he make that declaration?

Mr. KELLER. The declaration was made through our chargé d'affaires, in—

The CHAIRMAN. He simply wrote a letter?

Mr. KELLER. He simply wrote a letter to our chargé d'affaires, Mr. Summerlin, in Mexico City, and Mr. Summerlin transmitted that to Mr. Lansing and Mr. Lansing in turn sent us a copy, which I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I should have worded my question a little differently. His declaration, then, was simply by a letter?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And not by any proceedings of any kind to ascertain whether the land was then public or private?

Mr. KELLER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Gov. Cantu was himself addressed upon the subject by the State Department through our consul?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir. Through a personal interview, and then, after making the protests to Mr. Cantu and Mr. Carranza, and receiving no relief, we protested to the State Department, to Mr. Lansing, under date of December, 1918. We waited until the conclusion of the war before bothering our State Department with our affairs. Then Mr. Lansing instructed us to place before the American consul, Mr. Boyle, all of our titles, organization papers, and everything pertaining to the company, and after such examination was made by Mr. Boyle, the State Department, as evidence by the letters I have here, reported that our contentions were fully sustained, both as to the title and as to the steps that we had taken with reference to the occupation of our lands.

The CHAIRMAN. And our State Department, from the evidence presented by you, held that your title to the lands was good?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cantu "passed the buck" to Carranza?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir; exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Carranza wrote a letter in which he said that the lands were public lands, as I understand.

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And in the meantime you have not had possession of the lands restored to you?

Mr. KELLER. No, sir. Our correspondence with the State Department has run over a period of about two years now, and we are no further along than when we started. After the State Department had satisfied themselves that our claims were just and that our titles were perfect, since Carranza declared that our titles were not good, the State Department is now examining our chain of titles again, so we are starting from where we first started some two years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you the date of the letter from the State Department of the United States with reference to your titles?

Mr. KELLER (producing copy). The date of that letter was April 26, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any identifying mark or number upon the letter?

Mr. KELLER. The identifying mark is "S0312.115SA516-6."

The CHAIRMAN. You have no objection to this committee obtaining a copy of that letter from the State Department?

Mr. KELLER. No, sir; not at all. The substance of that letter is:

In reply you are informed that the department has recently received from the American consul at Mexicali a report from which it appears that the allegations heretofore made by your company as to the occupancy of a portion of your lands by Cantu are correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Any of this correspondence touching this matter which is in the archives of the State Department, as I understand you, the committee is at liberty to obtain from the department?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir; or anything else.

The CHAIRMAN. I ask this question because the committee might desire to obtain the correspondence upon its return to Washington, and it being in reference to a private matter we want to show the department that we have the consent of the parties interested.

Mr. KELLER. You have that consent, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it will not be necessary to embody in our record of these proceedings the copies of this correspondence, as we can get the copies at Washington.

What have been the damages which your company has sustained, approximately, with reference to this property?

Mr. KELLER. We have never set up any claim, Senator, or filed any claim with our Government, because our injuries have not been very great. During the occupancy of the military colony, so called, we had offers of as high as $10,000 for the pasturage on the property, which we were unable to accept because of the occupancy of the Cantu forces, and the number of settlers which had settled on the ranch at the invitation of Gov. Cantu.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of these settlers yet remain upon the property, do they?

Mr. KELLER. They do. The last information we have on the subject is that the Department of Fomento has finally received orders, or at least the local representatives in Tia Juana has received orders, to confiscate all of our properties.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I was leading up to.

Mr. KELLER. Yes. And we are also reliably informed that it is their intention to put a surveyor at work on the property at once and parcel it out and distribute it among—

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand, Mr. Carranza has declared that it is public land?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And now he is proceeding against it, or authorizing procedure against it, under the section of the constitution of 1917 with reference to the boundary?

Mr. KELLER. Well, that claim would not lie, because an examination of our chain of titles will show that in each instance our predecessors in interest obtained permission from the Mexican Central Government to acquire these lands within this prohibited zone, so called.

The CHAIRMAN. Then upon what ground is the proceedings to confiscate based, if not upon that clause of the constitution?

Mr. KELLER. I think under section 27 of the constitution of May, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is what I refer to.

Mr. KELLER. Yes. But the constitution of May, 1917, article 27 provides that lands which were acquired from the Government by concession, or through Government contracts, and lands acquired up to 1876, can be, by order of the President abrogated. But our lands do not fall under that category. The San Isidro ranch, for instance, was set aside through the Locas brothers in 1833, and the Governor of California confirmed the title in 1840, and Benito Juarez issued a patent in 1861. So that they were never Government lands, never concessions, nor contracts with the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Keller, have you received any revenue from this property at all?

Mr. KELLER. No, sir. That is, the revenue that we have received has been very nominal. We have every year planted a certain amount of grain for the horses we had on the property, but about a year ago Mr. Cantu took our field away and cultivated it himself, so that we have not been able to do anything, and are afraid to do anything.

The CHAIRMAN. You could have derived, however, revenue, you say, to the amount of $10,000 per annum for the grazing privileges?

Mr. KELLER. We had that offer, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you had cultivated fields from which you had expected to derive revenue?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir; and we had many offers from the local people there, and especially from the Russian colony, to rent these lands on shares at various times, and none of those offers were we permitted to avail ourselves of.

The CHAIRMAN. Then if you eventually secure possession of your lands, and are enabled to handle the same, the only damage which will have been incurred would be the deprivation of the use of the lands and the revenue therefrom for the time they have been withheld from you?

Mr. KELLER. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. And up to the present time what is that—the length of time?

Mr. KELLER. They have occupied our land since 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have not, as yet, filed any claim with the State Department of the United States?

Mr. KELLER. I have not; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It would appear to the chairman of the committee that you might seriously consider the question of filing a claim at an early date fixing your damages at such amount as you can reasonably establish them to be; because if the matter is to be taken up diplomatically with reference to the titles, the growing annual damages might have some influence in the matter of the claim. I can say to you, however, that this Government is not at present presenting claims for damages to the Mexican claims commission, and has advised American citizens not to present their claims to the claims commission, but is filing the claims away in the archives at Washington for future action.

Now, is there any further statement that you desire to make? If so, you may continue.

Mr. KELLER. I would like, Senator Fall, to read one letter which sets forth the procedure of the Mexican Government and their claims as presented by their Mr. Medina to our chargé d'affaires, Mr. Summerlin, in Mexico City, and after I had received a copy of Mr. Medina's letter, or a translation of it, we wrote the department, and I ask to read this letter because it sets forth our position with reference to the whole matter that I have testified to this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you prefer to read it, or shall we have it embodied in the record?

Mr. KELLER. It may be embodied in the record. I don't want to take up the time of the committee in reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. I presume it is along the line of the statement you have made here?

Mr. KELLER. Yes. Some of the fallacies of the contention of the Mexican Government with reference to our lands being national or vacant lands.

(The letter above referred to is as follows:)

DECEMBER 30, 1919.

HON. ALVEY A. ADEE,
Second Assistant Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: We are in receipt of your communication of December 18, advising us that our letter of November 26, 1919, had been forwarded to our consul at Mexico for his comment.

We are also in receipt of your communication of December 17, in which is inclosed copy of letter of George T. Summerlin, chargé d'affaires, transmitting copy of a communication of H. Medina, subsecretary of state of foreign affairs and addressed to George T. Summerlin. It is to the allegations and misstatements and omissions of Mr. Medina, the Mexican subsecretary, that we particularly wish to address ourselves.

Mr. Medina says that "the competent authorities report that the San Ysidro Ranch Co. asked the Department of Agriculture and Fomento to confirm the validity of various titles covering portions of lands acquired by said company, named 'El Moro,' 'El Refugio,' 'Poso del Encino' Land and House in the Carrizo Ranch and the Frontier Strip, and the matter being submitted to the President of the Republic, this high official saw fit to decide that the petition should not be granted, in view of the fact that the titles presented for confirmation thereof have all the defects of capacity, form, and essence necessary to legitimize the acquisition of public property and especially waste lands, and therefore are not proper for the purpose."

This company never asked the Mexican Government or any of its departments to confirm the validity of our titles. We knew before we purchased and paid for these lands the condition of the titles of the various ranchos. Competent attorneys had passed upon them for us and when our deeds were protocolized the Mexican courts, in conformity with Mexican legal procedure, admitted the validity of our titles and placed us in possession.

About a year ago the Department of Fomento appointed a commission to examine into the title of lands privately held in Lower California, and this company, in common with other land holders, was ordered to submit its titles, with which order we complied. We were also advised by a member of this Mexican commission that our titles were found to be perfect, and the commission so reported to the Department of Agriculture.

We particularly wish to call your attention to the omission from the list of properties enumerated by Mr. Medina and owned by this company, of the San Ysidro Rancho, from which property this company derived its name. This is our largest individual holding and has been in our possession and that of our predecessors in interest for almost a century. The grant or patent having been signed by Benito Juarez, Mexico's first President.

You will observe, Mr. Secretary, from our previous communications, that our chief cause of complaint was that the San Ysidro had been taken from us and was occupied, farmed, and pastured by a Mexican military colony. We have never been dispossessed of the properties mentioned by Mr. Medina, and we never knew until this moment that the Mexican Government claimed these other properties adversely to us. It is certain that all these lands, including the San Ysidro Rancho, are assessed to us, and the Central Mexican Government and the local government of Lower California collect and receipt for taxes which we annually pay. In short, the only property of which we have been actually dispossessed is the very property which the Mexican Government, by indirection at least, admits the validity of our title.

We purchased all these properties with American gold, our articles of incorporation were accepted and filed in the Mexican courts of proper jurisdiction, the purchases were made with the knowledge and consent of the Mexican Government, and it was legal under Mexican laws for us to acquire and hold these lands at the time they were purchased. The constitution of May, 1917, with its retroactive Article XXVII, had not its birth when these purchases were made originally in 1910.

What jurisdiction and under what law, unless it be by virtue of Article XXVII of the constitution of May, 1917, had the department of agriculture to pass upon the validity of title of lands privately owned?

Mr. Medina says that the President of the Republic decided that our titles could not be confirmed because of "defects of capacity"—whatever that may mean—and for the further and more important reason that these lands were public property and especially waste lands. From the foregoing recital you can judge whether they fall under either of these categories.

Prior to the time we appealed to your department for assistance and restitution of our properties, we had protested to the governor of Lower California, and our protest being ignored, we protested to the Mexican Central Government, and our representative presented our protest to President Carranza in private audience. This "high official" gravely read the accusations levelled at the governor of Lower California, and informed our representative that he deprecated the acts of Gov. Cantu, but nothing was done by the Central Government to restore the property to its rightful owners. Yet, within a few months, and after condemning the actions of Gov. Cantu, he decides that our titles are invalid and annexes them to public domain.

We are treated to the spectacle of the Mexican President assuming judicial powers, and passing upon the titles of lands in Lower California, over which territory his temporal control is uncertain, and which acknowledges his authority only when it best serves their purpose.

The question herein involved is not one of title. We know that our titles are valid, and if they were imperfect we would not be found enlisting the services of the United States Government to remedy the defects. Your records show thousands of cases similar to ours, wherein the Mexican Central Government, or its agents, by force or by fraud, have despoiled citizens of this Republic of their lawful possessions.

In conformity with the orders of your department, we submitted our titles and evidence of ownership to the American Consul, Mr. Walter F. Boyle, and your department has graciously advised us that Mr. Boyle has confirmed our contentions.

If there be anything further that this company can do to assist your honorable department in this matter, you have but to command us.

Respectfully yours,

PRESIDENT.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other witnesses this morning who desire to be heard by the committee at this particular time?

Due to the facts stated in opening the hearing, and to the further fact that the committee has a lot of private investigation which it is carrying on, there will be no further meeting until to-morrow morning at half past 10 o'clock at this room. In the meantime, any persons who desire to testify are requested to give their names to the secretary of the committee at the Van Nuys Hotel, which is the headquarters of the committee and they can there find one member of the committee at any time with whom they may have the opportunity of consulting before giving testimony.

The committee will be in recess until half past 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

(A recess was then taken until Friday, March 19, 1920, at 10.30 a. m.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

FRIDAY, MARCH 19, 1920.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Los Angeles, Calif.

The committee met pursuant to adjournment in room D, Chamber of Commerce, Los Angeles, Calif., Friday, March 19, 1920, 10.30 a. m.
Present: Senator Albert B. Fall, chairman; Senator Mark A. Smith; Maj. Dan M. Jackson, secretary.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ARTHUR THOMSON.

(Witness sworn by the secretary.)

The SECRETARY. Your name is Arthur Thomson?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Thomson?

Mr. THOMSON. Los Angeles at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. THOMSON. No, sir. I have my first papers, but I am not a citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you secure your first papers?

Mr. THOMSON. In San Francisco.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what country are you a native?

Mr. THOMSON. Australia.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is informed that you desire to make a statement, Mr. Thomson, and permission is granted you so that you may go ahead with any statement you desire to make.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I am not experienced at this; I thought you would like to ask a few questions first of all so that I can get started on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, sir, I have asked the only question I have to ask at the present time. You can make a statement and then you may be interrogated and will have an opportunity to answer specific questions.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, it was mainly about this booklet, "The Conspiracy Against Mexico," that I wrote some time ago, that there was some fuss made about in the press and in the Senate and other places. I was accused of being an anarchist by some press representatives. I don't know whether they got it from Senator Fall or not, but that was the impression they led me to believe. And the book, that was also charged as being Bolshevik propaganda. There were a couple of paragraphs in that that may have led people to believe that it was, and perhaps you could interpret it, in a strict sense, as being Bolshevik propaganda, but it was not intended as Bolshevik propaganda. That was just merely incidental. The whole booklet was about Mexico, and what I was writing against was intervention by the United States. I wanted to try and show that there was a conspiracy against Mexico by certain interests that had economic interests in Mexico to bring about intervention, and that was the reason I wrote the booklet. It was written entirely on my own initiative. The Mexican consulates and embassy in Washington had been accused of distributing Bolshevik propaganda. Well, they distributed 5,000 copies of the book, which I sold them at cost, about 5 cents each, which was just the cost of printing alone. I lost on the whole proposition. And I published it, due to a little misunderstanding with the original publishers, so I lost about eight or nine hundred dollars on the whole work, and while of course I believe I had radical ideas, people thought that the Mexicans had held the same ideas, and I don't know what Mexicans believed on it. I sold the booklet to them—I went to them and asked them if they didn't want to distribute some of these, and they considered the matter and said they would, and they took those 5,000 copies that I gave them. I have since sold about 2,000 here to some more Mexicans in Los Angeles, but I haven't gotten any money for them yet. That was about three weeks ago. That does not exactly square with the statement made in the Los Angeles Examiner here about two days ago, I think it was, where it was said there was a slush fund of $8,000,000 in Los Angeles, to paint rosy pictures of Mexico.

Now, I don't think there is any slush fund of any kind here, for several reasons, because I haven't got paid for those booklets of mine, and if there was money here I surely would have been paid for those; and then the Mexicans—they call it the Independencia Club, a local organization of Mexicans, got out a manifesto or bulletin here about a month ago, and I understand the printer has not been paid for it yet. So that doesn't exactly square with the slush fund. And then, also, I am told that the Mexican consular officers are about the lowest paid of any consular officers in the world. Their pay ranges from $90 to $240 a month, the way I am told about it.

There may be a few other things I would like to say that would be brought out by questions. I can't think of very much right now; I didn't prepare that way. I thought probably you would start off by questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the committee issued an open invitation to anyone who knew anything about Mexico to appear before it. When the committee serves a subpoena on a witness or requests the presence of a witness we usually know what the line of examination will be, and what we expect to establish by the witness; but in your case you requested of the committee an opportunity to be heard, and it is granted, cheerfully and gratefully, but we were not prepared to proceed any further than to allow you to make any statement that you pleased, irrespective of whether it might be in the nature of criticism of the committee, or the personnel of the committee, or the work of the committee, or of what nature the statement might be. We will ask you some questions, however.

Mr. THOMSON. No; I had no criticism, especially, to make of the committee. I wanted to clear up a little misunderstanding about that booklet, mainly, that had been sent around through the press all through the country.

The CHAIRMAN. You have referred to some newspaper report that you had been called an anarchist on account of the book which you published and to which you have been testifying. Have you seen a published or printed copy of the investigation of this committee of Mexican affairs containing a partial and ad interim report of the committee?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir; I have that right here.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you have there exactly what the chairman of the committee had to say.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I am not saying you said it, but the press representatives said it. The San Francisco Chronicle published it, and I went up to the editor and asked to be allowed to contradict it, and he didn't give me much satisfaction.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the committee is very glad to afford you the opportunity to make any statement of that kind that you want to make publicly.

Mr. THOMSON. Of course, it is kind of a serious statement, or it was at that time, to call a man an anarchist. They were raiding, and all that sort of thing, and I was liable to be picked up with the rest of them, and I have done nothing to warrant being called an anarchist. I am not an anarchist. I believe in government.

The CHAIRMAN. Your purpose in writing that booklet, which is in the hands of the committee, as I understand you, was to prevent armed intervention by this country in Mexican affairs.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir. That is it exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. You had nothing in view with reference to interference by Mexico in the affairs of this country?

Mr. THOMSON. No—I didn't quite get that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, have you ever thought of what Mexico may have done or may be doing or what Mexicans may have done or may be doing at this time, with reference to interference in the affairs of the United States?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I knew nothing about it at that time. There may be something like that. I don't know. I am not saying there is or there is not. I have no knowledge of it, except what the press says, and it is not very convincing so far, to me, that there is anything like that.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you arrive at your convictions that there was in the minds of the American people or any of them an effort to cause this country unwarrantedly to interfere, by arms or otherwise, in the affairs of Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I thought the moneyed interests of this country wanted intervention—those that were interested in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. What method, if any, did you pursue to convince yourself of the truth or falsity of that idea?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I read—I got those ideas from the press, from writers that had been to Mexico, that investigated it, such as this man DeBekker that you had up before you at Washington. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you know we did. You have read his evidence?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you know that he was writing for the New York Call, do you not?

Mr. THOMSON. Is that so? I didn't know that. I think he wrote something for the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; he wrote something for the Nation, too. Now, you obtained from the press and from the writings of such men as DeBekker the impression that moneyed interests in the United States were seeking to bring about armed intervention in Mexico by this country?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. From various sources. There may be a few others that I can't recall just now. But that is the way I got it; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you have mentioned the name of DeBekker. From what other source did you obtain this idea?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, it seemed to me there was a kind of insidious propaganda carried on by the press in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what do you have reference to?

Senator SMITH. What press?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, the Hearst press for one. It is true they haven't done any propaganda within the last couple of months. They have been pretty square, it seems to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, prior to that time, as a writer, have you retained any clippings from the press or any articles from the Hearst press?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I have a few here. I don't know that I have any from the Hearst press. I haven't paid a great deal of attention to the Hearst press. Now, there was a statement made in the Los Angeles Times a few days ago, a special dispatch from Chicago, where Prof. Starr—I suppose you know of him—here it is [producing paper].

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know him?

Mr. THOMSON. No, sir. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I don't, either; so we break even on that.

Mr. THOMSON. I said "of him."

The CHAIRMAN. I know of him through this very article that you refer to.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, he wrote it. I saw it up in the Los Angeles Library the other day. He has written several. I understand; but he is supposed to be a great authority on Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, by the learned people. They seem to think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what learned people?

Mr. THOMSON. The university people.

The CHAIRMAN. Mention any one.

Mr. THOMSON. This came out of the Chicago University. I suppose they do. It says: "War with Mexico was planned and fixed up at the peace conference in Paris. Of this I am positive." That is a pretty serious statement for the Los Angeles Times to print. That is a special dispatch. And Prof. Starr was over there, I understand, and he was in with all those men.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how do you understand that he was over there?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, that is what I am led to believe. I am told that.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, who told you?

Mr. THOMSON. The press.

The CHAIRMAN. That article there?

Mr. THOMSON. No; this article doesn't say that.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you see any other article?

Mr. THOMSON. I saw it some time ago. It was reported in the—the Associated Press, I believe, sent it out. I haven't got a copy of it.

The CHAIRMAN. That Prof. Starr was over there at the peace table in what capacity?

Mr. THOMSON. Over in Paris.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you read any of the testimony adduced before the Foreign Relations Committee with reference to what went on at the peace conference?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; a little of it. I haven't studied it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you read Secretary Lansing's statement?

Mr. THOMSON. I believe I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember whether the question was asked him as to whether Mexico was considered at all, in any way, shape, form, or fashion whatsoever, at the peace table?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I think he said it was not considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir. Do you remember whether he was asked if he had a talk with any Mexicans there, with De La Barra or any others?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. I think he replied in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. He was the Secretary of State and one of the Mexican commissioners.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you doubtless had your attention called to the fact that in the invitation extended to other countries to join the League of Nations no such invitation was extended to Mexico; have you not?

Mr. THOMSON. I believe I saw that, too.

The CHAIRMAN. And you take a newspapers statement as to what went on around the peace table or at the peace conference against the sworn testimony of the Secretary of State of the United States?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, Prof. Starr is a professor, and he ought to know—

The CHAIRMAN. Now what is he a professor of?

Mr. THOMSON. It says here, anthropology.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the study of man, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, that is all you know, Mr. Thomson, about Prof. Starr, is it not? Just from what you see there?

Mr. THOMSON. That is all on that matter; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And still you say that is one of the matters that have fixed in your mind the idea that Americans want armed intervention—that American special interests want armed intervention—in Mexico; that it was fixed up at the peace table; and you take that, and then admit that you read the evidence under oath of the Secretary of State of the United States, that Mexico was not even discussed at the peace table, nor in Paris, to his knowledge?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. But I am not saying that that actually took place, but I am just quoting that.

The CHAIRMAN. But you quote that approvingly.

Mr. THOMSON. No; I am not saying that that proves it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, then, what does prove it to your satisfaction?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, the press propaganda seems to me to prove it.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what propaganda do you refer to? That is exactly what we were asking you, and you have referred to this very article. You have referred also to an article published in the Times two or three days ago.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what is that article that led you to believe that?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, this is the article I refer to particularly.

The CHAIRMAN. A reproduction of the Starr article?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. But there has been, it seems to me, an insidious propaganda, if no other propaganda, carried on by the press ever since the signing of the armistice.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, let's get down to facts. That is what we are here for. What do you refer to? Where and when?

Mr. THOMSON. All the propaganda carried on by the Hearst press for one.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you have accused the Hearst press—I am not an advocate for the Hearst press, but let us have anything you may have there showing that.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, there has been so much of it that I haven't clipped it. I will admit, though, that for the last couple of months the Hearst press has been very square, both on Mexico and Europe, and particularly about Russia.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let us start back a little bit at the beginning, then possibly we may lead up to something of value. Do you speak Spanish?

Mr. THOMSON. No, sir; very little. Just a few phrases.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been in this country?

Mr. THOMSON. About 10 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Where have you lived?

Mr. THOMSON. In the East, and in the Middle West, and in the Northwest, and in the South.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you come south.

Mr. THOMSON. In about 1912, I think it was.

The CHAIRMAN. Where have you lived?

Mr. THOMSON. I have lived mostly around Los Angeles and southern California.

The CHAIRMAN. What has been your business?

Mr. THOMSON. Electrical engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. Where have you been engaged in your profession?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I have been engaged in it in different parts of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean here. We are now speaking of your residence along the border. My object is to show what you know about Mexico and where you got your knowledge of it. That is, frankly, the object of the question.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I worked here for the different electrical companies here, and I worked for an electrical company in San Francisco during the war. They were operating one of the largest power stations there. I worked through the East. I attended Northwestern University for about a year or more, and I worked on the side there to pay my way through.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I have explained frankly the object of this line of questioning. I want to see how you considered yourself qualified to write a book on Mexico.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, it has been secondhand knowledge about the conditions, I will admit.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, it has been secondhand knowledge of the conditions. What has been your reading about Mexico? What books have you read?

Mr. THOMSON. I have read "The Mexican People," by de Lara, and—

The CHAIRMAN. That is Gutierrez de Lara?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew he was executed by Gen. Calles, did you not?

Mr. THOMSON. I knew that.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew Gen. Calles was a socialist, one of the original revolutionists in Mexico who established this government?

Mr. THOMSON. I didn't know he was a socialist.

The CHAIRMAN. I think he is now a member of the Carranza Cabinet. You knew that, didn't you?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; but I didn't know he was a socialist.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; we will drop that. You know he is a member of the present cabinet of Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you were writing in advocacy of the Mexican form of government, as I understand, and no interference with it here, based upon the stories of Gutierrez de Lara, and you knew he had been executed by this present Mexican Government?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I didn't uphold that. It is reported that he has; it has not been proven that he was executed; at least, I didn't see any proof of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know anything of Mr. De Lara?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. I knew him here in Los Angeles.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, you knew him here?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew he was a socialist, didn't you?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I knew that.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew that he was with Francisco I. Madero, jr., at the battle of Casas Grandes, did you not?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I understand he was a captain under Madero.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what part he played in that battle?

Mr. THOMSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know that he ran off and left Madero to be attacked in the rear by Col. Telles when those men were doing the fighting for Madero, because Gutierrez de Lara left? You didn't know that?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I didn't know that.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know that Mr. Gutierrez de Lara, a captain there to fight for the holy cause of the revolution, explained to Mr. Madero when he was questioned as to why he allowed the Telles forces in the rear that he could not kill a fellow man, that he could not pluck a flower?

Mr. THOMSON. I didn't know that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if those happen to be the facts they would have been interesting for you to know before relying on Gutierrez de Lara as a correct historian?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I just took what he wrote. I don't say that I upheld all the personal views of Mr. De Lara, but just what he wrote is what I went by. I have quoted many books in there, but I don't agree, probably, with all they say. I read John Kenneth Turner's Barbarous Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; written in collaboration with Gutierrez de Lara?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; he went through Mexico with Gutierrez de Lara.

The CHAIRMAN. Gutierrez de Lara—this same man?

Mr. THOMSON. But John Kenneth Turner's book has been upheld by other writers; at least a lot of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, by whom?

Mr. THOMSON. By Arnold and Frost, for two.

The CHAIRMAN. Who are they?

Mr. THOMSON. They are two Englishmen that went through Yucatan. And it has also been upheld by a correspondent of the London Times, Henry Baerlin, in Mexico, the Land of Unrest, I believe it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The object of my questions, Mr. Thomson, bear in mind, is to display your knowledge of Mexico.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not criticizing Mr. Turner, Mr. De Lara, or anyone else. That is not the purpose of this committee. But I am simply trying to draw out from you upon what you based your information.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I understand that perfectly.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever read a history of Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I have read Bancroft's history.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you learn as to the history of Mexico, as to revolutionary troubles, and so forth, and disturbances, and internal and foreign conflicts prior to the year 1877?

Mr. THOMSON. What books I went by?

The CHAIRMAN. You said you read Bancroft's History of Mexico. I said, from such reading, from Bancroft's history, or any other authority, what do you know about Mexican conditions prior to the year 1877?

Mr. THOMSON. That was prior to when Diaz—

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I put the year as 1877, a year or more prior to the recognition of Gen. Porfirio Diaz as President of Mexico by the United States of America.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, Juarez was in power then, and I understand Mexico was—

The CHAIRMAN. Juarez was in power when?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, some time between 1867 and 1876, when the agrarian democracy held Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the agrarian democracy that you refer to?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, that was when Mexico had a sort of democratic rule of the land.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that prior to the time of Juarez or subsequent?

Mr. THOMSON. No; during the time of Juarez. From 1867 to 1876.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, from what source did you learn that?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I gathered it from reading various books.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what books?

Mr. THOMSON. Bancroft's and that book of De Lara's on "Mexican People," and from Gustavo Paz—his book on Juarez. I don't recall any others.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the form that this agrarian democracy took in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, they established the constitution of 1857. That was their basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The advocacy of the constitution of 1857 is not what you were writing about in this pamphlet, is it?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I just spoke of that incidentally.

The CHAIRMAN. But De Lara and the others do not quote it approvingly, do they—the constitution of 1857 and the reform laws?

Mr. THOMSON. Quote it to prove which?

The CHAIRMAN. Do any of the writers you have been taking your information from, De Lara, Kenneth Turner, Paz, or anyone else, approve the constitution of 1857?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; De Lara does.

The CHAIRMAN. He does?

Mr. THOMSON. I think he does. I am pretty sure he does.

The CHAIRMAN. And would you be able, do you think, to recall where he approves it in his writing?

Mr. THOMSON. Through the chapter on the constitution of 1857 in his book.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is what he calls the agrarian government of Juarez?

Mr. THOMSON. I presume that is what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, do you know anything about what the constitution of 1857 provided?

Mr. THOMSON. It was quite a radical constitution. It hit property pretty hard, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. What property?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, the property of the large landowners and the Catholic Church.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there anything in the book or in the constitution with reference to the property of large landowners?

Mr. THOMSON. I think there was.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Thomson, I advise you to read something about it, and to read the constitution itself.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I have read the constitution itself, only off-handedly I can't recall those things. I think I have got a copy of it somewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, then if you have read it, possibly I can refresh your recollection. The constitution and the reform laws passed under the constitution provide for the confiscation of all of the real estate of the Catholic Church of Mexico.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. That was done. The constitution and the reform laws also provided for taking from the States and municipalities the public lands, did it not?

Mr. THOMSON. You mean the communal grants, what they call the "ejidos"? Is that what you refer to?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I am afraid we can not get anywhere unless either you or I are better informed as to what "ejidos" mean.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I don't understand your question, then.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what a municipality is in Mexico to-day?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I suppose it is similar to other municipalities.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what? How?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, they have a city government, I presume. It may not be exactly the same as American city governments. They have what they call—how do you pronounce that word—jefe politico.

The CHAIRMAN. A jefe politico of a municipality?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; you see I was not writing about those things: I was writing about the social and economic relations.

The CHAIRMAN. No; but you were writing about the reform laws, too. You were talking about the reform laws and about what was done by the Juarez government with reference to the lands, and how this was an agrarian government, as you call it.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, was that changed by Diaz in any way, shape, form, or fashion, or by the Congress during the Diaz administration?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't think the constitution of 1857 was lived up to by Diaz.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, was the practice inaugurated by Juarez under this agrarian rule that you speak of with reference to the lands of Mexico changed in any way by the laws or acts under the Diaz administration?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. Diaz, as I have it, confiscated or evicted something like 2,000,000 small farmers from their land and gave it over to the large landowners.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you get that?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I have seen quite a number of writers—those books I quoted before nearly all refer to that in one form or another.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know where they obtained their information?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I don't know where they got it. I suppose from records and observation.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Thomson, it is certainly no part of the duty of any member of this committee to correct errors that you may entertain with reference to Mexico.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, if I have got any wrong views, I am quite willing to be shown. I want to tell the truth. I am not trying to take any stand with reference to any part of the Mexican Government or anyone else; I am just trying to tell the right thing to prevent a war with Mexico. My motives are purely humanitarian. I have no other reason for writing that book or doing that work.

The CHAIRMAN. And you thought you were serving the interests of humanity in writing the book?

Mr. THOMSON. That is what I thought.

The CHAIRMAN. Based upon such information as you have intimated to the committee you had received from other sources?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir; that is what I thought.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever understand that under the Diaz government any of the property taken under the reform laws was restored to the Catholic Church?

Mr. THOMSON. Why, I believe Diaz restored a large amount of land to the Catholic Church.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you don't know anything about it. I am compelled to say that because your sources of information are entirely incorrect, and I do not care to go into the history of it; I haven't the time; but I advise you to inform yourself from the proper sources. You can get the information.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, the Catholics themselves—I have read some Catholic statements themselves, written by Catholics themselves, that kind of follows that out.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, of course, we will not be able to get anywhere, because, as I say, it is not the business, nor is it the purpose of the committee to undertake to deliver a lecture on Mexican history and the execution of the laws in Mexico. I may say, shortly, to you that there had been much scandal and oppression in connection with the handling of the lands by municipalities—and “municipality” in Mexico is not what you understand by municipality at all. It is not governed, either, by a jefe politico. A jefe politico is in charge of a certain district, the execution of certain laws in that district. The municipalities have their own local officers, and they do not necessarily, by any means, consist of simply one town, with its boundaries fixed, but also of a subdistrict that may have several towns in it that may have a jefe politico. Now, if you will go into the history of any of the communal grants in Mexico made or confirmed by Benito Juarez you will find they are existing under the same procedure exactly to-day, with the same lines marked out that were marked out by Benito Juarez when those people enabled him to overcome the French, when he was an exile at El Paso, Tex.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I understand that is true, too. But there are certain pretty good reasons for that.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I will be glad to have them.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I blame the United States Government for it.

The CHAIRMAN. For what?

Mr. THOMSON. For a lot of the conditions in Mexico to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. What condition?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, Wilson has protested and threatened whenever the Carranza Government contemplated putting into effect any of the reforms of the revolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Now we are getting down to it. The constitution of 1917 restores the old conditions which you have been saying Gutierrez de Lara and other writers there protested against as having established this agrarian government under the constitution

The CHAIRMAN. Then, how could the United States protest against the law?

Mr. THOMSON. It protested against putting into effect that constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. How putting it into effect? We are getting down to it. I am in hopes you will have a little different idea of things when you leave here. I don't know that you will.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I guess we don't quite understand each other. That is the main trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't think we do, because I think you are looking at it from one standpoint and I from another.

Mr. THOMSON. That is quite likely.

The CHAIRMAN. In the United States the President can not put a constitutional provision into effect; in Mexico he can not, except under a certain provision of the constitution itself. Mr. Carranza has undertaken to do certain things by an edict as of an autocrat or a tyrant. I don't know whether you understand what I mean or not.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I would call a one-man government. He has undertaken to take this constitution and put it into effect by his word of mouth, and in some two or three instances—three at least—the President of the United States, through his State Department, has objected to the method proposed to be used by Mr. Carranza in his construction and enforcement of the constitution, not the courts' construction. They have a supreme court which will construe the constitution, and they have a congress which shall pass laws to put it into effect. The congress has failed to pass any laws to put the constitution into effect, and Mr. Carranza has undertaken to issue certain decrees of his own, under which he has assumed to carry out some of the provisions of the constitution. Now, it is as to his particular individual acts in undertaking to put his own construction upon the constitution that a protest has been made, and not one protest has ever been made, or ever will be made, I can say to you frankly, by the United States Government as to what the Mexican people may care to do with their own property; nothing.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, the way I have it, the reason that Carranza has adopted his attitude is due largely to the unsettled state of affairs in that country.

The CHAIRMAN. He has had a congress in session, just adjourned.

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, the congress has been doing its regular work, I presume.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; it passed a bull-fight law.

Mr. THOMSON. You see, the Mexicans have got a great suspicion of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how do you know?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, most every Mexican that I have ever talked to told me that.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't speak Spanish, do you?

Mr. THOMSON. No; but there is lots of them around here that talk English.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, who are they? Mention them. Let me have the name of one who has a great suspicion of the United States. Let's see who he is.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, there are lots of them that I wouldn't—

The CHAIRMAN. Just let us have the names, please, of any of them.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I don't know that they would want to get implicated in it. You see, the Mexican Government has made some kind of a ruling that Mexicans shan't testify before this committee, so I don't care about implicating anybody in it. But I know them.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, you do?

Mr. THOMSON. I have known quite a number. And most of the writers that come out of Mexico—at least, a lot of them—have said the same thing. David Starr Jordan, for instance, he said that Mexico looked upon the United States as the Colossus of the north; and he is a university chancellor or president, and he ought to be kind of careful what he says.

The CHAIRMAN. And an ordinary writer who seeks to write about Mexico directly, who is not a chancellor, need not be careful at all about what he says?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I have been careful, as far as my knowledge is—as far as the facts that I have had at my disposal.

The CHAIRMAN. I have no doubt of that, sir.

Mr. THOMSON. If I am wrong, I am willing to be shown.

The CHAIRMAN. You are shown by Mexicans, largely fugitives from their own country, who can not live across the line, who have voiced to you their suspicion of the United States. Now, if they are any of those men that I refer to, this order that you speak of—of the Mexican Government—could not affect them.

Mr. THOMSON. Why not? I don't see why not. If they went and testified, whether they are fugitives or—

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Thomson, you are too bright a man to equivocate, as you are attempting to do, and to avoid and evade the questions. I have asked you what Mexicans have expressed to you their suspicion of the United States. You have declined to give the names because you say that an order of the Mexican Government has been made that Mexican citizens should not testify before this committee. If that order applies, it is to Mexican citizens residing in this country.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. You decline to mention them because, you say, the Mexican Government has issued an order with reference to it, and you do not want to disclose their names.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I have met these during the past five or six years. I have lived in this—

The CHAIRMAN. And they are all living outside of their own country. Now, why are those men that you have mentioned living outside of Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. For various reasons, I presume. There are lots of Mexicans, as I understand it, in Los Angeles, some 35,000 Mexicans, and 95,000 in southern California. They can't all be fugitives.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course they are not all fugitives. Do you think a large majority of those people are not fugitives driven out of Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. I think that; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You are now not speaking of the native American Mexican population of Spanish descent in California, are you?

Mr. THOMSON. No; these Mexicans that you see around the streets. The CHAIRMAN. That come from old Mexico over here.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; that is it.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what are they doing here? How did they happen to come out of their country, the majority of them?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, some of them came from the border States seeking work.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what was Gutierrez de Lara doing here when you knew him?

Mr. THOMSON. He was a fugitive, as I understand, from Diaz.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. THOMSON. In 1908, I believe it was.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, I am not talking about 1908. You didn't come to the border here at all until 1912.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I don't know what he was doing here after that. I didn't ask him. But I know he was arrested here in Los Angeles, it was understood to be under the orders of the Diaz government, and he was held in prison several months and finally released.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. THOMSON. In 1908.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what do you know about it? You were not here?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, there are records to prove it.

The CHAIRMAN. Ricardo Flores Magon was arrested here, too, was he not?

Mr. THOMSON. I believe he was. I don't know him.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you know Antonio I. Villareal?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; by sight.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know Sarabia?

Mr. THOMSON. Not to speak to.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the inception of the Mexican revolution?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I think from a Liberal club or a Liberal organization, as they called it, engaged in—

The CHAIRMAN. Who formed it?

Mr. THOMSON. These different men.

The CHAIRMAN. What different men—those I have mentioned?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And they were arrested, were they not?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; they were.

The CHAIRMAN. How, and upon what charge?

Mr. THOMSON. For having something to do with the violation of the neutrality laws.

The CHAIRMAN. And were sent to the penitentiary for violating the neutrality laws?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was under the Diaz régime?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And were the same men afterwards convicted and sentenced to San Quentin for a revolution against Madero?

Mr. THOMSON. I believe there was something like that.

The CHAIRMAN. And Mr. Diaz is not the only man who secured the arrest and conviction of the same parties. And Mr. Gutierrez de Lara was a fugitive from Mexico after the overthrow of Diaz, just as he had been prior to the overthrow of Diaz?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever been in Mexico, Mr. Thomson?

Mr. THOMSON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you, of course, know that in connecting up this pamphlet of yours with Mexican officials upon this side you received a letter from a man along the line of Texas under the name of Gus Klempner?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And did you reply to that?

Mr. THOMSON. I received two. I have them right here.

The CHAIRMAN. You know who Gus Klempner is, now, don't you?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. He is the senior captain of the Texas rangers, cooperating with this committee, and is our special man on the Mexican border.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I treated him as a—I thought he was a friend. I was just perfectly frank with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. We have your letter.

Mr. THOMSON. And I sent him 25 copies of those booklets.

The CHAIRMAN. And you got your money, didn't you?

Mr. THOMSON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I will see that you get it, because they are in the hands of the committee and have been used by the committee. I am sorry you have not received the money. Mr. Secretary, will you see that the gentleman gets his money as soon as possible?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I just want it to be thoroughly understood that this has not been a money proposition with me.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is with the committee. We were perfectly willing and will be very glad to pay for them, but it has been overlooked.

Mr. THOMSON. I lost something like eight or nine hundred dollars of my personal savings on it that I don't suppose I will ever get back.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you let the consul general at San Francisco have 5,000 copies of this book, as you say, at cost or less than cost?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You are aware of the fact that this committee has stated that it received copies of those books from Bonillas, the Mexican ambassador at Washington?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. That is in this memorandum.

The CHAIRMAN. That was another part of this committee's investigation, that the committee had a letter written to Mr. Bonillas, and secured a copy of this book from him.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, there is another thing I want to clear up. This thing was handled secretly; at least there was a certain amount of secrecy about it. I suppose it was handled by the Mexican authorities secretly because it would be misrepresented, which it was, but that was not my idea at all.

The CHAIRMAN. That it would be misrepresented how?

Mr. THOMSON. By the press, I presume.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they think it was capable of misrepresentation?

Mr. THOMSON. I suppose they did.

The CHAIRMAN. What was their purpose in handling it at all?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, to kind of offset some of this insidious intervention propaganda, and, as they said, to get——

The CHAIRMAN. That is a morsel that you and some others like to roll under your tongue, this "insidious propaganda" proposition, and yet when you are requested to point out any part of it you can not point it out.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I told you the Hearst press and the New York Times——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, my life is too short to go back through the files of the Hearst press or the New York Times, or the Los Angeles Times, or these other papers and search their records to endeavor, in the obscurity of my little knowledge of Mexico, to ascertain what has impressed you about Mexico.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, you see there has been so much of it that I didn't clip it.

The CHAIRMAN. But it has impressed you, undoubtedly.

Mr. THOMSON. Certainly it has. I wouldn't have written it if it had not.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a wheel within a wheel. You get something from Mr. DeBekker or Mr. de Lara and you swing it around, and then Mr. DeBekker gets something from you, and he swings it around, and that is the way it goes on.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, we are acting under purely disinterested motives. We think we are doing the right thing. I suppose DeBekker is willing to be shown; I know I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I would hate to undertake the job of showing you. I refer you to historical works. If you will get "Ward's Mexico," published in 1828; if you will get "The Great Mexican War," in three volumes; if you will get "Mexico al Traves de los Siglos" work on Mexico, and then if you will read up along the modern lines and the modern histories of Mexico, and then undertake to read something about Mexico, I might then be willing to consider it with some degree of patience at any rate.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, that "Siglos"—that long name—I have quoted from that.

The CHAIRMAN. No; you have quoted from somebody who quoted from that, because it has never been translated into English.

Mr. THOMSON. No; I have not read the original. I will admit. It is translated in books I have quoted from, but I have not read the original.

The CHAIRMAN. But you have quoted from some one who has quoted from it.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. Well, I don't think we can claim that those men that translated those did not translate them truthfully.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Senator Smith wants to ask you some questions.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Thomson, how long were you in the United States before you became so deeply interested in the conditions in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I became interested about 1912 or 1913.

Senator SMITH. When did you learn first that the economic conditions in Mexico were conspiring to bring about intervention by the United States?

Mr. THOMSON. Oh, along about 1914, when the papers here used to run great scare headlines about it.

Senator SMITH. What time did you print this book?

Mr. THOMSON. September, 1919.

Senator SMITH. At that time you were more deeply interested in the relations of the United States to Mexico, it seems from your publication, than you were in our relations with Europe?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir. I was interested in our relations with Europe, too, of course.

Senator SMITH. You didn't write anything about that?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I wrote this book.

Senator SMITH. Now, I would like to know those economic conditions in Mexico that were conspiring. Please do not go into generalities, but tell me one single economic condition in Mexico and with whom it conspires to bring about intervention.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, Col. Dan Burns, a very wealthy man, he has got large interests in Mexico on the west coast.

Senator SMITH. I know him very well.

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know him personally, but I know a very close friend of his, and this close friend told me that Col. Dan Burns reports a case from the west, Saltillo, or some place down there, where there was a Mexican——

The CHAIRMAN. Let us get our geography straightened out. Saltillo is on the east.

Mr. THOMSON. I mean down through Sonora and that next State.

The CHAIRMAN. Sinaloa?

Mr. THOMSON. Sinaloa. I think his interests are mostly in Sinaloa.

Senator SMITH. Now, about this conspiracy.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, he reports that this man was going around the country preaching Mexican hatred of the United States, trying to stir up those Mexicans to cause disorder, so that the United States would have to act.

Senator SMITH. Now, this was some friend of Col. Burns?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, this man is a partner of Mr. Burns.

Senator SMITH. A partner of Mr. Burns told you that somebody was going around in Mexico stirring up hatred on the part of the Mexicans against the United States?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, and Mr. Burns also published that in a series of——

Senator SMITH. Then Burns was not conspiring if he was publishing that, was he?

Mr. THOMSON. Burns was not conspiring. I didn't say that.

Senator SMITH. Well, I was asking you for the names of the conspirators.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, this native Mexican was going around through that part of the country stirring up the people, trying to cause trouble, so that the United States would be forced to intervene.

Senator SMITH. Now, that is a conclusion again. They wanted to stir up trouble to make the United States do something.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Isn't that a far-fetched conclusion of yours, and isn't that going on in every Province in Mexico to-day—stirring up the Mexicans to hatred of the United States?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, but this Mexican was paid by American interests.

Senator SMITH. How do you know? Who paid him?

Mr. THOMSON. I have got Col. Dan Burns's statement. I don't know. I wasn't there.

Senator SMITH. Well, you don't know, and I would like to have Col. Dan Burns tell who paid him.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, he is in Mexico now. I think you would perhaps like to have him testify. He has a lot of interesting matter. He wrote a series of articles in the San Francisco Bulletin.

Senator SMITH. We are traveling now away from my question again. In this book you have said: "Now, as I said at the beginning, the cry of Wall Street and its kept press," and so forth. What did you mean by the words "kept press?" Name the papers.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I can name—every metropolitan paper in the United States is more or less what you might call a kept press of Wall Street.

Senator SMITH. Now, you may not be a socialist, but that sounds a lot like it.

Mr. THOMSON. I am a Socialist. I will admit that. But I am not engaged in any work like that.

Senator SMITH. Now, name one. It is like calling a whole community a lot of abandoned women to say that anybody that runs a paper is "kept" by somebody else. Name the paper?

Mr. THOMSON. What I mean by a kept press is a press that—

Senator SMITH. I don't care what—

Mr. THOMSON. "Kept press" is a term that we understand is applied to papers that are more or less responsible to Wall Street or to the moneyed interests. By Wall Street, I mean the moneyed interests of the country.

Senator SMITH. Yes. I am acquainted with that sort of propaganda.

Mr. THOMSON. But you take the New York Times or Herald or Sun, or any of those papers, or the Los Angeles Times for that matter.

Senator SMITH. So they are all "kept," are they?

Mr. THOMSON. That is the way I think it.

Senator SMITH. Then according to your broad views of the rights of people, do you think it confiscation to seize private property and use the same for any purpose without compensation?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I think there should be compensation.

Senator SMITH. Suppose they can not compensate; is it right to seize property and not compensate its owners?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, you might call the prohibition amendment here confiscatory. They claim it is confiscatory. In a sense it is.

Senator SMITH. I am asking you the question; yes or no. You and I might not disagree on a good many of those things, as to what is or is not confiscation. I am putting the self-same question. Do you think seizure in Mexico, by the Mexican authorities, of private property for which money had been paid, seizure by the Government for any purpose without compensating the owners, is confiscation?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I don't think that is right.

Senator SMITH. Do you think it is confiscation?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; it would come under the term "confiscation."

Senator SMITH. Well, do you think it is confiscation?

Mr. THOMSON. I think it is.

Senator SMITH. Well, that will do.

Mr. THOMSON. But then, of course, you have got to qualify that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is La Prensa, in this city, a "kept" paper?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know anything about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the publications sent out by the Independencia Club representing any interests?

Mr. THOMSON. As I understand it, this club is an organization of local Mexicans that represent no interests whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. They are engaged, among other activities, in securing letters from such men as Jorge Veraestanol and others with reference to the relations between the United States and Mexico, are they not?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I don't know much about that, Senator, to tell you the truth. I have only been in Los Angeles for about a month. I came down from San Francisco about the middle of last month, and I haven't mixed around among them much.

The CHAIRMAN. The difference between "kept press" and "kept press" is a difference as to who keeps it, in your judgment, is it not?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, a kept press is what we call the capitalist press.

Senator SMITH. Who do you mean by "we"?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I do, for one.

The CHAIRMAN. Then a press that represents peculiarly and solely the ideas which you have a perfect right to entertain so long as you do not come in conflict with the laws or institutions of this country, you regard as a perfectly proper press to conduct?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I believe—

The CHAIRMAN. But if it happens that parties interested in finance have a medium through which their views are expressed, for instance, as any of the commercial journals in New York, that is an improper medium?

Mr. THOMSON. I didn't say that; or, at least, if I said it I certainly did not mean it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is a capitalistic press, and that is the one to which you object, as I understand it.

Mr. THOMSON. I think the capitalists or anybody have a perfect right to conduct any propaganda or hold any views they wish so long as they conform to the laws of the country, but I think they are perfectly proper to conduct those as long as they do conform to those laws, but then the other side has got a right to their views, too.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you said in opening that you did not think that there was any slush fund at all of any kind for any pro-Mexican propaganda in this country?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether there is or not?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know positively; no; but I gave you my reasons for it.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not been able to get to it?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I have not been able to get to it, and if there were that slush fund it would seem to me that a lot of these Mexicans around here would be riding around in fine automobiles.

The CHAIRMAN. You suggested to Mr. Gus Klempner or to Capt. William Hanson, a senior captain of the Texas Rangers, alias Gus Klempner, that he might use his influence to secure you employment from Mexicans to write the situation along the border, at the same time saying you would write the truth as nearly as you could ascertain it, did you not?

Mr. THOMSON. Something like that, I think I said.

The CHAIRMAN. But you wanted employment from Mexicans to write of the situation along the border?

Mr. THOMSON. Not particularly from the Mexicans.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that was the text, I think. You will find your letter there. You were very frank in saying that you did not want to be hampered, but you would write what you understood to be the facts.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I wanted to write so that no one would think there were any strings to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Klempner here asks the question: "Let me confidentially know just what efforts you have made along these lines, and suggest about what you think will be necessary, and I will try to assist you." He did. He possibly was not justified in misleading you, of course.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, that thing was a funny matter all around.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, "Mr. Gus Klempner" wrote it in consultation with the chairman of the committee, so I take the responsibility.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, it didn't hurt me any.

The CHAIRMAN. No; but it enabled us to show that the Mexican Government, through its ambassador and through its consuls on the border and otherwise, was engaged in the circulation of this propaganda, because they are very careful in sending it out not to mark it as coming from the Mexican consul or the Mexican embassy, and while we could get from them, by writing this letter to you, your statement that you had sold it to them, we cinched the fact that they were circulating it.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, there is one thing, you admitted that I was honest, anyhow.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I beg pardon. I don't mean to say that I think you were not honest, sir; but I said that in the letter to Mr. Klempner you stated that you did not want any strings on you, but you wanted employment from the men that he might have influence with in Mexico to go along the border and investigate and write about it.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I just made that slip incidentally. That was not the purpose of my writing at all.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not mean by that to either reflect upon or indorse your honesty. I have no reason to doubt your sincerity.

Now, I have had a copy of this booklet with certain paragraphs marked. That marked copy is not in my hand at this time.

Mr. THOMSON. You have got me down here as connected with a German name. What was the idea of that, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. Because I thought, sir, that your propaganda on this situation, after reading it, had a German tincture to it. I did not know you were an Australian. It was so in line with the German propaganda that has been going on in Mexico, and to the same effect, that I had a man write you under a German name, and it elicited an immediate response.

You referred to the fact that this booklet had been classed as soviet literature?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar enough with this to refer directly to the paragraphs in which you refer to the—

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish you would refer me to them.

Mr. THOMSON. There is one on page 16.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, before getting to that, you used this language here, just before you close your appeal:

Finally the army of the "punitive expedition" was held in Mexico for nine months after the Villa chase was definitely abandoned, nine months after Gen. Scott, acting for the United States, had signed a memorandum to the effect that the dispersion of the Villa bands had been completed. Meanwhile, Franklin K. Lane and his associates on the American-Mexican Joint Commission, were attempting to browbeat the Mexicans into yielding the guarantees demanded by the Rockefellers, the Guggenheims, the Dodges, and the Dohenys. Although, in explaining the expedition, the President had declared that the troops would not be used in the interest of "American owners of Mexican properties" "so long as sane and honorable men are in control of the Government," the public statement of Lane, issued at the end of November (1916), after a long interview with the President, was nothing more nor less than an acknowledgment that the troops were being held in Mexico for that purpose and for no other, and a threat that they would remain there until an agreement was reached regarding such little matters as oil and mining taxes.

You are responsible for that, are you?

Mr. THOMSON. No; that is quotation.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, but you adopt it?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you responsible or not for the quotations with which you have filled this book?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I am responsible.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 24 you make some statements of your own, and then you quote from John Kenneth Turner in the Liberator of June, 1919, as to the policy of the Wilson government.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In this quotation he refers to agrarian reform having always been opposed. Now, it is from that quotation and from the continuing words of Turner with reference to agrarian reform that you have gotten your ideas that you have undertaken to explain here as to what took place under Benito Juarez and the agrarian reform?

Mr. THOMSON. That is, partly. There are others that I do not recall just now.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to just call your attention, if you ever do make a study of the history of Mexico, to one rather interesting phase of it—I don't know whether it would interest you or not, but it is interesting to some of us in studying Mexican conditions. The first congressional government that was ever given to Mexico was given by Morelos, an Indian; the second constitutional government ever given to Mexico was given by Juarez, an Indian; and the first period of peace that was ever continued for more than one year at any time was given to Mexico by Porfirio Diaz, who was, while not a full-blooded Zapatecan Indian, in every characteristic practically an Indian. I just suggest that for your consideration.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I understand that to be true.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you say here on page 24 that representations were made against Carranza's original land decree at the beginning of 1915. What was Carranza's original land decree?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, off-handedly, I couldn't quote it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is on page 24 of your pamphlet.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I know what you mean; but I don't remember the text of it. I haven't got it with me.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom was the protest made?

Mr. THOMSON. To Carranza, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, do you know?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know exactly; no.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I don't think you do, Mr. Thomson, because Carranza was not recognized by this Government, even as de facto president, until November, 1915. I just call your attention to the fact that it is not always well to swallow hook, line, and sinker, something that John Kenneth Turner or some other writer of that kind may say.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I didn't swallow them; I put them in quotation marks so that people could see where I got it from.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but you are basing your entire pamphlet here practically upon similar quotations.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I let the people see. They could judge it by that.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is misleading it is possible that that is the reason why the Mexican authorities considered it valuable.

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know anything about that. I think they believed it; at least the ones I dealt with directly believed it.

The CHAIRMAN. With whom did you deal directly?

Mr. THOMSON. The consul in San Francisco.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me ask you whether this is a quotation or whether this is your own language on page 16, the second paragraph?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, that is my own.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you say that—

One of the schemes of the interventionists is to try to make people believe that the present constitution of Mexico, known as the constitution of 1917, is in no way related to the constitution of 1857, but is a new one framed mainly with the purpose of confiscating all property supposedly belonging to foreigners, Americans in particular. The constitution of 1917 is an evolution of that of 1857; it is a modification and an enlargement of the constitution of 1857. It was written with the blood and tears of the oppressed and exploited peons of Mexico, and it is without a doubt the most democratic and humanitarian document in the Western Hemisphere; in fact, outside of soviet Russia, no country in the world has taken such a step toward real liberty.

That expresses your conviction as to the constitution of Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. That was my belief. I would not have written it if I did not believe it.

The CHAIRMAN. Referring to confiscation. You refer to Mr. Doheny. I presume you have reference to Mr. Edward L. Doheny?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how Mr. Doheny's titles to the property he claims in Mexico were obtained? How were they secured? From whom?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I read Mr. Doheny's testimony that he gave before you in Washington; but there was so much I just hurried through it; I couldn't—

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever read "An Oil Concession in Mexico?"

Mr. THOMSON. I just read it through. I haven't studied it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, just what is it? What line or form does it take?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, offhandedly, I couldn't tell you, to tell you the truth.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything how mining properties are conducted or held in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, just in a general way. You see, I was not very much interested in those things, so I didn't—

The CHAIRMAN. You were writing about them.

Mr. THOMSON. Not about concession and such like.

The CHAIRMAN. You were writing about confiscation of properties.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; just in a general way.

The CHAIRMAN. You have learned recently through some of the evidence that has been offered before this committee that the cry of many others who are no better informed than yourself with reference to concessions in Mexico is based on a false premise, have you not?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know that I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how lands were obtained since the reform laws of 1874 in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Through concessions, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, there is where you don't know anything about it. There never was such a thing as a concession, as you understand concession.

Mr. THOMSON. A concession of land?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, Diaz gave concessions to foreign interests, did he not?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; he did not.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, how did they get them?

The CHAIRMAN. How do you get property if you accumulate property?

Mr. THOMSON. I suppose you buy it and pay money for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did it ever suggest itself to you that you might interest yourself in knowing whether foreign interests bought property in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I see what you mean now. I didn't mean that they didn't pay any money for those concessions. He gave concessions, but undoubtedly they paid some money for them, at least in the majority of cases, I presume.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you mention one single concession that he ever gave?

Mr. THOMSON. I have got a list of the concessions that he gave. I believe, or at least that were given under the Diaz régime.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you go into it, by whom was that list prepared?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't remember; I think it came from Mexican sources.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is a singular thing to me, Mr. Thomson, that you, a writer, should write upon a subject when you don't know where your information comes from at all. Now, did it come from Mexican sources or not?

Mr. THOMSON. I believe I got it out of the "Mexican Review," and they got it from one of the Mexican Government officers.

The CHAIRMAN. Who published the "Mexican Review?"

Mr. THOMSON. John Weeks, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. George Weeks?

Mr. THOMSON. George Weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. Paid for by Mr. Carranza?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know—

The CHAIRMAN. But you read the evidence taken in Washington, didn't you?

Mr. THOMSON. I read that they said that, but I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. And you don't know it, although a witness swore to the fact, a reputable witness in Washington, and it has never been denied, and still you don't take his word for it?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I didn't read that very thoroughly, Senator. I was not very much interested in that part of it, so I didn't pay much attention to it. There was so much testimony taken there.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You got it from the "Mexican Review." Now, go ahead and give fully your authority for it. You got it from DeBekker's articles in the "Mexican Review," didn't you?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I got it from a recent issue of the "American Review."

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, you got it yourself out of the "American Review?"

Mr. THOMSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, let us see what they were. I just want one of them.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, we will take down here in Lower California, Louis Huller owns 14,437,433 acres.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is not doing him much good, because he departed this life, I think.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, that estate.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, all right.

Mr. THOMSON. Rudolfo Bulleg.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, hold on. About the Huller estate. Did you investigate that?

Mr. THOMSON. I haven't been down there.

The CHAIRMAN. You made no investigation. You simply take—

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I am not writing this.

The CHAIRMAN. No; but you took it, and upon that you base your judgment as to Mexico and undertake to instruct and inform the American people on Mexico. Now, I want to know did you make any investigation as to this statement as to how the Huller estate holds any concessions in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I went up to the Los Angeles Library and found there was a book up there written by a surveyor appointed by the Diaz government, where it says that most of those concessions were forfeited because they did not comply with the—what will I call it?—the original—I don't know just what it was.

The CHAIRMAN. Contract?

Mr. THOMSON. Contract.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, as a matter of fact a contract and a concession are the same thing, are they not?

Mr. THOMSON. A contract and a concession?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON. Pretty much, I presume.

The CHAIRMAN. Except that the concession, as you know, has something of the element of a concession which allows a street railroad to build through Los Angeles, for instance.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I didn't mean that so much.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I do. I mean it, exactly. Did you make any investigation as to whether the Huller concession, or any part of the Huller concession, had been forfeited?

Mr. THOMSON. Had been forfeited? Well, all of these lands were originally owned by the California—no; at least the International Development Co., I believe it was—and they either sold them or gave them in some way or other to these different interests that—

The CHAIRMAN. What different interests?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, L. Huller and Bulleg and Flores Haile, Mesado, Andrade—

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how did the original company obtain them? They had a right to sell them if they owned them, didn't they?

Mr. THOMSON. Sure they had.

The CHAIRMAN. How did they obtain them?

Mr. THOMSON. They got them from the Diaz government under grant, or contract, or concession, or whatever you like to call it.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the consideration?

Mr. THOMSON. I understand it was about 5 cents an acre, or 3 cents an acre.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you investigated it?

Mr. THOMSON. I have the surveyor's statement for it.

The CHAIRMAN. That it was obtained originally at about 3 cents an acre?

Mr. THOMSON. Something like that, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ever hear of any concessions being made to the Union Pacific Railroad Co. by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I have heard something about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the character of concession that you understand generally is such a concession as they get on lands in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I don't know that it is.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, you have not investigated and do not know anything about how the lands are held or obtained in Mexico. Now, Mr. Huller agreed with the Mexican Government that he would construct a railroad for military and other purposes where no railroad had ever been able yet to penetrate, leading from the American border, or near the American border, to Topolobampo, opening up a country which had never been opened by a railroad. If you have not a reference to the Huller concession, I suggest you go to the Department of Communications in the city of Mexico and ascertain what the Huller concession was and then how they had any concessions, if any, with reference to lands.

Now, Mexico has not had a survey in townships, sections, and quarter sections of its public lands as has the United States. Mexico did not have the money—no matter how much she has now—with which to divide these lands up. Mexico made contracts with various parties for the survey of her national lands, and she paid those parties in land, they putting up all the money, doing all the surveying, monumenting the land, photographing the monuments, and all their work being approved by an engineer furnished by the Mexican Government, the Department of Fomento, and his expenses and salary and all were paid by the contracting parties. Those parties obtained, in various instances, large acreages of land. The balance of it was surveyed for the Mexican Government. The parties received their pay in lands. And your so-called concessions in every instance you can trace to exactly the land surveying contract. In other certain instances the Mexican Government made cash subsidies for the construction of strategic railroads, not having the funds with which to do it, but guaranteeing to whoever did build the railroads, subsidies of so much per kilometer. In other instances, in lieu of granting a cash subsidy per kilometer, they granted land subsidies, exactly as the United States did, and subject to forfeit unless the contracting party completed his contract exactly as he entered into it.

Mr. THOMSON. Yes. Well, these lands I understood should have been confiscated because the original contract was not followed out in Lower California.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they been confiscated by the Carranza Government?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't think they have.

The CHAIRMAN. Were they confiscated by the Madero Government?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't believe so.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, don't you think that they should have commenced the confiscation or the forfeit of lands, where they were subject to forfeit before they attacked the property of particular individuals whose title they recognized?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, that is one of the things there. I claim they were afraid to do that because they thought the United States Government would not stand for it.

The CHAIRMAN. No; but the United States Government has stood for their attempted confiscation of the property of its private citizens until patience ceased to be a virtue, and then they have protested.

Now, Mr. Thomson, do you know anything about the economic development of Mexico at all?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, in a general way I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I will ask you, do you know who own the taxpaying properties and who pay the internal revenues in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I understand that the large landowners didn't pay but very little taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I didn't ask you that. Do you know whether Mexican citizens or foreigners of other countries support the internal government of Mexico, State, municipal and national, by taxes?

Mr. THOMSON. Everybody, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. Down to what person, do you know?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know that.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I supposed you did not. How many factories are there in Mexico, do you know?

Mr. THOMSON. I couldn't say.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how many shoe factories there are there?

Mr. THOMSON. I couldn't say.

The CHAIRMAN. You never investigated that?

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I was not interested in that part. That booklet has nothing to do with that at all.

The CHAIRMAN. No; and nothing to do with much of anything else, except a repetition of something that John Kenneth Turner or De Lara or some one else has published, and a comparison of the Mexican constitution with the soviet government, and an attack upon the policy of the President of the United States and other officials. You are not interested in what is going on, then, in Mexico as to its actual conditions, and so forth?

Mr. THOMSON. Oh, yes; I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, then, let me ask you: Have you ever read or seen or heard anything about the City of Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. I have seen lots of pictures, that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what the principal street in the City of Mexico is?

Mr. THOMSON. I have heard it, but I don't recall it.

The CHAIRMAN. Calle Francisco Madero?

Mr. THOMSON. Something like that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how many business houses there are on that street?

Mr. THOMSON. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you be surprised to know that there are none?

Mr. THOMSON. Is that so?

The CHAIRMAN. Not one.

Mr. THOMSON. Is that so?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I say, would it surprise you to know?

Mr. THOMSON. Oh, I don't think it would surprise me very much.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you don't know anything about shoe factories in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know whether there is a Mexican shoe factory in the entire Republic of Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the cigarette and tobacco and cigar business of Mexico, which is quite an extensive business?

Mr. THOMSON. Just in a general way.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether there is a Mexican owned—conducted by Mexicans—cigarette or cigar factory in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. No. I understand those sort of businesses are conducted mostly by foreigners.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether the Mexicans themselves ever developed an oil well in Mexico?

Mr. THOMSON. Quite likely not.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether Mexico has granted a concession on both sides of the Tamesi Riyeer to Japanese citizens recently, for oil, an exclusive concession?

Mr. THOMSON. I don't know, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know where that river is, do you?

Mr. THOMSON. No, I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Thomson, there is another reference or two showing your ideas as to the Mexican constitution and the soviet form of government in Mexico, and other possibly interesting paragraphs that we might refer to if we had plenty of time, but the committee has other matters to attend to. We have been very glad to give you the opportunity of coming before the committee. I can say to you, if you want my impressions—and I am going to say it whether you want them or not—that you possibly are sincere in what you have had to say, and in your interference, and unwarranted interference in my judgment, by a man who has applied for his first papers in the United States to become an American citizen under our form of Government, with the tense situation existing between the peoples and the governments of the two countries, where your ignorance is so absolutely colossal that you have hardly been able to answer a question which may have been propounded to you or has been propounded to you by the committee. While you have answered, I think, honestly, and given the sources of your information, you have yourself admitted that you knew nothing about it. And still you have stepped in where there is a tense situation, where you claim there has been an attempt and is an attempt on the part of certain interests to cause, possibly, a war with Mexico, and for the purpose, as you say of avoiding the war you have stepped in here with a lot of stuff such as you have put in this pamphlet, which was so satisfactory to Mexicans that they have purchased it and secretly circulated it here in the United States. Giving you full credit for absolute honesty and integrity and sincerity of purpose, I must say that the impression which is made upon my mind is that you have been engaged in a very dangerous and a very ignorant experiment.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, that is your view of it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is my view.

Mr. THOMSON. But, then, that can be explained, too. I did it—I thought it was the right thing to do. I thought we were headed right straight for war, and I thought I would get in and try to prevent it or do what I could to prevent it. The American people were told by Mr. Wilson and others that this was a war to end war.

The CHAIRMAN. You didn't get into it, did you?

Mr. THOMSON. No; I didn't get into it. I was exempted for industrial and alien citizenship.

The CHAIRMAN. You took advantage of the fact that you were not an American citizen. You offered that when you were drafted, did you?

Mr. THOMSON. Yes; I was exempted industrially, first of all, and then I decided to claim the other exemption.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON. Of course, I didn't believe a great deal in the war, anyhow. I think the war was caused more by England than by Germany. That is, by England I mean the English ruling class. Even though I am, I suppose, still legally a British subject, in the interests of truth I am compelled to state that. And the facts of the case prove that. That has been proven by——

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, well, I don't care for you to go into a disquisition on the cause and results of the European war.

Mr. THOMSON. Well, I just say that incidentally.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. I think your actions speak as loudly as your words could. That is all, sir.

Mr. THOMSON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless you have something further on Mexico.

(An adjournment was thereupon taken until Saturday, March 20, 1920, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Los Angeles, Calif.

The committee met pursuant to adjournment.

Present: Senator Albert B. Fall, chairman; Senator Mark A. Smith; Maj. Dan M. Jackson, secretary.

TESTIMONY OF MR. D. W. CHURCH.

(Witness sworn by the secretary.)

The SECRETARY. Your full name?

Mr. CHURCH. D. W. Church.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Church, are you a citizen of the United States?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, sir; I was born at Pomeroy, Ohio, in November, 1847.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you living in 1911?

Mr. CHURCH. I was in Lower California, at the mining camp of Alamo.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the condition of the country around Alamo, in Lower California, in the middle of the year 1911?

Mr. CHURCH. That was in June. Well, it was the time the insurrectionists came—no; they had gone. The Government troops came in June. In February the insurrectionists came again and took possession of the town. Along in March some time, I don't remember just when, but it was pretty well toward the 1st of April when they left; and then, in the course of two or three weeks after they left, the governor of Lower California, at that time Col. Celso Vega, sent a detachment of Federal troops out there, and they came in, and they were the ones that murdered those Americans and then left. While they had me under arrest I asked their commander, Capt. Gonzales—I said, "Captain, will you please tell me who is responsible for these arrests?" Well, he had not learned at that time that I could speak Spanish, and he started a little, and then he said, "Yes, sir; it is done by order of Col. Celso Vega." I knew at that time from hearing them talk among themselves, though they pretended they were going to take us to Ensenada as prisoners—I knew they did not intend to let us get anywhere alive. That is why I asked that question.

The CHAIRMAN. Among other matters which this committee is directed to inquire into and report to the United States Senate upon is damage or injury done to Americans in Mexico from 1910 down to the present time, and to report the names of the Americans.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you say that you were under arrest at that time?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was finally done with you?

Mr. CHURCH. I escaped when they shot the others. They shot four of them right there in the street.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was shot?

Mr. CHURCH. John Carroll, merchant; Patrick Glennon, merchant; Dr. Foster, physician and surgeon; and a miner, Constantine Duboise.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether Dr. Foster was a citizen of the United States?

Mr. CHURCH. Nothing, only just what he claimed himself. He claimed to have been born and raised in Boston, Mass.

The CHAIRMAN. Pat Glennon; do you know where he was born?

Mr. CHURCH. He was born in Ireland, but was a United States citizen by naturalization. I saw his papers, so that I know that.

The CHAIRMAN. And John Carroll?

Mr. CHURCH. He was born, as he told me himself, in New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. And Constantine Duboise?

Mr. CHURCH. He was born in France.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't know whether he was naturalized or not?

Mr. CHURCH. I do not. His parents moved to Canada when he was a child, and then they moved from there down to California, and from California into Lower California—the family.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any trial given you Americans?

Mr. CHURCH. No trial whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not even brought up before a court-martial?

Mr. CHURCH. Oh, no; nothing of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Never confronted by witnesses?

Mr. CHURCH. Nothing. Just simply took them out and shot them in the street. They left me at the time because they discovered that I could talk to Mrs. Foster and keep her quiet, and I gave them the slip right then and there. They left guards over the house; but as soon as the shooting commenced those guards made a little rush over there to get a better view, and I threw the door open on the other side of the house and told the two women, my housekeeper and Mrs. Foster, to get out and run for their lives, and I followed and closed the door after me, and when the guards got back we were out of sight.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you go?

Mr. CHURCH. My house was about a quarter of a mile out of town, and we took right down the road toward my house; and just as the guards were getting back we had come to a little sink in the road that partially hid us, and there were some oak bushes there, and I said to them to stand behind those bushes so that they couldn't see us; and we stood there until the whole crowd came back, and they ransacked the house, rode up and down the street, and raised quite a disturbance generally; and they didn't find us, and it was getting late in the afternoon, and they were in a hurry to get on to Ensenada, and went on and left us.

The CHAIRMAN. And those were the regular forces of the Mexican Government?

Mr. CHURCH. The regular troops of the Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, why did they shoot these Americans? Why did they have you arrested?

Mr. CHURCH. My opinion is that it was pure spite work of Col. Celso Vega, then governor of Lower California. I don't think the Madero administration knew anything about it until afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he have any reason to have any—

Mr. CHURCH. Nothing, only that he had been wounded in a skirmish with the insurrectos some little time before that.

The CHAIRMAN. Had you Americans been taking sides on either side in the difficulties there?

Mr. CHURCH. Nothing whatever. In fact the insurrectos had me up twice, because I would not take sides with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Had you declined to take any part in their internal disturbances?

Mr. CHURCH. I declined to take any part in any way, shape, or manner. I told them it was not my country and not my business.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the insurrectos have any Americans under arrest besides yourself at any time?

Mr. CHURCH. They had a list of those they intended to arrest, but the principal one, Meyers, a particular friend of mine, they did not find. He happened to be out that day somewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. I speak now of the insurrectos. Did they do any damage to any of the other Americans?

Mr. CHURCH. No; the insurrectos didn't do any damage to the Americans that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. But they did arrest you?

Mr. CHURCH. It was the federal troops that arrested me. But they called on me twice. You could hardly call it an arrest.

The CHAIRMAN. What did they want with you?

Mr. CHURCH. Well, in the first place, they had a man that had been chief of police in Alamo, and they had arrested him for a spy, and the fellow couldn't talk any English, and I came up there just as they were talking about executing him, and I got in and spoke for him, and did the very level best I could, and finally Mosby, one of the leading men, says, "Well, turn the brute loose; I don't think he amounts to anything anyway." And he proved to be a spy, all right enough, and that got me into trouble with the insurrectos as soon as they discovered it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you leave Alamo at that time or later?

Mr. CHURCH. I left Alamo at the time the Government troops came, although they had me arrested. When I escaped them I knew that all I could do was to get out of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. And you got out of the country, did you?

Mr. CHURCH. I got out of the country under great disabilities. In getting out in the nighttime I fell in an old mining shaft and broke an ankle. I traveled over a hundred miles, over the roughest kind of mountains, with that broken ankle.

The CHAIRMAN. And you finally made your way to the United States?

Mr. CHURCH. Finally got through. And they had telephoned to Ensenada that I had escaped and they telephoned right back to Alamo to send the best Indian trailer they could find after me, and they sent out scouts from Ensenada to head me off, but I knew the country pretty thoroughly and beat them off.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of Mrs. Foster and your housekeeper?

Mr. CHURCH. My old housekeeper is now in San Diego, and Mrs. Foster went to Winslow, Ariz., and I have never heard from her since. She had some relatives there.

The CHAIRMAN. How did she get out; do you know?

Mr. CHURCH. She came out from Alamo with a man by the name of Weber, who brought her to Ensenada, and then she took a steamer and came up to San Diego.

The CHAIRMAN. You say two of these Americans that were killed were merchants?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of their stocks of goods?

Mr. CHURCH. I really don't know what became of any of them, because I had to get out of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether any representations were made, either by yourself or any other persons, to the State Department of the United States concerning these murders?

Mr. CHURCH. I made the statement myself to the district attorney in San Diego, and they sent out Secret Service men from Washington to interview me. I sent them on to Ensenada to get evidence of my statement. They came back and told me they had not only discovered my statement was absolutely correct but they had discovered more evidence that I had not reported at all, and notified me to be ready to go to Washington any minute that I should be called, but I was never called.

The CHAIRMAN. What district attorney was it you made your statement to?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Utley. And he played the meanest trick on me that one white man ever played on another. He called a Mexican secret service man in to hear my statement in order to get me into trouble with the administration in Mexico. It happened in my statement—I didn't accuse the administration of anything, because I didn't think they were guilty, and I attributed it all to spite work of Col. Celso Vega. That Mexican secret service man I met afterwards in Mexico, and he told me, he says, "Church, if that district attorney of yours in San Diego could have known how he lowered himself in my estimation by that trick, he would have thought twice before he did it."

The CHAIRMAN. You have filed a claim with the State Department of the United States, have you?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your business at Alamo?

Mr. CHURCH. Mining and milling ore, and I had also a general repair shop—wagons and such things.

The CHAIRMAN. You were a workingman, were you?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not a capitalist?

Mr. CHURCH. I was not a capitalist, no; but a mine owner.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not a capitalist down there exploiting the Mexican people?

Mr. CHURCH. Oh, not by any means. I had a deal on at the time with a Boston syndicate who were taking an interest in my property and were paying me $20,000 cash and were going to develop the property for me, but the revolution came up just in time to break up the arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you have never gotten anything out of your property?

Mr. CHURCH. Not a dollar. I spent a good many thousand dollars there, besides a lot of time and labor, in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Was this money you had inherited or worked for?

Mr. CHURCH. Money that I worked for.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your trade?

Mr. CHURCH. The trade I was brought up to from a boy was carpenter, but I have been a mining man for a great many years.

The CHAIRMAN. Tool sharpener, etc.?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes; I understand tool-sharpening thoroughly, among other things. I followed the mines ever since 1876.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Church, the committee is under obligations to you for your evidence, and we will try and see whether the Government of the United States will take the matter up for you further.

I will ask that the reporter copy this communication into the record at the end of Mr. Church's testimony and as a part thereof.

(The document last above mentioned is as follows:)

PALMDALE, CALIF., August 4, 1911.

To whom it may concern:

I, Carl L. Carlson, am 38 years of age, was born in Sweden, 1881, and am a naturalized citizen of the United States since 1908. I was engaged in prospecting and mining business in Lower California, Mexico, from March, 1910, until June, 1911, and in that time I spent more than a year in Alamo. While there I was well acquainted with Mr. Church and knew him to be the owner of different properties mentioned in his statement. For nine months or more I worked together with and for Mr. Church on his various mining claims and at his quartz mill, also while there I occupied, together with my partner, Mr. A. Cratz, the smaller one of his houses, and I feel that Mr. Church has made a conservative estimate as to the value of his properties at Alamo.

I was also personally acquainted with Dr. Arthur L. Foster, Patrick Glennon, John Carroll, and Constantine Duboise, who, in my estimation, were all law-abiding men and attending their own business.

During the occupation of Alamo by the insurrectos Mr. Glennon had an American flag hoisted over his store with the Mexican colors on top to show that he was an American citizen.

On June 8 or 9, 1911, Juan Rivera, under command of Capt. Gonzales, came to Mr. Glennon's store with a squad of men and demanded that the flag be pulled down, and when Mr. Glennon refused to do so Rivera sent one of his men up and tore it down and also shot Mr. Glennon's dog.

On June 11, 1911, Mr. Myers and I were standing talking together near our place, about a quarter of a mile from town, when Señor Sanchez, a Mexican living at Alamo, came riding by. He seemed very much excited, and told us that they had been out in the surrounding country and had shot 11 Indians and that now they were going to get Mr. Glennon and some other Americans.

In an hour or so we heard several shots fired and climbed up on a ridge overlooking the town. We could see a squad of mounted men, but from that distance I could not distinguish who were with them, but afterwards learned that the four Americans above mentioned were all shot and killed.

Fearing that they would come back for the rest of us, D. W. Church, Dan Barr, C. L. Myers, and myself decided it best for us to try and reach the United States boundary. Leaving all our personal property and belongings behind, we started out in the night and succeeded in getting, unobserved, out of town.

The first night out Mr. Church fell down an abandoned mining shaft and severely injured his ankle and leg. He begged the rest of us to leave him behind and seek safety for ourselves, which we would not do without him, and after eight days and nights, during which time we suffered severe privations from lack of food, water, loss of sleep, and from exposure, we reached the United States boundary at Campo, Calif., June 21, 1911.

CARL L. CARLSON.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, please swear this witness without using his name.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HARRY C. DONOHO.

(Witness sworn by the secretary.)

The CHAIRMAN. The record will, of course, show the name of the witness, but he prefers not to give his name for certain reasons. Of what State are you a resident?

Mr. DONOHO. California.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you born?

Mr. DONOHO. Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of the United States, then?

Mr. DONOHO. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you speak the Spanish language?

Mr. DONOHO. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been in the Republic of Mexico at any time?

Mr. DONOHO. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you go there last?

Mr. DONOHO. I think it was in July or August of 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you come out?

Mr. DONOHO. About October, 1919; this past October.

The CHAIRMAN. You remained there something over a year?

Mr. DONOHO. About 15 or 16 months, I think; something of that sort.

The CHAIRMAN. In what State were you principally; in what portion of Mexico?

Mr. DONOHO. I was about six or seven months in Mexico City; perhaps a month in Puebla, and around in the Federal district; and the rest of the time I was in the States of Tamaulipas and Vera Cruz.

The CHAIRMAN. What were you doing in Tamaulipas and Vera Cruz?

Mr. DONOHO. I was doing several things. In the first place, I was gathering material with the thought in mind of doing some writing after I had learned what the real conditions in Mexico were; but in order to get that material, in order to inform myself personally and at first hand as to just what the conditions were, I took a position with one of the oil companies—I hardly know what to call myself—I was supposed to be attorney and paymaster for the oil company, although there was not very much legal work in connection with it, excepting the perfecting of titles and making of contracts and leases, and the payment of rentals to the Mexican land owners from whom the company was leasing oil lands. Those oil lands were scattered throughout the two States of Tamaulipas and Vera Cruz.

The CHAIRMAN. Did your business require you to visit the interior or to go from one point to another in those States throughout the oil districts and in the adjacent territory?

Mr. DONOHO. Almost constantly. I would be perhaps at our headquarters at Tuxpam, or near there, perhaps a week, translating leases to send back to the States, and then anywhere from two weeks to six weeks I would be riding on horseback out through the interior.

The CHAIRMAN. While you were there did you become acquainted with Col. Cardenas?

Mr. DONOHO. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. What is his official position? Is he a military man?

Mr. DONOHO. He is a Carrancista colonel in charge of the garrison at the city of Tuxpam in the State of Vera Cruz, or he was, at any rate, at the time I left.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have occasion to make a report to him at any time with reference to actions of his subordinate officers or soldiers?

Mr. DONOHO. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Concerning any matter in which the Americans were interested?

Mr. DONOHO. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please state the circumstance and relate what occurred?

Mr. DONOHO. About 9 miles from the city of Tuxpam, in the State of Vera Cruz, were the headquarters of the company for which I was working. One night in—let's see—that was in this past either July or August, I don't recall the exact date now; there was a bunch of fellows playing poker in a rear room of the signal station.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, you were not playing?

Mr. DONOHO. Oh, absolutely not—much. And it was about 12 or 1 o'clock in the morning, and the room next to where we were—there were four Americans and a couple of Mexicans in the room—the room next to where we were at that time was used as a telephone headquarters for the company—a telephone central. The little Mexican boy who slept in that room and who attended to the telephones came creeping into the room apparently very much frightened. I asked him what was the trouble. He said that about 20 minutes to half an hour before that a man had opened the door and came into the room, pointed a pistol at him and told him if he made any noise he would kill him. He said he was a Villista, and he proceeded to cut the wires and destroy the telephones. He told the boy to stay there and not make any report.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the boy describe the man?

Mr. DONOHO. Yes. I asked him what sort of a man he was and he said he was a "militar"—a military man. And if I might digress just a little bit rumors were constantly coming to the camps in the interior to the effect that the garrisons at Tuxpam, or at Los Naranjos, or some of the other surrounding garrisons were going to come down and massacre the Americans. Those reports were of weekly occurrence, and naturally we knew that something was afoot, but didn't know what. The rest of the Americans, with the exception of one young fellow who was there with me, jumped out of a back window. The headquarters is on an island; that is, the Gulf of Mexico on one side and a river running around the other side, and the thick underbrush and forest is right within a hundred yards of where the house was, so they escaped into the brush. There wasn't any of us had any arms there. I had just come in the day before and my guns were locked down in my office. And they made their escape, but we turned out all the lights, and this young fellow—I forget his name now—Ted Osterwitz, I believe it is—a young man from New York—we went up into the tower of the signal station with some night glasses; we saw that in the office, which was about 200 yards from the building in which we were, they were beginning to light up the office. We could see with the glasses. They lighted up every office in the building, and we watched while they went to the houses near by and got the officers of the company and brought them down.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, the officers of the American oil company?

Mr. DONOHO. The officers of the oil company; yes. And they marched them down to the office of the company. They didn't even give them time to put on shoes or trousers or anything else, but just simply brought them along. We could see sufficiently with the night glasses when they were in the room to distinguish their features. As each man was brought up, for instance, we recognized immediately who it was they were bringing. We could see very distinctly the features of the men—that is, of the Mexicans who were doing this. There were three of them. And, in addition to this young American man of whom I spoke, there was also a Mexican with us in the tower. All three of us recognized the three Mexicans who were collecting the crowd at the office as Carrancista soldiers from the garrison at Tuxpam. One of them was the lieutenant colonel. I sent this young man up to the pump station, which was up in the opposite direction.

We, of course, didn't have any means of knowing how many of these men were on the island; but I saw there were only three of them working, and I sent this young man up to the pump station to see if he could get a gun. In the meantime they brought over—I forget his name now, the auditor of the company—they brought him in first and told him to open the safe. I learned part of this afterwards, as to what they said to him—or asked him, rather, if he could open the safe; and about the only Spanish he knew was “si,” so he said “Si.” They brought him in and told him to open the safe. Well, he didn't have the combination of the safe and couldn't open it; and one of the Mexicans thought he was simply stubborn and took out a knife and shoved the knife up against him and told him if he didn't open the safe immediately he would kill him; but another employee of the company, a Frenchman who had been garnered in with the rest of them, spoke up then and explained to the Carrancista soldiers that this man didn't speak Spanish. They then went and got the treasurer of the company, brought him down, and he opened the safe and they took $40,000. Incidentally, they took a sack containing 200 pesos in 5-cent pieces, and as they took them out of the safe they put these various sacks on a table, and there was a pile of papers at one end of the table, and one sack got shoved over under one of these papers and they carried off this sack with 200 pesos in nickels in it and went off and left $10,000 in American gold in the sack that got shoved under the papers.

As soon as this young man returned, he came back with a gun, and I didn't know what men might be posted between the signal station and the office, so instead of going straight there I ran down to the beach with the thought that I could run down and head these fellows off, and if there were only three of them I thought we might have a chance to break even with them. By the time I got down to the wharf, which was only a comparatively short distance from the office, however, the men had left. They had taken one of the power launches belonging to the company and made the launch boys go with them to take them up the river. I called a couple of launch boys—our general manager at that time was in the United States, so I more or less had charge of things—and jumped into a power launch and started after them up the river. I had been told by some of the men there at the wharf that there were only five of them. Two of them had been left on guard down at the wharf. We met the other launch, though, coming back in about 20 minutes, and they said these men had disembarked within about four or five miles of Tuxpam. We continued on up to Tuxpam, and I went in and awoke, or, rather, caused Col. Cardenas to be awakened. He came out, and I explained what had occurred. His first statement was, "I suppose they were Villistas." "Well," I said, "They said, Colonel, they were Villistas, but as a matter of fact they were men belonging to your own company." And that was just at the time that a sharp note had been sent by our Government to the Mexican Government, and Cardenas appeared anxious to make some sort of a showing, so he said if that were true, if they were his men, he would throw a cordon of guards around the city and catch them as they came in, which he proceeded to do. The following day I received a telephone message from him asking me to come to Tuxpam.

When I arrived there he said that two of the men had confessed, that two of his soldiers had confessed to their participation in the robbery, and he wanted to know if I wanted to take a walk with him. I didn't know why he wanted me to take a walk, but anyway I went along, and we walked up on the main street of Tuxpam to a big stone church, and there was a firing squad with these two men standing up against the church, and they shot them right on the principal street—executed them. I might mention, in connection with that, that when I came out of Mexico here—I think this was in the early part of October—I picked up a paper, the San Antonio Light, as I now recall it, and there was a Washington dispatch in which they said that Juan Barragan, the chief of staff of the Carranza army, was credited with making a statement that it was now discovered that the persons who had committed this robbery were employees of the company, and they had already executed two of their own soldiers for it.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of the lieutenant colonel? Was he arrested?

Mr. DONOHU. The lieutenant colonel and two of the men were still in jail, being held there when I left. I never heard what became of them.

The CHAIRMAN. But the two men who had confessed—

Mr. DONOHO. They confessed not only to their own participation in it but also implicated the lieutenant colonel. They said he was the man in charge.

The CHAIRMAN. And their mouths were closed by the firing squad?

Mr. DONOHO. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You mentioned the name of Juan Barragan. He was chief of staff of the Mexican Army?

Mr. DONOHO. Yes; I know him personally.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have occasion to remember seeing him particularly?

Mr. DONOHO. Why, I have several reasons for remembering Juan Barragan—one in particular. While I was in Mexico City I was in an American café one night—incidentally, the same café in which the Jack Johnson episode occurred—when Barragan came in with two other Carrancista officers, sat down at a table, and there were perhaps 150 persons in the café at the time, men and women, and the waitresses were exceedingly busy, and he didn't get waited upon quite as quickly as he evidently thought he should, and he took his riding crop and pounded it on the table until he attracted the attention of everyone in the room, and called to one of the waitresses who was at that time waiting on a table where there were four ladies seated, right next to him, and he called out, "Don't you know who I am?" The girl looked over at him, and said, yes; she knew who he was, and that she would wait on him just as soon as she served these ladies. He then took his fist and pounded it on the table and said, "When I come in here to this 'Gringo'"—it was not a Gringo joint, but that is what he meant—"When I come in here and ask for service," he says, "I don't expect you to wait on anybody until you wait on me." Well, the girl, although she was a Mexican, was a little bit spunky about it, and she said, "General, I will wait on you just as soon as I serve these ladies." And she brought the ice cream, or whatever it was she was serving the women, and a moment later came up and took his order. He ordered some ice cream, as did the other two officers with him, and sat there frowning and tapping his riding crop on the table, and a moment later this girl brought the ice cream to him, and he reached over and took hold of the back of her neck like that [illustrating] and picked the ice cream up and just slammed the dish of ice cream in her face in the presence of all these people.

The CHAIRMAN. There are occasionally pleasant trade excursions from this country into the Republic of Mexico along the railroads, are there not?

Mr. DONOHO. Yes. There were three such parties came to Mexico City while I was there.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have any reason to observe the preparations made for the reception of the committees before they reached the city?

Mr. DONOHO. I did; yes. It was a matter of common knowledge by the Mexicans that the Carrancista Government was putting forth every effort to create the impression among the American visitors, and especially the delegations from Chambers of Commerce and other civic organizations who came to Mexico City, that the Carranza forces were absolutely in charge of everything and that while there might be a few scattering bands of rebels out through the country everything was going along fine. On the three occasions of which I speak that the chamber—I don't recall now from whence they came—but they always were met at Laredo, Tex., by a delegation of Carrancista officers, and with an armored train in front—that is, an engine with a box car with sheet iron over it—were brought straight through to Mexico City. Then they went up the street, either in automobiles or walking, literally thousands of beggars that one sees on the streets of Mexico City at the present time—the police always went about two blocks in advance, or three, and herded these beggars all off the street, so that one wouldn't get a bad impression. Moreover, during the six or seven months that I was there, and when these various committees or excursionists, or whatever you might call them, were there, they never were taken, to my knowledge, off of—well, they were brought up the principal street of Mexico City, and usually taken out to the Castle of Chapultepec, but aside from that they were not taken about the city. That is absolutely the only street in Mexico City that one can travel with any degree of comfort. They, however, managed to keep Avenida Juarez and Calle Francisco I. Madero up pretty well, but the other streets, you might say, are almost impassable. Then these men were taken, after they were banqueted and surrounded by Carrancista officers always, and sent right straight back down the line again to the United States, and they didn't know any more about Mexico after they left than they would if they stayed in San Antonio as to the real conditions of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, through its official investigators, has been receiving telegrams and letters reporting the exodus of Mexican workingmen from the Republic of Mexico, particularly from the States of Jalisco, Michoacan, San Luis Potosi, Aguascalientes, as well as the border States, the Mexicans coming over now, at the present time, from day to day, clandestinely as well as through the ports, not by the hundred but by the thousands. The investigators of the committee and the officers of the United States Government along the border, at the request of the committee, have been taking the affidavits of these Mexicans as to the cause of their leaving Mexico at the present time. This exodus has taken place since this committee held its meetings along the border of San Antonio and other places in Texas. It has grown to such exceedingly great proportions within the last few days that it has been the cause of telegraphic reports from the sources which I have mentioned. The purport of the statement which is made by practically all of these Mexican citizens, workingmen, to our officials and to the investigators of this committee, is to this effect: They had very little work; only received from 25 to 50 cents a day, and had only a few days' work in a month; that the hacendados could not plant, for the reason that they had been cleaned out by the Carrancistas and Villistas, and had no oxen, horses, or mules left; that if they had money it would do them no good to produce crops, for either the rebels or the Carrancistas would take them as soon as they were ready to gather; that it was the general opinion of everyone that another revolution about election time was pending, and that to escape it, and for the other reasons given, they concluded to come here, where they had heard good prices were being paid for their work and where they would have guaranties.

Incidentally, there has also been called to the attention of the committee a decree of President Carranza directed to the governors of the States warning them that unless they were able to prevent the exodus of workingmen from Mexico he would prevent it with military forces.

Now, from your knowledge of Mexico and your travels through the interior, necessarily in some portions of the agricultural district of Tamaulipas and Vera Cruz, can you give the committee any information throwing light upon the true conditions there as to whether these Mexican workingmen are telling the truth now about those conditions?

Mr. DONOHO. I know nothing as to the conditions in Jalisco and the other States you mentioned; that is, virtually nothing, except from hearsay. I did know, personally, however, of conditions in the States of Vera Cruz and Tamaulipas. I may ramble a little bit in this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, describe, for instance, some one trip you have made and what you observed.

Mr. DONOHO. I could describe many trips, Senator. But just take one instance: I rode a two-day trip on horseback from the San Fernando district to Tuxpam. That is the richest agricultural district in the whole of southern Mexico. Although I had never made that particular trip before, I knew from my investigation and study of the State that that was true, that it was a rich agricultural district. I knew that many of the persons from whom we leased lands had prosperous farms in that particular district. This trip of which I speak was taken—well, I have been over there three times, but the first trip of which I speak was taken along in this last June, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. Which would be, ordinarily, I suppose, about the height of the crop season?

Mr. DONOHO. Just about. I took a Mexican guide from San Fernando to show me the trail. He suggested that it would be well for us to take some provisions. I said, "We don't want to carry any provisions along with us. We will just stop, as I always do, out in the country and stay with the people, and eat right with the people." "Well," he says, "Señor, you will not find any people." And I rather laughed at it. It seemed so absolutely incredible to me. But nevertheless we did take some provisions; I left that matter to him. And I want to make this statement without any qualification, that we rode for two days through absolutely the richest agricultural district in Mexico, with the prettiest little farms that one could imagine, and passed village after village, and passed cornfields where everything had been burned, and every time we would come to a little farmhouse or to a little village I would go up and try to arouse some one, and during that whole two days ride we didn't see a single solitary living soul.

Now, the same conditions obtained, virtually, in the Anona district. The city of Anona is a very pretty little place up on the mountain, but in the valleys about Anona it is a rich agricultural district. But on the four occasions that I was in Anona—I would go there and pay rentals, or on business connected with the company; I would know the people that I wanted to find—I found the natives—if you would go and inquire for a man, where he was, why was he not on his farm, why, they simply said that they didn't know; and sometimes I would have to spend as much as a week at a time just staying there until I could win the confidence of those people to find out where those people were hiding, with the result that I found that virtually all the owners of these rich agricultural lands had simply abandoned their farms and had gone to hiding in the mountains. After I found out where they were and managed to find them, I talked with them and found that they were simply hiding in fear of their lives, and their constant complaint was that "in the first place, we are afraid that the Government troops will come into the district and kill us; and in the second place, those of us who have been so foolhardy as to go ahead and raise crops, the Government troops have come in and taken what of the crops they wanted and have burned the rest, and there was no incentive in the world." In the Balcazar district, over near Tanhuijo, I found the Government had posted notices, adopting the plan that was adopted in Cuba by Weyler, of a concentration camp, and they had made Balcazar a concentration camp. Balcazar is also in a rich agricultural district. But in that beautiful city—and it is a beautiful city—there were anywhere from one to a dozen families crowded into every house in the village. There was no chance to get a room, and I slept out in the rain, as I quite well recall—just lay down under a tree. There was no chance in the world to get a room. Now, this edict that had been issued by the military governor of that particular district did not even permit the men—it simply said that if any of these men were found outside the confines of Balcazar they would be hunted down and shot as rebels, and it didn't even permit them in the daytime to go out to their surrounding cornfields and plant their corn, and the people were absolutely on the verge of starvation. There was nothing coming in; the Government was not furnishing any food for them. I stayed there three days, and during that time I managed to get a few tortillas and frijoles; that is all. There was no meat; they had eaten up all the chickens, and there were no eggs; there were no cows—there was absolutely nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you have very interestingly described what you have seen in going through the country in the way of devastation, destruction of crops, houses, and so forth. Did you ever witness the entrance of any Carranza government soldiers into any of those little towns yourself?

Mr. DONOHO. I did, on two occasions; one at the city of Anona, of which I speak, and the other at a place away up on the Panuco River, called El Higo. I happened to be present when attacks were made on both of those places.

The CHAIRMAN. What occurred at Anona, for instance?

Mr. DONOHO. I had been there for something over two weeks. Two days before the attack occurred a Scandinavian, I think he was—I can't recall his name—it seems to me it was Jensen—that was the first time I met him—he was working for one of the oil companies. He had come in and we were stopping at the home of Juan Cobas—or rather, the home of his widow, for Juan had been killed. Now that, Senator, is supposed to be in a rebel district. What I mean is that the Carrancistas have no garrison there. On the other hand, Manuel Pelaez's men were very strong in that district.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they have a garrison there?

Mr. DONOHO. No, not at Anona. Col. Robate, who was under Manuel Pelaez—that was his district.

The CHAIRMAN. But he had no garrison there?

Mr. DONOHO. He had no garrison there. Absolutely none. The nearest garrison he maintained was 17 miles from there. The Carrancistas never venture into that district unless they come in in considerable forces. This man Jensen—I might mention, however, that there were two boys, the sons of Cobas, one of whom was 14 and the other 16—just boys in years and boys in appearance. In back of their home there was a little cornfield down in the valley. As I told you, Anona is up in the mountains, but there is a little flat space there where they worked a little cornfield. During the two weeks or more I was there these boys had worked every day in the cornfield. They were supporting their mother and one younger brother, 2 or 3 years old, and three sisters. I had never seen any of the boys with a gun. I had never seen any armed men in the city, excepting on Friday, which was market day, when people would come from all over the country. I did on two occasions there during that three weeks meet and had occasion to talk at some length with Col. Robate. He came in with some of his troops, about 60, and stayed virtually all day Friday, on market day. He invited me to a ball, incidentally, and I attended the ball, about 17 miles from there. On this day of which I speak Jensen and myself were sitting on the front porch, it was about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, on the front porch of this house, right on one of the principal streets, when he heard a firing, and Carrancista troops, about 300 in number, came in from three sides. They attacked from three sides. If there were any rebels in town I didn't know it. There may have been, but at any rate there were not a great number of young men in the town. What few young men and middle aged men there were, however, beat it for the brush as fast as they could, and some 12 or 14 men were killed by the Carrancistas. They came in firing indiscriminately, and the colonel rode up with about 12 or 15 officers and stopped on this particular corner. He saw us sitting over on the porch, and spurred his horse over to within just a few feet of us, and there was a kind of shadow cast there; I judged at the time that he rode over close enough to see that we were foreigners, and the firing was still going on all over town, and I spoke to him, and he didn't answer at all, and just then these two boys came out of the house onto the front porch. The colonel turned to one of his officers and pointed with his riding crop to these two boys and he says, "Hang those two rebels," and the boys stood as though they were stupefied, and a couple of men jumped off their horses and came in onto the porch and grabbed these two boys.

I walked out into the road and introduced myself to the colonel. I says, "Colonel, I am a stranger: I have no intention and no desire to interfere in your affairs, but," I said, "I thought perhaps you would welcome some information about this matter." I said, "It was dark in there, and maybe you didn't see that those were just boys." I says, "Those are not rebels." And I called his attention to the fact that I had been there for something over two weeks, and that during the whole of that time these boys had been working in the cornfield, supporting their mother and sisters, excepting the days that they rode with me out into the mountains hunting some people I was trying to find"; and he used a little complimentary language toward me, as a Gringo, and turned to one of his officers—by the way, though, Jensen came out and joined me just about that time, and he said, "Yes, Colonel; I have been here two days, and," he said, "there haven't been any rebels in town since I have been here." He said, "These two boys are just kids, just working here, supporting their family." And the colonel's face flushed up, and he jerked his horse around and leaned his head over sideways and called back as he started away—he called back to the lieutenant that he had left in charge. He says, "Hang those two rebels, and if those two Gringos have any more to say about it, hang them to the same pole." Well, we didn't have any more to say about it. They hung the younger boy first, and they botched the job pretty badly; they didn't make a hangman's noose at all just threw a rope around his neck, and the way they hanged him it took quite a little while before he died.

The CHAIRMAN. He died of strangulation?

Mr. DONOHO. Yes. And the older brother, 16 years old, stood there and watched him, and then he walked up to this group of six or seven men, and commenced cursing them and called them butchers, and he said, "You can't even hang a man decently," and he took the rope and made a hangman's noose and put it around his own neck, and they jerked him up on the pole, and hanged him.

I didn't see anything of that kind at El Higo. I saw three women killed at El Higo when the Carrancistas came in there. Oh, I was about to overlook something at Anona. They gathered all the old women and the little children and told them to leave the city and not come back, to go off into the mountains or any place they wanted to, but that they were going to burn the city, and not to come back, under penalty of being killed. They gathered the young women and girls up in a group; I didn't count them, but I judge perhaps there were 120 or 130 of them, and on four different buildings in the city—they set fire then to all the buildings in the city. Of course the only thing that would burn was the roof. They set fire to every building, and on the walls of four buildings they posted a placard addressed to the rebels of the Anona district in which they said that "We have driven your old men, women, and children into the mountains and we are taking your young women and girls to turn over to the Carrancista garrison at Los Naranjos." Whether they did that or not I am not in position to say, although when I got back to headquarters some two weeks later and went up to Tuxpam, I heard from a dozen different sources that the report was all over Tuxpam that Anona had been attacked and burned—they didn't know, of course, that I had been there—and that the women had been turned over to the Carrancista garrison at Los Naranjos. That was the only instance of that kind that came under my personal observation. I saw those things, and I saw those posters, and I was very strongly tempted to tear down one and bring it with me, but I thought it would be a little dangerous, and didn't attempt to do it. On two occasions aside from that that same report came from other districts, that that had been done, but as to whether there was any truth in it I am not in position to say.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the date of this occurrence at Anona, approximately?

Mr. DONOHO. My best judgment would be that it was some time last August, 1919; perhaps along the first part of August.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the condition that you found the agricultural district in there, and the want and scarcity of foodstuffs, and so forth, would indicate that the statement issued by the Mexicans who are now coming into the United States at this immediate time, with reference to similar conditions existing in their own districts may be, and likely is, true?

Mr. DONOHO. That would be my impression, Senator. And may I make a statement, Senator? I don't know that it is at all pertinent, but I want to say, or to go on record as saying, that I have not a cent's worth of interest in Mexico. The Mexican people as a whole, as I met them out in the interior, the Mexican farmers, the small shopowners, the Mexicans in general, aside from the military people that I have met, the Government people—I have never met a kindlier, more lovable people in my life than they are. I have had Mexican boys and grown men, when I have gone into a district where I didn't know the way where I wanted to go, who have volunteered to go with me, and have ridden one or two days on horseback with me, and when I would ask them, "How much do I owe you for it?" they would say "Pues, nada, Señor."

The CHAIRMAN. "Nothing"?

Mr. DONOHO. "Nothing." I don't want anybody to get the impression that I am interested. I was simply working for an oil company; that is true; but I had absolutely no interest in it, I have no interest now, and did not have at that time. I was simply working for them, and was trying to learn what real conditions were, for my own benefit.

The CHAIRMAN. With reference to the statement you have made concerning the Mexican people, the committee are glad to have you go on record in that way, and the chairman is very glad to be able, after 35 years living among those people and in very intimate association with them, to say that he can corroborate, from his own judgment, everything you have said with reference to the Mexican people themselves, and possibly might corroborate some things with reference to the Carranza military officers.

Mr. DONOHO. I venture to say that I have had as many as—well, just to be conservative I will venture to say that I have had 200 Mexicans, men and women, in various parts of the country say to me with reference to existing conditions in Mexico, "Señor Donoho, we are ignorant people; we don't know very much about what your country intends to do, but you folks have had a thousand times more reason to come into Mexico and afford us some sort of relief than you did have to go into Cuba, and yet you don't do it." Now, some of those are Spaniards. A great many of the storekeepers in the small towns in Mexico are Spaniards. Both Spaniards and Mexicans have said that to me, many, many times.

The CHAIRMAN. If the very enterprising newspaper men who are present happen to get your name, you will be aware of the fact that it was not the committee that mentioned it.

Mr. DONOHO. Well, being a newspaper man myself, and having been a newspaper man for a good many years, I would like to ask as a courtesy that the newspaper men—I told the Senator that I was perfectly willing to come here to Los Angeles and testify concerning matters, and instead of testifying in executive session, as I had intended in the first place, I was perfectly willing to testify so that all of you could hear what I had to say; but I do ask that if any of you happen to know my name you will refrain from using it.

The CHAIRMAN. It was by inadvertence that the witness, in repeating a statement made to him, used possibly the Mexican pronunciation of his name. The committee request the newspaper men present not to publish the name. We have a pretty fair suspicion that there are secret service men of the Mexican Government present, and they can exercise their own discretion, as we have nothing to do with them.

I ask this particularly, as the newspaper men of Los Angeles are so exceedingly lively, industrious, and anxious for news that my colleague has called my attention to one evidence of their enterprise as appearing in the Daily Times of Saturday morning in connection with the story published as given by a Mr. Collins. According to this report, Mr. Collins was heard by a committee yesterday afternoon, and "Senators Fall and Smith listened to Mr. Collins with great interest, and said they were not surprised at his statements, because they had learned that Mexico had gone the limit to avail herself of military equipment at about the time this country went into the war," and so forth. If this committee had a meeting yesterday afternoon, Senator Smith and myself must have been dreaming, because we did not know it. If Mr. Collins appeared at that time or at any time before this committee, we must have been still in a daze, because we have no recollection of it and the record does not show it. I merely mention this in connection with the request just made.

Senator SMITH. I do not know whether Senator Fall knew about this meeting. I know I did not. I don't know Mr. Collins; I don't know who made the report; but I know that the committee was not in session on yesterday afternoon, and no such testimony as reported has been heard by the committee from any source, so far as I know.

The CHAIRMAN. It is immaterial, but interesting as showing the enterprise of the newspapers.

Mr. DONOHO. I just want to volunteer a statement, that as between the so-called rebels and the government troops in Mexico to-day, I think I know personally virtually every American in the oil fields, and I never yet have met any American, any Englishman or German or any other foreigner in Mexico who from time to time has had occasion to travel out through the interior where it was part of their duty to do so but what have told me that their observation has been the same as mine, and that although I have sometimes carried as high as $17,000 in gold out in the interior I never have felt any hesitancy whatever in going into a district or into a town that I knew to be held by the so-called rebels. I have had the personal assurance of Gen. Manuel Pelaez, Col. Robate, and a host of so-called leaders in the south that they would issue instructions that no American was to be bothered either as to their life or property, and with the exception of the one instance of which I speak, when a half-drunken man violated that order, with me they never bothered. On the other hand, we have ridden one or two or three days out of our way in order to go around a town that we knew to be held government troops.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, sir, we are under obligations to you for the statement which you have made, and thank you very much. There is a witness who desires to be heard in executive session. The committee will go into executive session, and you will kindly let us have the room.

(Room cleared, with exception of committee, staff, and witness.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

FRIDAY, MARCH 19, 1920.

FEDERAL BUILDING,
San Antonio, Tex.

Oral testimony and depositions of Melquiades Ortiz, S. E. Rix, Roscoe C. Burbank, Thomas Hart, M. L. Osborn, C. Campa, V. V. Bryant, W. J. Lewis, witnesses appearing before W. M. Hanson, Esq., duly authorized by the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, to take testimony in the investigation of Mexican affairs, the following testimony being taken in the office of the Immigration Service, in the Federal building, San Antonio, Tex.

The witnesses were sworn by Henry L. Gazley, a notary public in and for Bexar County, Tex., acting in said capacity and as shorthand reporter.

TESTIMONY OF MR. MELQUIADES ORTIZ.

(The witness was duly sworn by the notary public.)

Capt. HANSON. What is your name?

Mr. ORTIZ. Melquiades Ortiz.

Capt. HANSON. What nationality are you, Mexican or American citizen?

Mr. ORTIZ. I am an American citizen born and raised in Texas.

Capt. HANSON. What is your occupation?

Mr. ORTIZ. I run a labor agency.

Capt. HANSON. Are you engaged in shipping Mexican labor to the interior?

Mr. ORTIZ. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. How many have you shipped during the last month, more or less?

Mr. ORTIZ. I don't know.

(The witness displayed inability to comprehend English sufficiently to testify without an interpreter, and therefore Mr. F. B. Parker was sworn by the notary to well and truly interpret questions propounded into Spanish and the answers of the witness into English, and thereupon the witness testified through the interpreter as follows:)

Capt. HANSON. How many Mexicans have you shipped during the last month, more or less?

Mr. ORTIZ. About 150 men; that is all I sent.

Capt. HANSON. What per cent of those handled by you have you talked to as to why they came to this country?

Mr. ORTIZ. About 20 or 30. They said they haven't got anything to do in Mexico.

Capt. HANSON. It has been stated by certain people and through a portion of the press that certain Americans in Mexico and along the border have been engaged in inducing these people to come to this country for the purpose of exploiting them, and have led them to believe that they would receive high wages, etc. Now, I will ask you to make a statement as to just what reason these people you have handled came here, and whether they claim or stated that anyone importuned them to come, or assisted them in any way, and in substance just what they told you with reference to this matter.

Mr. ORTIZ. I don't know nothing about that. All I do is to go from my office outside to get these men up and send them out to work. They have never said to me that big wages would be paid to them if they would come here or not. They have no work in their own country and they came here to get work: nobody has induced them to come.

Capt. HANSON. Well, now, what did they state to you were the conditions in their States that caused them to come to this country?

Mr. ORTIZ. They told me that they came here because there was no work and they couldn't make a living; and there are a great many that I send off without collecting from because they haven't got the money; they are destitute.

Capt. HANSON. Did they tell you anything about a great many children of the poor people being naked, having no clothes?

Mr. ORTIZ. No; they haven't.

Capt. HANSON. How did they cross the river?

Mr. ORTIZ. I don't know.

Capt. HANSON. Did they state to you that anyone from this side of the river assisted them to cross or had anything to do with their coming to this country?

Mr. ORTIZ. No.

Capt. HANSON. Have you any agents in Mexico soliciting these people to come to this side?

Mr. ORTIZ. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Do you do any advertising in Mexico to bring them to this side?

Mr. ORTIZ. No, sir; only here in San Antonio.

Capt. HANSON. What are the general conditions in the section of the country, in Mexico, from which these people come?

Mr. ORTIZ. What they have told me is that they have come to look for work here because they can not get anything to do in Mexico. I don't know how the general conditions are in Mexico.

Capt. HANSON. What, if any, information did you obtain from these people as to why they were unable to obtain work in Mexico?

Mr. ORTIZ. They have told me that Mexico is no good, because they can not get work, and if they do get work they get such small wages that they can not live on it or buy their grub with it.

TESTIMONY OF MR. S. E. RIX.

(The witness was duly sworn by the notary public.)

Capt. HANSON. What is your name?

Mr. RIX. S. E. Rix.

Capt. HANSON. What is your nationality?

Mr. RIX. Irish.

Capt. HANSON. Well, you are an American?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Where were you born, Mr. Rix?

Mr. RIX. Down here in Live Oak County, Tex., about 90 miles below here.

Capt. HANSON. What is your occupation?

Mr. RIX. I run a labor agency here.

Capt. HANSON. Have you any employees in Mexico?

Mr. RIX. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Are you engaged in shipping Mexican labor to the interior?

Mr. RIX. No, sir; only in the State.

Capt. HANSON. Well, that is what I mean.

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. How many have you shipped since, for instance, the 1st of February, more or less?

Mr. RIX. Oh, I don't know; some two or three hundred I guess.

Capt. HANSON. Can you furnish a list of those shipped out and those on file to ship out?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Have you it with you?

Mr. RIX. I haven't it with me; no, sir.

Capt. HANSON. You can get it?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir; I can show it. The inspector, Mr. Mills, and I were looking at it yesterday evening.

Capt. HANSON. What per cent of those you handled have you talked to as to why they came to this country?

Mr. RIX. Quite a few of them, sir.

Capt. HANSON: It has been said by certain people and through the press that certain Americans in Mexico and along the border have been engaged in inducing these people to come to this country for the purpose of exploiting them, and have led them to believe they would receive fabulous prices for their work. Now, I will ask you to make a statement as to about just what reason these people gave you for coming here, and whether they claimed or stated that anyone had importuned them to come and, in substance, just what they told you with reference to this matter?

Mr. RIX. Why, there was none of them told me that anyone induced them to come here at all. They said that they had come here hunting work, that there wasn't anything in Mexico for them to do, and what they did do there they only got 25 cents a day for, and they couldn't live on it, and that was the reason they came here—hunting work.

Capt. HANSON. Did they tell you anything about the general conditions in their State?

Mr. RIX. Why, yes, sir. They would lead a person to believe that it is bad; they can get absolutely nothing to do over there; what little they could get to do they only paid them—they told me that the rich people over there, the rich Mexicans, only paid them 25 cents a day, and they would have to live on it. That is just the statement as they gave it to me, that the rich ones over there only paid them 25 cents a day and they couldn't live over there.

Capt. HANSON. Well, those rich people, did they state whether they were officials of the Government?

Mr. RIX. They did not; no, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Did any of them state to you the condition of their families with reference to clothing, and food, etc.?

Mr. RIX. Why, no sir—only sometimes when they get here, and I handled them when they get here, they have absolutely nothing at all, or anything to eat and no clothing only just what they are dressed in, and they just haven't got anything and they say that is all they have got.

Capt. HANSON. Well, now, what did they tell you with reference to how they crossed the river?

Mr. RIX. Well, I have asked several of them—I asked one in particular, I think there were five or six in a bunch, they were signing the other morning to go to the railroad, and I asked them, I says to one of them in particular—are your feet wet, did you get your feet wet? He says, "No; I got wet all over."

Capt. HANSON. Your understanding is, though, that the skiff men at Laredo bring them over instead of them coming over on the bridge, isn't it, from their statements?

Mr. RIX. No, sir. I understand that they infer by that that they swim the river. I have had some of them tell me that they were held up on the other side by guards.

Capt. HANSON. Government guards?

Mr. RIX. I suppose so; they didn't say Government guards—"guardas mochos," and they would take about half of the money they had from them and would turn them down and turn them over to somebody else, and he would turn them over to somebody else, and they would cross the river, and then when they got on this side somebody else would run into them and take everything else they had—I have had two or three of them tell me that they absolutely would take these Mexican blankets away from them.

Capt. HANSON. Was that on this side or the other side?

Mr. RIX. Both sides. When they didn't have the money to pay them, or anything like that they would take their blankets, some of them would come here—one came here with a cap on, and he said they had taken his hat off, taken it for part pay.

Capt. HANSON. For crossing them over?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Where did they claim they were depredated on—on this side of the river, in Laredo, Tex., before they left there coming this way?

Mr. RIX. No; I couldn't answer that; I didn't ask them that; but I suppose either above or below Laredo, I don't know; but laughing with them and running on, talking to them, that is what they would say.

Capt. HANSON. Well, did anyone state to you that anyone on this side of the river assisted them in crossing the river or had anything to do with their coming into this country?

Mr. RIX. No, sir; I asked that question two or three times; and there are some in the office now that are going to leave to-night, and they told me they just came hunting work, and that was all; that nobody advertised for them; they came just because they wanted to—I asked some of them I had in the office last night and this morning.

Capt. HANSON. What portion of Mexico are these men from that you talked with?

Mr. RIX. Well, sir, I couldn't tell you; they are from all parts of Mexico.

Capt. HANSON. Now, can you mention what States any of them are from?

Mr. RIX. No, sir; I couldn't; I didn't ask them.

Capt. HANSON. Most of them came from the interior, did they?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir; they are from the interior. I never asked them anything like that.

Capt. HANSON. In your conversation with these people coming out of Mexico, what, if any, statements have they made indicating that there was an unsettled political condition which influenced the industrial conditions or their ability to get employment?

Mr. RIX. They say they can't do anything over there; if one side doesn't take it away from them the others will, and they don't know one from the other; sometimes they don't know the Carranza people from the Villa people; they can have nothing; it is taken away from them—if they get a few dollars and clothing or anything, a bunch of those bandits will come along and take it away from them—they told me that the Carranza people are worse than the Villa people. I have had several of them tell me that the Villa people would leave them something to eat, but the Carranza people will take it all. I have had them tell me that—they said the Villa people would divide with them, but the Carranza people wouldn't; they would take it all.

Capt. HANSON. From the statements you have just made I infer that the property owners themselves have given up any attempts to farm—

Mr. RIX. To do anything.

Capt. HANSON. Their properties or to raise crops, for the reason that when they get these crops to the point of harvesting that they are taken away from them by some one or other of the armed factions in Mexico?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir; that is just exactly what these poor working people who come here say; several of them I have talked with, some of them I haven't talked to, but they say they couldn't raise anything; when the corn got up to roasting ears or anything like that, they would come along and cut it down and take it away; take it off.

Capt. HANSON. And for that reason the big landowners themselves have abandoned any attempts to raise crops?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And for that reason these people have been thrown out of employment?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And can not get employment?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir; and for that reason they have come over here.

Capt. HANSON. Do you know approximately how many of these people have come from Mexico during the last 30 or 60 days?

Mr. RIX. I don't know how many; I couldn't guess at that; goodness, there have been so many; there have been several thousand, I know; I suppose there are something like a thousand or fifteen hundred in the city now; last night the street and alley places there were crowded; you couldn't get up or down the street at all.

Capt. HANSON. Now, from what they have told you, do you anticipate there will be more to come?

Mr. RIX. Oh, yes. You can go from here to Laredo and you will find every fifty to a hundred yards 5 and 10 in bunches coming afoot, besides what are coming in trucks and have money to pay their fares.

Capt. HANSON. And the same thing exists, I suppose, on all the roads leading into San Antonio from the border?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir. Now, I had a friend who went from here to Laredo the other day; he came back and stopped at the office as he came in—a boy that was raised with the family—and he says, “I never saw so many,” he says; “there will be 500 in here to-night,” he says; “every 100 yards I saw 15, 15 or 20 in a bunch,” he says; “they have a trail beat out that deep along the railroad track” [indicating].

Capt. HANSON. Now, what is the general character of these people?

Mr. RIX. What do you mean?

Capt. HANSON. Well, as to being peaceable and law abiding, as to whether they have come here for a well-meaning purpose or otherwise?

Mr. RIX. Well, I couldn't answer that at all; I suppose the majority of them come here for honest purposes, to work and to make a living; but still, at the same time, you couldn't overlook the fact that there is a lot of them liable to come here for anything—this low class of people you can not guess them at all, they can't write their own name and don't know a thing in the world, and there are some pretty well-educated people, there are some right down at the office right now that are well-educated people, and I can't do nothing for them there.

Capt. HANSON. Well, in times past these people that you speak of as well-educated and high-class must have been prosperous and well to do people in Mexico?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And have lost their property through heavy charges placed on them by taxation and otherwise by the officials of Mexico?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir. Some of them might come up here and talk to you—one of them is a stenographer and well educated, you may get a whole lot of information from them.

Capt. HANSON. He is here?

Mr. RIX. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Seeking a position?

Mr. RIX. Well, he is just fooling around the office there, he asked for a position, and he didn't know where to go.

Capt. HANSON. Is he from the interior?

Mr. RIX. I don't know. I never asked him.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROSCOE C. BURBANK.

(Witness was duly sworn by the notary public.)

Capt. HANSON. What is your name?

Mr. BURBANK. Roscoe C. Burbank.

Capt. HANSON. You are a member of the firm of the Garza Labor Agency?

Mr. BURBANK. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. What is your nationality?

Mr. BURBANK. American.

Capt. HANSON. Where were you born?

Mr. BURBANK. Laredo, Tex.

Capt. HANSON. And your occupation?

Mr. BURBANK. Railroad conductor.

Capt. HANSON. No; but your occupation is labor agent now, isn't it?

Mr. BURBANK. Yes, sir; labor agent.

Capt. HANSON. Are you engaged in shipping Mexican labor to the interior?

Mr. BURBANK. Interior, where?

Capt. HANSON. Well, out of San Antonio?

Mr. BURBANK. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Have you any employees in Mexico?

Mr. BURBANK. I have not.

Capt. HANSON. Do you do any advertising in Mexico?

Mr. BURBANK. I do not.

Capt. HANSON. About how many laborers have you shipped out since February 1, say?

Mr. BURBANK. Let's see—I shipped the month of February 1,200, including men, women, and children.

Capt. HANSON. From this place?

Mr. BURBANK. From this place; yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. How many did you ship from Laredo?

Mr. BURBANK. I don't know, sir.

Capt. HANSON. How many did you ship from Houston?

Mr. BURBANK. I couldn't say, sir.

Capt. HANSON. But you have labor agencies, branches in each one of those cities?

Mr. BURBANK. Yes, sir; branches in Laredo, and one in Houston.

Capt. HANSON. How many did you ship in March?

Mr. BURBANK. In March? I haven't figured it up, Captain.

Capt. HANSON. Well, approximately, how many?

Mr. BURBANK. Well, I have shipped about 500—450 or 500, somewhere along there.

Capt. HANSON. How did you get in touch with these people—you say you employ no people in Mexico to line them up?

Mr. BURBANK. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Or advertise for them?

Mr. BURBANK. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. How did they get to your office here, how did you get in touch with them?

Mr. BURBANK. Well, Captain, they make the rounds of the different offices in San Antonio, and wherever you offer them the best proposition, and they think you are telling the truth in regard to wages and where they are going, and so on, they will stay right there. They make the rounds of every office in San Antonio, you can see them in bunches, they have what they call a leader, a man who has been in this country before, and he is the one that brings them over—sometimes they come in bunches of 15, 16, 18, and 20; there is just one man as the leader, a labor agent can pick out the leader, they are just like a bunch of sheep, if you can get the leader they will follow him right on.

Capt. HANSON. And these leaders are the ones who have been in this country before?

Mr. BURBANK. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And they are the ones that are piloting these men to your office?

Mr. BURBANK. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Seeking employment?

Mr. BURBANK. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Do they bring them from Mexico?

Mr. BURBANK. They bring them right over from Mexico, right from their own pueblo—their own town—like if you see bunches of 16 or 18 they don't want to separate, they want to go together, and if you can't send them together they don't want to go.

Capt. HANSON. These people, the leaders, are they employed by any one?

Mr. BURBANK. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. They just assist their friends to get work?

Mr. BURBANK. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Do these people get a rake off?

Mr. BURBANK. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Or do they charge anything?

Mr. BURBANK. Well, I don't know; I couldn't say.

Capt. HANSON. Not to your knowledge?

Mr. BURBANK. Not to my knowledge.

Capt. HANSON. Well, what per cent of those handled by you have you talked to as to why they came to this country?

Mr. BURBANK. Well, I don't know, I never asked them.

Capt. HANSON. You did not talk to them?

Mr. BURBANK. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. It has been stated by certain people and through a portion of the press that certain Americans in Mexico and along the border have been engaged in inducing these people to come to this country for the purpose of exploiting them, have led them to believe that they would receive fabulous wages, etc., for their work. Now, I will ask you to make a statement as to what these people gave you for coming here, and whether they claimed or stated that any one importuned them to come, and, in substance, just what they told you in reference to this matter?

Mr. BURBANK. I haven't asked them, Captain; I don't know.

Capt. HANSON. You did not ask them anything about the conditions?

Mr. BURBANK. I never have; no, sir; never have.

Capt. HANSON. You did not ask them where they came from?

Mr. BURBANK. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Do you know how they crossed the river?

Mr. BURBANK. No, sir; I don't.

Capt. HANSON. They made no statement to you?

Mr. BURBANK. No, I never asked them.

Capt. HANSON. How many do you think have come to San Antonio since the 1st of February up to the present time?

Mr. BURBANK. Well, I have shipped about 1,600 or 1,700. I couldn't say how many the other offices have shipped.

Capt. HANSON. Well, you can approximate it, can't you? You have a general idea how many have been here; you know about how the business is run, how many was in here since the 1st of February?

Mr. BURBANK. It is hard to say, Captain.

Capt. HANSON. How many are here now, of Mexicans recently arrived from Mexico?

Mr. BURBANK. Well, I only have 29 on my list to send out to-day.

Capt. HANSON. Well, you have your men out around?

Mr. BURBANK. No, sir. I hardly ever leave the office. I have only one man working for me and he works in the office.

TESTIMONY OF MR. THOMAS HART.

(Witness was duly sworn by the notary public.)

Capt. HANSON. What is your name?

Mr. HART. Thomas Hart.

Capt. HANSON. What is your nationality?

Mr. HART. My nationality? I am an American citizen.

Capt. HANSON. What is your occupation?

Mr. HART. Chauffeur.

Capt. HANSON. For whom?

Mr. HART. Service car. I am driving a car for Mr. Reyna.

Capt. HANSON. Do you work for Mr. Ortiz, as chauffeur for him, of the labor agency?

Mr. HART. Why, he hires my car in the evenings to go up to the station and deliver people.

Capt. HANSON. You have talked to a great many of these Mexicans coming out of Mexico, that these labor agencies are sending to the interior?

Mr. HART. Why, yes, sir; I have been talking to some of them.

Capt. HANSON. Well, to just a few or a great many of them?

Mr. HART. Well, a few of them; sometimes I sit in the car there and they go and talk to me, have conversations with me.

Capt. HANSON. You know it has been said by certain people and through a portion of the press that the Americans in Mexico and along the border have been inducing these people to come to Texas, to this country, for the purpose of exploiting them, and have led them to believe that they would receive fabulous wages for their work. Now, I will ask you to make a statement as to just what reason these people that you have talked to gave you for coming here, and whether they claimed or said that anyone brought them over here or even induced them to come.

Mr. HART. Why, this is the way they came here: Some of these people that came from Mexico to work here, why, they go back there, and they get pretty good money in their work and they tell them they make good money here, and that is the way they come—they tell them that they are making good wages out here, are paid good wages, and everything, and that is the way these people talk; why, they are leaving Mexico to come to work out here, because they say over there if they raise up a crop either the Carranza people or the Villa people will take the crop away from them, and their money and everything and don't leave nothing to them; that is the way it is.

Capt. HANSON. They state to you then that the conditions where they came from are very bad and it is impossible for them to make a living?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. So that they come to this country to get guaranties for their life and property?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. For better wages?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir; because they don't treat them right over there, they say they don't get work enough to make their living and dress themselves up.

Capt. HANSON. Well, isn't it a fact that they have said to you on many occasions that the children of the poor people were naked, they didn't even have clothes to wear?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir; I have heard that several times, several of them told me that.

Capt. HANSON. That the children didn't have any—

Mr. HART. Didn't have any clothes.

Capt. HANSON. That they were naked. Just like they came into the world?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir; some naked—not all of them, but several of them.

Capt. HANSON. Do you have any idea as to the number of Mexicans that have come into this country?

Mr. HART. No, sir; I don't know.

Capt. HANSON. Well, are there a great many or quite a few?

Mr. HART. Oh, there are a good many all right—there are a good many have been in here already.

Capt. HANSON. Would you suppose that there had been as many as 8,000 or 10,000 who have come from Mexico, out of all the different points along the border, during the last 60 days?

Mr. HART. Why, there have been a great many, but I don't exactly know how many, and never paid much attention—but there has been over 5,000 I think, something like that.

Capt. HANSON. The city of San Antonio is full of them isn't it?

Mr. HART. Oh, yes; there are lots of them here.

Capt. HANSON. And there has been for several weeks?

Mr. HART. And there has been for several weeks, yes, sir; they have been looking for jobs, for work, they have sent them out.

Capt. HANSON. Well, from your conversations with them, would you conclude that there were a great many more coming?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir; that is what they tell me, they tell me some are coming on the road, walking.

Capt. HANSON. Do they tell you how they cross the river?

Mr. HART. No; they never did tell me.

Capt. HANSON. Did you hear any of them say that any one from this side of the river had gotten across or had anything to do with bringing them into this country?

Mr. HART. No, sir; they never did tell me anything.

Capt. HANSON. You did not ask them that question?

Mr. HART. No, sir; I never did ask them anything like that.

Capt. HANSON. Did you hear them express an opinion or a fear that there was going to be another revolution down there over the presidential election, or anything like that?

Mr. HART. Why, sir, I never heard them; they never did say anything about that; they just told me they came here to make their living better and work, because they can't make their living over there.

Capt. HANSON. What reason did they give as to why they believed they could get better wages and more work here than in Mexico?

Mr. HART. On account of some fellows that go over there from here—they have money in their pockets and dress themselves better.

Capt. HANSON. That is, their own people who have been over here and gone back?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir; their own people who have been over here and gone back there; yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MR. M. L. OSBORN.

(The witness was duly sworn by the notary public.)

Capt. HANSON. What is your name?

Mr. OSBORN. M. L. Osborn.

Capt. HANSON. What is your nationality, Mr. Osborn?

Mr. OSBORN. I am an American.

Capt. HANSON. Where were you born?

Mr. OSBORN. Down here in Oakville, Live Oak County.

Capt. HANSON. What is your occupation?

Mr. OSBORN. Labor agent.

Capt. HANSON. You are engaged in shipping Mexican labor to the interior?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; Mexican labor exclusively, you may say; very few Americans I ship.

Capt. HANSON. About how many have you shipped since February 1?

Mr. OSBORN. Why, I don't know.

Capt. HANSON. Approximately?

Mr. OSBORN. Oh, about three or four hundred, I guess.

Capt. HANSON. Would it be convenient for you to furnish us a list of those men?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And the States they are from?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; I can get that book; I don't know whether I could get the States they are from or not, but more than likely I can; I will send you a list of it. Do you want the women and children, too?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir; all of them.

Mr. OSBORN. All of them? Yes, sir; I will get it out.

Capt. HANSON. Have you any employees in Mexico looking for these laborers?

Mr. OSBORN. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Do you do any advertising in Mexico?

Mr. OSBORN. No, sir. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. You have nothing to do with those laborers until after they get to San Antonio, or until after they have crossed the river?

Mr. OSBORN. After they get here to San Antonio, that is all; I have no one working with me except Garza there in the office; that is all.

Capt. HANSON. Well, now, what percentage of those that have been handled by you and others, that have been around your office, have you talked to as to why they came to this country?

Mr. OSBORN. Well, for the last two or three weeks I have talked to all of them—nearly all of them.

Capt. HANSON. It has been reported through the press and by others that certain Americans and others were engaged in bringing them in here to exploit them. What do you know about that?

Mr. OSBORN. Not a thing in the world.

Capt. HANSON. They have not said anything to you?

Mr. OSBORN. No, sir. They state right the opposite.

Capt. HANSON. What did they state with reference to that matter?

Mr. OSBORN. About why they came here?

Capt. HANSON. Yes.

Mr. OSBORN. Well, nearly all the same; they have heard about the work in the United States in several different ways; that during these war times we shipped something like six or seven thousand to Pennsylvania Railroad Co.; that is, I did myself, to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.; they went to New York, finally to Philadelphia; they went to different parts in the North; they made good wages; they went back to Mexico; they told their people about it; they came back and I shipped them again—I have shipped the same man three or four times, that made visits to Mexico, and he came back and we sent him. I have also made shipments to Michigan Sugar Co.—San Antonio to Michigan—and, just to illustrate, there was a man in my office last week who lives here with his family, and he said it was the most money that he thought he would ever see; why, they paid him one time $500 for his work, for him and his family, and the next time it was $400, and he came back here with $900 clear money; well, he takes that and goes to Mexico, comes back and brings some of his comrades and friends, and they take it themselves; and it has gotten to be regular talk to come to the United States and getting good wages. Of course, they don't know but what this war is still going on, I guess, and labor is going to be very scarce, they think.

Capt. HANSON. What do they state to you with reference to conditions from whence they come?

Mr. OSBORN. Well, I talked to a good many; they say it is awful bad.

Capt. HANSON. Well, explain more or less what they have told you with reference to conditions?

Mr. OSBORN. Well, now, when they lived in the little communities over there—it seems like a great many of them lived in a small community—and in these places beans and corn are very high; I think one of them told me they paid 60 cents a kilo; about that was the price of beans over there, and they are very high, and there it takes about $1 a day, and a man with a family, he says it is impossible to get any meat, and they just have to live the very best they can and starve with hunger, and they live in any manner they can. One man told me—well, I know this to be a fact, because I read his letter—he came over here; he stole two burros that they loaned him over there in the State of Guanajuato to do a little hauling; he stole those two burros and gets to Laredo and then gets to San Antonio, and when he gets to San Antonio he writes the woman who owns the burros a letter, asking her to please stop the prosecution, as he is going to send the money to pay for them, as his family was starving and he had to take these burros in order to get to Laredo and get here, and I mailed that letter for him back to her.

Capt. HANSON. Did you hear any of them state anything about being naked or no clothes to wear?

Mr. OSBORN. Oh, yes. A fellow yesterday we asked about that; he said you could go into a house there any place and you could see the children with paper around them, and some of them without any paper around them, and some without any clothes at all, but just rags; that is their tale. I heard a good deal of what the newspapers state, the San Antonio Express and Evening News, but I never paid any attention to it; I know more about it than they, I think, and I didn't reply to any of it.

Capt. HANSON. Well, then, is it a fact from what they tell you that they came here because they are nearly starved to death?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And because economic conditions in that country were unbearable?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; that is what they tell now.

Capt. HANSON. Well, who do they say depredates on them there?

Mr. OSBORN. Why, I have talked to some, more or less; they stated that some of those big haciendas there, they let them plant a crop of corn and if they will plant 8 or 10 acres and get it up in roasting ears a bunch of Carranza soldiers would come along and just take it all and give them a piece of paper, and just tell them that Col. So-and-So took it, and they would chop it down and feed it to their horses and leave them in that condition, and they are very glad to get off with their lives; they say they can't say anything back to them at all.

Capt. HANSON. If they do, do they kill them?

Mr. OSBORN. Sure.

Capt. HANSON. Can you approximate how many people have entered the United States from Mexico during the last 60 days—just a rough guess from what you have seen and heard?

Mr. OSBORN. Well, it would only be a guess, Captain; I don't know, I couldn't hardly say, but I wouldn't be surprised if it wouldn't go up to about 75,000.

Capt. HANSON. Seventy-five thousand?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; I think so—oh, I don't know, it would be just an approximate guess, you know.

Capt. HANSON. What class of people are these laborers that have come in here from Mexico, with reference as to why they came, and as to whether they are peaceful, law-abiding citizens that have come here for work or come here for other purposes?

Mr. OSBORN. Oh, these people that we have here now, they are a harmless class of people; they could have no other purpose.

Capt. HANSON. They are ignorant?

Mr. OSBORN. They are ignorant; they could have no other purpose; they couldn't harm us, the first money that they get they send it right back home to their wives.

Capt. HANSON. Is it their intention to bring their families here as soon as they get money to send for them?

Mr. OSBORN. A good many of them; yes, sir. In picking out a good bunch of laborers for a man I make it a purpose to ask them if they are married or single; if he is a married man and has a family at home in Mexico I am confident that he is in need—that his family is in need, and this man will go and stay with this man in order to send money back; I make it a habit of taking those with families, that have the families back at home hungry, because they will undertake or naturally want to do some good service for the man I am furnishing them to.

Capt. HANSON. What did they tell you with reference to crossing the river into this country; what are their statements with reference to that?

Mr. OSBORN. Well, I have been told by some of them that they wade the river.

Capt. HANSON. Wade the river?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; that they get across without paying their $8; I have been told by others that they have to pay a man in Mexico $4, and I have been told by others that they paid a man in Mexico $4 to show them how to get across the river, and when they get to the river on the other side another man told them—a Mexican—told them he had to have a dollar, and if they didn't have it, he would have to collect what he could.

Capt. HANSON. Were they officials?

Mr. OSBORN. Well, I don't know; somebody with a gun on; they didn't know anything but that he has a gun on; it might not be an official, I don't know; they call him an official, and they get him across the river that way. I have been told also by some of them that it cost them more to get across the river that way than it does to pay $8 head tax, but they had been told by people on the other side that they can not get across the river, because they can not read and write, or there is some defect in the eye, and they tell them it would cost them more to swim the river than it would to come across on the bridge, but this is done on the other side of the river.

Capt. HANSON. Done by Mexican citizens?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And not by Americans?

Mr. OSBORN. No, no; they pay the Americans as soon as they get here; not an American tries to rob any Mexican here, or even skin him here; it is done by Mexicans from Mexico; no Americanized Mexican will try to do that.

Capt. HANSON. What class are they, as a rule; what age people are they?

Mr. OSBORN. Some are old; some of them are 55 or 60 years old; but on the average I should say they are about 30 or 35; there are some of them over the middle age, and middle-aged people; you might say on an average about the middle age.

Capt. HANSON. But as a rule they are able-bodied workmen?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; all of these latest people coming over are nearly all single men, those coming alone and leaving their families there.

Capt. HANSON. Have you talked with any of them as to the political conditions in Mexico, their belief in and fear of another revolution there as the result of the pending presidential election?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; I tried to find out something about that, but they wouldn't talk on the subject, and we asked them—they didn't know who the President of Mexico was, they didn't seem to know—this class that is here now don't seem to know about how it is; it seems like they don't know. I asked them who the judge was where they lived and they didn't know his name.

Capt. HANSON. What State are these people mostly from?

Mr. OSBORN. The States of Michoacan and Jalisco and Guanajuato, the most of them.

Capt. HANSON. And very few from the border States?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; very few from the border States. They come and go all the time. You mean now what these people that are here lately are?

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir; that is, the recent influx?

Mr. OSBORN. Yes, sir; from the States of Guanajuato and Jalisco and Michoacan.

Capt. HANSON. And you never heard any of them say that they were brought over here by propaganda put out by Americans or people on this side of the river?

Mr. OSBORN. No, sir; they say they were not.

TESTIMONY OF MR. C. CAMPA.

(The witness was duly sworn by the notary public and testified through the interpreter, Mr. F. B. Parker.)

Capt. HANSON. What is your name?

Mr. CAMPA. C. Campa.

Capt. HANSON. What is your nationality?

Mr. CAMPA. Mexican.

Capt. HANSON. Where were you born?

Mr. CAMPA. In Guadalajara.

Capt. HANSON. What is your occupation?

Mr. CAMPA. Labor office, and also exchange money.

Capt. HANSON. Are you engaged in shipping Mexican labor to the interior?

Mr. CAMPA. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. How many have you shipped since February 1?

Mr. CAMPA. About 600 since the 1st day of February.

Capt. HANSON. Where were these people from mostly—what States?

Mr. CAMPA. Guanajuato, Jalisco, and Michoacan.

Capt. HANSON. There was very few of them from the border States?

Mr. CAMPA. Very few.

Capt. HANSON. It has been stated by certain people, and through the press and otherwise, that Americans and Mexicans from this side of the river have been bringing these people across to exploit them.

Mr. CAMPA. It is not true.

Capt. HANSON. What percentage of the people that you have shipped out of here have you talked to?

Mr. CAMPA. Mighty near all of them.

Capt. HANSON. What did they state to you were the conditions in Mexico?

Mr. CAMPA. Very bad; because the people pay them wages of 20 cents a day and give them a peck of corn.

Capt. HANSON. Did they state the condition of their families as to clothing, or the condition of the poor people as to clothing?

Mr. CAMPA. In those small villages everyone has left there—the workmen—on account of the authorities abusing them.

Capt. HANSON. Abusing their families.

Mr. CAMPA. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Is it a fact that a great many children of the poor people in Mexico, in that country from which these people came, are naked, without clothes?

Mr. CAMPA. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Has the political situation in Mexico anything to do with their coming here?

Mr. CAMPA. Yes; because those people are against Carranza's government.

Capt. HANSON. Well, do you understand from that that the Carranza Government has made it so unbearable for them to live there that they will have to get out?

Mr. CAMPA. Yes; because his own officers abuse them—the Carranza officers abuse them.

Capt. HANSON. What party, in your opinion, do these people favor in Mexico?

Mr. CAMPA. Obregon.

Capt. HANSON. Do these people that have come to this country fear a revolution, a new revolution, from the elections that are pending?

Mr. CAMPA. That is the rumor in Mexico.

Capt. HANSON. And that is one of the reasons that they come here?

Mr. CAMPA. That is the reason they come.

Capt. HANSON. An another is that they are badly treated there?

Mr. CAMPA. The soldiers abuse them.

Capt. HANSON. Do the soldiers abuse their women folks?

Mr. CAMPA. They certainly do; they all abuse the families.

Capt. HANSON. And these people have no recourse; they are afraid to say anything or do anything?

Mr. CAMPA. If they do make a complaint, they don't listen to them. I know people have pawned what little they have to come here, to get money to come to the United States.

Capt. HANSON. Have you any employees in Mexico?

Mr. CAMPA. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Do you do any advertising in Mexico?

Mr. CAMPA. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And you have nothing to do with the people until they get to this side of the river?

Mr. CAMPA. I don't have anything to do with them until they get here to San Antonio.

Capt. HANSON. It is not true that you have people in Mexico sending people over here to exploit them?

Mr. CAMPA. No, sir; it is not true.

Capt. HANSON. From your intercourse with people from Mexico of all classes during the last several months, does about the same condition exist over the interior points of Mexico as these people state?

Mr. CAMPA. Those are the sufferers, those in the interior of Mexico are the ones that suffer on account of abuses.

Capt. HANSON. Do you believe that the Carranza Government can ever bring law and order and peace and prosperity to Mexico?

Mr. CAMPA. No, sir; it can not.

Capt. HANSON. Have you any information as to how these people cross the river into the United States from Mexico?

Mr. CAMPA. They bring money, when they get to the other side of Laredo, for instance the Carranza officers over there take it away from them, get it from them, they tell them over there on the other side, they get them off on the side and tell them if they don't give them what they have got they will put them in the army in Laredo—the Mexicans tell them that.

Capt. HANSON. You are positive that Carranza officers and officials are doing that on the other side of the river?

Mr. CAMPA. Yes, sir; that is what they do with the poor people that have a little money; most of them are ignorant; they scare them up into giving what they have got, they will take everything, blankets and everything else—if they have a fine blanket why they take that away from them; when they get to the office here they are broke and tell their stories of how they got broke and who takes their money, then I give them something to eat.

Capt. HANSON. Generally speaking, what are the conditions with reference to law and order in Mexico and in the entire Republic in the portions of the Republic that Carranza is in charge of, is it safe or is it otherwise?

Mr. CAMPA. These people get about 50 cents a day, and then after they get their pay, why, these soldiers will get hold of them and take it away from them; they get work and get paid about 50 cents.

Capt. HANSON. Then we are to understand that in your opinion there is very little law and order in the interior of the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. CAMPA. Yes, sir; that is the reason they come to the United States, because they get $2 a day and get enough to eat and something to put on themselves—clothes—and have guarantees.

TESTIMONY OF MR. V. V. BRYANT.

Witness was duly sworn by the notary public.

Capt. HANSON. What is your name?

Mr. BRYANT. V. V. Bryant.

Capt. HANSON. What is your nationality?

Mr. BRYANT. American.

Capt. HANSON. Where were you born?

Mr. BRYANT. I was born in Alabama.

Capt. HANSON. What is your occupation?

Mr. BRYANT. Well, I am in the employ of the Hutt Contracting Co., and local manager in San Antonio.

Capt. HANSON. Where are their headquarters?

Mr. BRYANT. Kansas City.

Capt. HANSON. Have you or this construction company any employees in Mexico?

Mr. BRYANT. No, sir; we have not.

Capt. HANSON. You are engaged in shipping Mexican labor to the interior, to your company?

Mr. BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Mr. Bryant, you do no advertising in Mexico?

Mr. BRYANT. None whatever.

Capt. HANSON. About how many laborers have you handled since the 1st of February, say?

Mr. BRYANT. Since February 1, the last month, we shipped 1,214 from San Antonio.

Capt. HANSON. And this month?

Mr. BRYANT. This month, why, we have shipped about 800.

Capt. HANSON. Can you furnish lists of those shipped out and those on file?

Mr. BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. You will do that, will you?

Mr. BRYANT. Yes, sir. We supplied Mr. Jennings, at Austin, State Labor Commissioner.

Capt. HANSON. You speak Spanish?

Mr. BRYANT. Not fluently.

Capt. HANSON. But enough to understand it and get along with them?

Mr. BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Now, what percentage of those that you have been handling have you talked to as to why they came to this country?

Mr. BRYANT. We have talked with the majority of them.

Capt. HANSON. It has been said by certain people and through the press that Americans in Mexico and along the border have been engaged in inducing these people to come to this country for the purpose of exploiting them, and have led them to believe they would receive fabulous wages, etc. Now, I will ask you to make a statement just as to what these people give as their reasons as to why they came here, and whether they claim or state that anyone importuned them to come, and in substance, just what they told you in reference to this matter?

Mr. BRYANT. Well, it might be summed up this way: The intolerable conditions in Mexico, that they were starved, and that they came to the United States to better themselves.

Capt. HANSON. What do they say as to conditions in the State?

Mr. BRYANT. Very bad.

Capt. HANSON. In what way, Mr. Bryant?

Mr. BRYANT. That they could not make a living; that they were starving.

Capt. HANSON. Well, why?

Mr. BRYANT. They were underpaid, their wages, their wage rate was very low; they are paid 30 to 60 cents a day, and they were not able to live on that amount.

Capt. HANSON. Did they state to you who depredated on them; what class of people, or who was to blame for the bad conditions there?

Mr. BRYANT. In the majority of cases they never said, they just told me the general conditions of the country. We have talked with a great many men, and we have asked them in particular to compare present conditions with the conditions under Diaz, and in the majority of instances they have stated that under the Diaz régime they were paid an average of about 30 cents a day, but their living conditions were better; and even now they are paid more in proportion, but still they are unable to make a living.

Capt. HANSON. They seemed to be satisfied with the Diaz régime and with the treatment that they received at that time?

Mr. BRYANT. It seems so; yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And, now, under the present conditions they are very much dissatisfied?

Mr. BRYANT. In the majority of cases, in talking with these men, they have stated that conditions have grown worse, and are growing worse all the time, and they had hoped that conditions would settle down to where it would be possible for them to make a living and to remain in the country, but that conditions are steadily growing worse, and that they are leaving Mexico because they want to make a living. You might say that is a summary of our talk with the laborers every day.

Capt. HANSON. Have they made any statements to you with reference to the mistreatment of their woman folks or their families over there?

Mr. BRYANT. Some of them; yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. And who do they claim were depredating on their women folks and families?

Mr. BRYANT. Well, some claimed it was soldiers—Government soldiers.

Capt. HANSON. Carranza soldiers?

Mr. BRYANT. Carranza soldiers; some by various bandits and outlaws, they didn't know just what faction they belonged to, all they knew was they were bandits depredating the country.

Capt. HANSON. Would you gather from what they told you that conditions, economically and in every other way, were very bad where they came from?

Mr. BRYANT. Yes, sir; very bad; and they have stated, a great many have, that the women folks and children were practically naked, they had no clothing—the small amount of wages that they had made was not sufficient to buy the necessary clothing, and some of the men themselves show very plainly that their own condition is not very much better.

Capt. HANSON. What class of people are these; are they good, law-abiding class and able-bodied?

Mr. BRYANT. They seem to be, more so than usual—that is, compared with previous years.

Capt. HANSON. They are a better class of laborers than have been coming out during the last few years?

Mr. BRYANT. Yes, sir; we consider them so.

Capt. HANSON. Did they make any statement to you as to how they crossed the river into the United States?

Mr. BRYANT. Some of them; some claimed that they paid their head tax, others claimed that they waded the river, some claimed that they paid the Mexican runners, they call them, on the other side of the border to move them across the river—that is, some of them told us they paid $2 to $4 in order to get across the river.

Capt. HANSON. Did any of them make a statement in regard to being held up across on the other side of the river?

Mr. BRYANT. Some of them on the other side of the river.

Capt. HANSON. Yes, sir; on the other side of the river?

Mr. BRYANT. Some of them, and stated they had been turned back, but this was in a very few instances; the majority of them stated that they were not molested.

Capt. HANSON. Did any of them make any statement to you that they were assisted to cross the river by any Americans or Mexicans on this side?

Mr. BRYANT. On this side; no, sir. We have talked with them; we have asked them particularly on this point, just from one standpoint: We wanted to know, and not that we thought that would justify it, or anything like that, but just for our own satisfaction, we asked them that question. None whatever has stated that he was assisted on this side.

Capt. HANSON. And the statement made by certain interested people and a portion of the press that Americans have been engaged in this unlawful business is untrue to the best of your knowledge and belief?

Mr. BRYANT. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. What are the railroads paying these laborers?

Mr. BRYANT. Thirty-seven cents an hour, eight-hour day, $2.96 a day.

Capt. HANSON. Do they furnish transportation from San Antonio to wherever you send them, or is that deducted from their wages?

Mr. BRYANT. Nothing is deducted from their wages; transportation is furnished from San Antonio to the point of work and a return pass within four months to San Antonio, after a laborer has worked four months.

Capt. HANSON. Do you furnish them their box cars to live in, too, on top of that.

Mr. BRYANT. Yes, sir. Now, that is not clear, that $2.96; they are charged 90 cents a day for board; that includes their board, their bed and their quarters; they clear $2.06 a day.

TESTIMONY OF MR. W. J. LEWIS.

The witness was duly sworn by the notary public.

Capt. HANSON. What is your name?

Mr. LEWIS. W. J. Lewis.

Capt. HANSON. Where were you born?

Mr. LEWIS. Brownsville, Tex.

Capt. HANSON. Do you speak Spanish?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Fluently?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. What is your occupation?

Mr. LEWIS. I am labor agent.

Capt. HANSON. Have you any employees in Mexico?

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Do you do any advertising in Mexico?

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. How many laborers have you shipped since February 1, to interior points?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, it is between 250 and 300.

Capt. HANSON. Can you furnish a list of those shipped out and those on file?

Mr. LEWIS. I can this evening, Mr. Hanson.

Capt. HANSON. Well, all right.

Mr. LEWIS. I have got a man working on it now.

Capt. HANSON. What percentage of those handled by you have you talked to as to why they came to this country?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, not very many of them, only what I hear them say; I didn't hardly ever ask them why they came here.

Capt. HANSON. You hear them talking around the place?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. In handling them?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Capt. HANSON. Well, it has been stated by certain people and through the press that certain Americans in Mexico and along the border have been active in inducing these people to come to this country for the purpose of exploiting them, robbing them, and have led them to believe that they would receive fabulous wages, etc. I will now ask you to make a statement as to what reason these people give for coming here, and whether they claim or state that anyone brought them over or importuned them to come, and, in substance, state what they told you in reference to this matter.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, I have heard them say that conditions were bad down there; they don't make any wages, I have heard them talk—they make 2 bits a day and 3 pecks of corn, those are the only wages they got, and half the time they don't give them any meat or hardly anything to eat, and the conditions are so they couldn't plant; if they did raise a crop, why, somebody would come and take it from them.

Capt. HANSON. Well, who would take it away from them?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, they didn't say who, but some one would come around and knock them out of it; they couldn't make anything, couldn't make a living.

Capt. HANSON. Did you hear them state as to the condition of their families and children and the condition of the poor people in their country, as to clothing?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, they said clothing was very hard to get, couldn't hardly get any clothing.

Capt. HANSON. And their children are naked?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, some are naked that I have seen come from there—that is, that I have seen here in San Antonio.

Capt. HANSON. Did they tell you how they got over the river?

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. You don't know anything about that?

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir.

Capt. HANSON. You never did hear any of them claim that they were brought over here by Americans or Mexicans from this side of the river, did you?

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir.

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 8, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., April 8, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM STRAUBE.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your name?

Mr. STRAUBE. William Straube.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. STRAUBE. Downers Grove, Ill.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Native born?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your occupation?

Mr. STRAUBE. I call myself a constructive pioneer; primarily a farmer.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what extent have you been engaged in business in Mexico?

Mr. STRAUBE. I went there first in 1898 on a tour of inspection. I was in business at that time manufacturing the Straube pianos. I subsequently sold that out in March, 1902, and went down there to make investments.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you happen to go to Mexico?

Mr. STRAUBE. It is a long story. It starts back when I was going to Catholic school, when a Catholic priest told us some fairy stories about Mexico, and the pictures I saw in my geography always had a sort of alluring effect on me, and I remembered it, and when I was at leisure I took the notion to go to Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You went down there and found those alluring pictures were not overdrawn?

Mr. STRAUBE. No, sir; the ones the Catholic priest told us of, yes; but the ones in the geography, no.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you do in Mexico then?

Mr. STRAUBE. Invested in lands.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what extent and where?

Mr. STRAUBE. Myself and two others first bought the Pacheco estate, at Motogrongo, in the State of Vera Cruz. We bought the Pacheco estate, which consisted of 165,000 acres, and we paid $300,000 in gold for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What else did you buy?

Mr. STRAUBE. I bought the Cerro Majarro plantation. I did that individually and paid $275,000 Mex. I afterward bought San Pablo at Omealto from Juan Sentias. I paid 107,000 pesos for that. I developed that and lived on it for about nine years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you been pretty much over the whole country of Mexico?

Mr. STRAUBE. Not thoroughly; only passing through it in that particular section.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what state were these places located?

Mr. STRAUBE. Two of them were in the State of Vera Cruz, and Cerro Majarro was in the State of Oaxaca.

Mr. KEARFUL. You lived in the city of Vera Cruz?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you in the course of your operations come in contact with Mexican officials and Mexican people generally?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were you treated by them while you were there?

Mr. STRAUBE. Absolutely fair.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was between what dates?

Mr. STRAUBE. From 1902 until June, 1911.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of operations did you conduct in those places?

Mr. STRAUBE. I started the planting of sugar cane for the Moto-grongo Co., and stayed there about six months. Then I moved over to San Pablo and lived there the rest of the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of operations did you conduct there?

Mr. STRAUBE. I would call it a general hacienda business. It consisted of planting and renting and loaning money and buying crops from my tenants.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any concessions from the Mexican Government under which you were operating?

Mr. STRAUBE. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any other American citizens who were operating in Mexico during the time you were there?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they operate under concessions that gave them special privileges there over other foreigners or natives?

Mr. STRAUBE. Not that I ever heard of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Perhaps you have heard stated, as we have often, that American citizens in Mexico were engaged in exploiting the Mexican people under special concessions which they obtained by fraud from the Mexican Government?

Mr. STRAUBE. I have heard so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any truth in that at all?

Mr. STRAUBE. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. What kind of people were the American citizens with whom you came in contact in Mexico? Were they law-abiding and peaceful and decent people, or otherwise?

Mr. STRAUBE. The fact is I did not meet very many Americans. I was in rather an isolated place most of the time. In the towns of Orizaba and Cordoba there were very few Americans. The Americans I did meet I considered representative American citizens.

Mr. KEARFUL. High class people, were they?

Mr. STRAUBE. Fairly so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they compare favorably with citizens whom you met in this country?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe the effect upon Mexicans and upon their mode of living by the operations of the Americans or other foreigners in Mexico?

Mr. STRAUBE. Only in those who were under my jurisdiction.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were they affected there?

Mr. STRAUBE. They would buy better clothing. They would buy shoes. In fact, they would buy anything that they could buy on credit from me. They wore better clothes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about wages? Were the wages increased or diminished by reason of the foreign operations?

Mr. STRAUBE. In Motogrongo they were increased. In my place I made them conform with those of my neighbors, who were Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. What wages were prevailing at that time?

Mr. STRAUBE. Five reals.

Mr. KEARFUL. That would be how much?

Mr. STRAUBE. Sixty-two cents Mexican.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that the prevailing wage throughout the entire period while you were there was about that?

Mr. STRAUBE. Pretty much, yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any troubles at all before you left Mexico?

Mr. STRAUBE. Never.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were not there under the Huerta government?

Mr. STRAUBE. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any interests in Mexico now?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir. I have a mortgage due me from a Mexican who bought my plantation.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the only interest you have?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are not operating at all in Mexico?

Mr. STRAUBE. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you have not since 1911?

Mr. STRAUBE. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you been there since that time?

Mr. STRAUBE. I was there in 1912.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of the country then compared with what it had been during the years you were there?

Mr. STRAUBE. It was more unsettled.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any information now as to conditions since that time?

Mr. STRAUBE. I have. Occasionally I hear from my representative there who has my power of attorney and acts for me.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the nature of the reports you get from him about the conditions in the country?

Mr. STRAUBE. At times he states that business seems to be improving, and other times it seems to be demoralized.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you keep in touch with it because of your mortgage interest in the place you sold?

Mr. STRAUBE. And friendship as well.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what is the demoralization due that you hear about?

Mr. STRAUBE. I hear that so far as it affects the man who bought my plantation, they tell me he has had a great deal of trouble with the constant changes of authorities and that he is obliged to pay tribute for safe conduct of his products, so that he is not able to pay me any money, either principal or interest, that is due me. The government taxes his output so that his profits are very small.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you cease receiving interest upon your mortgage?

Mr. STRAUBE. January, 1912.

Mr. KEARFUL. Since that time the reasons given for not paying interest have been the unsettled condition of the country?

Mr. STRAUBE. That and the moratorium.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you mean by that?

Mr. STRAUBE. The law protects them: that is, to the extent that it would be impossible to foreclose or force collection.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the debtor is taking advantage of that and failing to pay although he is able to do so?

Mr. STRAUBE. No; I would hardly say that.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think then that he is not able to pay because of the unsettled conditions?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you made investigations so as to be able to state whether those reports are true or not?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes; from hearsay.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are satisfied then that conditions are such that he is unable to pay the interest?

Mr. STRAUBE. That and the fact that I could not compel him to because of the moratorium, although he tendered payment for the entire indebtedness and interest in 1915 when the currency was almost worthless.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the paper money which was issued by Carranza?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes; but the fact that my document was dated previous to 1913 was the saving clause and I was not compelled to accept it.

Mr. KEARFUL. The debt was payable in the money current at the time it was created?

Mr. STRAUBE. At the time the document was dated.

Mr. KEARFUL. In connection with your interests in Mexico have you satisfied yourself as to whether the conditions are improving or not?

Mr. STRAUBE. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have not investigated that enough to say?

Mr. STRAUBE. Only what I read and know through letters that I received from my friends down there makes me believe they are unsettled.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are the letters that you receive optimistic as to the future of Mexico?

Mr. STRAUBE. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the general tenor of them?

Mr. STRAUBE. Some of them state that unless the United States intervenes in some form or other, they never will improve?

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your own opinion about that? Do you believe that?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you see enough of the disorders while you were still there on which you could base an opinion that the Mexicans are unable to control the situation themselves?

Mr. STRAUBE. I would think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was it that induced that belief in your mind?

Mr. STRAUBE. The way Madero handled affairs from the time he became President until the time I left, and the different decrees that he issued. They did not seem to be for the benefit of the people, but more for the benefit of Madero and his immediate friends.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling of the people generally after Madero had been in office awhile as to whether he was a success or not?

Mr. STRAUBE. There was a lack of confidence.

Mr. KEARFUL. A general lack of confidence in Madero?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did that constantly grow?

Mr. STRAUBE. It seemed to.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that the reason you sold?

Mr. STRAUBE. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think intervention is the only solution?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What form do you think that ought to take?

Mr. STRAUBE. My idea would be about the same as in Cuba, to stabilize the government for them and let them run it the same as we did in Cuba.

Mr. KEARFUL. Keeping a fatherly hand on it?

Mr. STRAUBE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any further statement you wish to make in regard to the matter?

Mr. STRAUBE. Nothing that I can think of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well; thank you. That is all.

(Witness excused.)

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES M. BURNETT.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you state your full name?

Mr. BURNETT. Charles M. Burnett.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. BURNETT. Trilby, Fla.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Mr. BURNETT. I am a farmer-preacher. I have a little farm down there, but I am a Baptist pastor.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you a native-born American citizen?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you ever been engaged in business or lived in Mexico?

Mr. BURNETT. I was farming there and fruit raising for six years.

Mr. KEARFUL. During what period?

Mr. BURNETT. From the fall of 1908 to the spring of 1914, very nearly six years.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what place?

Mr. BURNETT. At Medina.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the name of a colony of Americans?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what State?

Mr. BURNETT. Oaxaca.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you there at the beginning of this colony?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir, I was not there until perhaps two years after this company took charge of the land, but we were the first family there; I was the first man with a family to go there. There were some bachelors there who had been there for two years when we went there.

Mr. KEARFUL. About how many acres were embraced in the lands of this colony?

Mr. BURNETT. About 58,000, I believe, in the three tracts that they had, lot 1, lot 2, and lot 3. There were the two agricultural land companies, of Peoria, Ill., and Norman, Okla.

Mr. KEARFUL. About how many American colonists finally settled in this place?

Mr. BURNETT. During the six years after the first few months we had about an average of 80 in the colony, old and young, 15 to 20 families. It was during four years of revolution so there were some people coming and going, but it was an average of about 80.

Mr. KEARFUL. What kind of people were those colonists?

Mr. BURNETT. They were nearly all foreigners from almost all the States. Principally Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, and Illinois were the States very largely represented, although there were some from Oregon and Washington, and one from Idaho.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they a fair class of American citizens?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of the farming class?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they own their own places?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir, they had not a renter. One man rented a little while, but he had his own place before very long. They all owned their own places and had them improved.

Mr. KEARFUL. They had their wives and children there?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. We considered that they would average with the people in almost any place we ever lived, not so many, but putting the company together they were a good average of any place we ever lived before or since, in intelligence and sociability and all that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they law-abiding and peaceable?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. There never was a person in the colony that I can remember of that had any trouble there among themselves or with the natives.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they buy and pay for the land and receive the title?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they pay their taxes?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And their debts?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they have a school?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. By whom was it maintained?

Mr. BURNETT. By the American people themselves. We built our own schoolhouse.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without assistance from the Mexican authorities?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; without any assistance whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you hire your own teacher?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. I had Sunday school at that time every Sunday, which was voluntary on my part of course.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you the pastor?

Mr. BURNETT. We had no organization. I did preach and superintend the Sunday school. We had Sunday school every Sunday and preaching every Sunday night, always fairly well attended.

Mr. KEARFUL. What agricultural products were raised on those places?

Mr. BURNETT. First of all we raised corn. That was the first thing to plant after clearing the land. Everybody on their first clearing put out corn.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of the land when you first went there?

Mr. BURNETT. A thick jungle, mostly of bamboo brush, that you could not go through a rod without cutting your way through.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was done by way of improvements by the colonists?

Mr. BURNETT. Every one had built his own house and had made his own clearing and was working his place to improve it, just like he would in this country.

In answer to that other question, if you want it more fully, we were not dependent on our corn for principal crop. That is the first thing we planted. Then our para grass, our money crop, was the primary crop. That was proven to be a great success. We knew what we were doing with that. We all had our citrus fruits; everybody had his orchard, but we did not try to find any market. We had proven what we could do, but nobody tried to market anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. About what size farms did the colonists have?

Mr. BURNETT. That depended on what a man was starting to do. Some of them, like Dr. Manly, who will testify for himself, had the object of establishing a ranch. His first crop was corn, like ours, so he had two or three hundred acres sowed to para grass. Those of us that were going to raise pineapples needed a smaller acreage for that. A few acres of that went a good ways.

Mr. KEARFUL. How large was your place?

Mr. BURNETT. I had 10 acres up near town that I had bought and set to citrus fruit, and between that was putting out pineapples on my larger tract 6 miles out where I had 40 acres that had been planted to corn and then set to para grass.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did those colonists have agricultural implements and stock of all kinds?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; all of our implements came from the United States, and our harness came from the United States. We bought native horses and mules and broke them and taught our Mexican help how to harness them. He turned the collar the wrong way on a mule; they never saw one harnessed before. We had to get all the implements from the United States. They did not have them there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in any wise engaged in exploiting the Mexican people, or oppressing the Mexican people, or did you hear it stated that Americans were doing so in Mexico?

Mr. BURNETT. Only in this way, that we paid them double what they would pay one another. We had men working for us that we paid double what they would pay the other fellow if they worked for them, and they were very, very glad to work for us. If they did not want to work there was no way of forcing them and we never tried to. We always had all the labor we wanted. We paid labor just the same that the railroad did when it was put through their several years before, and from the very beginning we paid the same wages that they were paying, which was double what the Mexicans paid one another for work.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did the American operations have upon the Mexicans and their mode of living?

Mr. BURNETT. Men that had never seen a horse or a plow used in the field, before we left were borrowing our plows and putting some of our harness on their horses and were plowing their corn. They never had done the like before. At least three Mexicans had bought American wagons, which were a novelty in that country before our colony started. We hitched two horses to them, and they had bought three of those, and that was a good deal for them to be doing. Some of them had bought land of the company and had really their own home, which was a new thing. They never had known what it was to have a small tract of land, and they had put out their own fruit and they had a pride that no Mexican had who had not owned his own home. It made better citizens of them in every way.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say they learned that from the American colonists?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; some of the young men that worked for our people learned how to do things like American citizens, and learned to talk English, and very good, very proud of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the relations between the American colonists and the native Mexicans?

Mr. BURNETT. I can illustrate that better by telling the closing scene when we left the neighborhood. It will be in order to tell it right now. When we were lined up ready to leave, our Mexican women shed more tears over our women going than I ever saw shed when families were being divided here. They threw their arms around their necks and cried. As their head men were shaking hands with us, tears were running down their cheeks. They felt that friends were leaving, and there was not one of them but what was a friend of ours, even after Vera Cruz had been occupied. We had nothing to fear from the Mexicans that lived in our community. All we feared then was straggling people and bandits, but our immediate Mexican neighbors that we lived among were friends right up to the very last.

Mr. KEARFUL. You went there first in the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; we went there when the Government was really inviting or bidding for Americans to come. On my first trip, I brought Fitzgerald's Guide to Mexico, in which the president was really throwing out inducements and inviting Americans to come and invest. It was part of his policy.

Mr. KEARFUL. To develop the resources of the country?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you hear of any objections made by this Government to American citizens going there to develop Mexico?

Mr. BURNETT. I never heard any objection to it whatever in any way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there ever any intimation that Americans would not receive protection there?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir. We really had every reason to suppose, up until the very last, that we would be protected in case any protection was needed. We never suspicioned but what we would be protected.

In passing from the other answer, do you care for any proof about the feeling of the administration at the time I went there regarding the Americans going there?

Mr. KEARFUL. I should like to have a statement from you about that.

Mr. BURNETT. Here is a publication gotten out by Fitzgerald. In that they were trying to get Americans to go there by showing up the natural resources and possibilities of the country and bidding for Americans to go there and settle. I read that on my first trip down, and also I met Fitzgerald.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was Fitzgerald?

Mr. BURNETT. He was an American, and he was living in Mexico City. I do not know how long he had been there. He published three editions of that book. In looking through that you will find that it is bidding in as strong language as anybody could for Americans to develop the resources of that tropical country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you understand that this book was gotten out under the auspices of the Mexican Government?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. You will find on the first leaf that that was started by them—that is, while the first edition was not printed by the Government, the Government was furnishing expenses of having it published.

Mr. KEARFUL. The title page states that it is published by the Mexican Government under the direction of Hon. E. Aldesoro, acting secretary of Fomento, by order of Gen. Porfirio Diaz, President of the Republic of Mexico. Was this book pretty generally circulated in the United States?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; and especially among any one that was going down with any view of doing anything. I had one on my first trip, and there were three editions already put out.

Mr. KEARFUL. This seems to have been published in 1906?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. The first trip down was in the very close of 1906. The book holds out every inducement possible and every encouragement possible for Americans to invest in land in Mexico and develop the resources. That had more to do in deciding me than anything else. Just at present I can not turn to the particular pages there because I have not read the book for a good while, but I read it over carefully when it was first put out.

I do not want to be understood that there was any concession or anything like that from the President of Mexico or the Government of Mexico. There was nothing like that. Our people bought their land right out and paid for it just like they would pay for it here.

Mr. KEARFUL. You and your neighbors had no concessions from the Mexican authorities that gave you special privileges over other people?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; not in any way, and we never had any clash or any trouble in any way with the authorities and they had no reason to complain of our being there during the six years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not this publication was approved by the authorities of this Government?

Mr. BURNETT. Of course, I do not know about that, but I never heard any hint whatever to the contrary. I had read that and owned my land two years before I went to it. I was living in Oklahoma the rest of the time, and other people were going down and buying, and I never heard a word of any protest whatever. I talked occasionally with the American consul at Vera Cruz, and I never had any hints from him that there was any objection from this country regarding our being there at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was the first intimation you had from the authorities in this country that you had no business there?

Mr. BURNETT. We did not know much about that until we were going out and after we got out, but some things that did not sound just right to us were statements that we had heard to the effect that while American lives abroad would be protected, yet not a life would be sacrificed to protect property in foreign countries, or something to that effect. We heard of statements like that being made. Then when we were leaving we had a conviction that we were not being protected as well as subjects of other countries were being protected.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for that?

Mr. BURNETT. We realized that the Mexican people were not having the respect for this Government that they had for others.

Mr. KEARFUL. What grounds had they for that feeling?

Mr. BURNETT. The watchful waiting policy.

Mr. KEARFUL. You heard them talk about it, I suppose? What did they have to say about the actions of this Government toward them and their country?

Mr. BURNETT. The papers that we read, the Mexican papers, seemed to feel it was a little bit of a joke. Things that this country were stating they did not like, because we were hearing occasionally that if the Mexican Government would do certain things it would be displeasing to this country, and they would go on and do them and that was the last of it. After awhile there would be another statement that certain other things would be displeasing to this country, and then they would go on and do them again, so that it became rather a standing joke that they could do as they pleased with this country; that this country would not call them to time for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before you left Mexico did you have any troubles with the Mexicans?

Mr. BURNETT. None whatever, until after the landing of the troops at Vera Cruz. We lived there throughout four years of revolution, and it was very common to hear of notices saying, "You have nothing to fear; you Americans have nothing to fear." They were afraid of being forced into the Federal army, if the Federal army was in control, or into the rebel ranks if the rebels were in control, but we being foreigners were not supposed to be bothered either way, and we were not bothered until the landing of the troops at Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke about the revolution. That was the beginning of the Madero revolution, and up to the time of the landing of the troops in Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; four years. We lived there during that four years of revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. Prior to that time and in the time of Diaz what was the condition as to security for life and property?

Mr. BURNETT. It was a common saying that if a man wanted to commit any crime, he had better commit it in the United States than commit it in Mexico; that he was sure of punishment there and severe punishment. We had nothing to fear. We never even locked our houses. We never had anything stolen, so far as I know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of travel?

Mr. BURNETT. They hardly knew what roads were. There was not a wagon road in that part of the country. They would go horse-back. We had roads all over our colony, but we could not go out of the colony in a wagon.

Mr. KEARFUL. I meant as to feeling secure in travel.

Mr. BURNETT. Until a way along in the war a person could travel anywhere and be perfectly safe. We had nothing to fear in traveling and going among strangers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there any districts infested with bandits during the time of Diaz that you know of?

Mr. BURNETT. I think not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did any of that sort of thing occur before you left there?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what extent?

Mr. BURNETT. To a very large extent. Of course, during the Madero revolution we were not in the part that was having so much fighting. We were more in the district that Zapata's rebels were occupying, and yet they would only be in our part of the country to gather up recruits, and we had nothing special to fear from them. They came to our town occasionally.

One morning our people got up and found something like 100 men on horses in the streets watching for people to get up, and they robbed the depot and two or three trains that came in that day. They considered that as government property and they had the right to it; but Americans, members of our colony, stood back and saw what they were doing. They also allowed the Americans to take kodak pictures of them, pictures showing some of our Americans in their picture also. They paid no attention to anything of that sort. There was no trouble between them and our Americans at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those were Zapatistas, you say?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; more especially, but all of them at that time were claiming to be looking to Madero, all the revolutionists then, and that was before Madero was at the head. While he was really at the head of the revolution, yet Zapata was the leader.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those people claimed to be followers of Madero and rebels against Diaz?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. That was at the beginning of 1910.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your first troubles begin?

Mr. BURNETT. Really we did not have any trouble until the landing of the American troops at Vera Cruz. We stayed at our homes and went on with our work just as we always had. Some of our Americans had saddle horses taken from them, and they would ride them until they got tired and then turn them loose, and in some cases send them word where they had turned them loose. There never was but one horse that stayed away, and an officer took that. It was a good horse and he kept it. A few lost their guns, but that was all. They were the only losses Americans had until the time of our leaving.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened at the time you left the country?

Mr. BURNETT. In how much detail do you want that?

Mr. KEARFUL. Just as it occurs to you as it was impressed upon your mind, so we can get a picture of it.

Mr. BURNETT. The superintendent of the company received word from his wife and son, who were at Vera Cruz, of the serious condition and the insulting of the flag at Tampico and the fleet that was coming. Of course news was being kept down, and if it had not been for that we would not have known about it.

We called the colony together Sunday afternoon. That was the 20th of April. We said we had no right to keep those facts secret and not let the people know the condition, and we read the letter that had come and told them just how conditions stood.

Mrs. Miles was urging us all to come. We said a woman might not realize like a man what it would mean for us all to leave our homes, and every one decided to stay until they had additional word. Mr. Miles went down on Monday. Sunday was the 19th and he went down on Monday the 20th. He was to notify us of the condition.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is, he went down to Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, where his wife and son were. He wrote a letter back, and if you wanted it it could be put in as a part of my testimony, but the substance was that he gave us conditions that you people here all knew about, that we had not been hearing, but the consul at the time the train left, which was eight something, refused to give any order to us to leave until after he had opened his morning mail, which was 8 or 8.30 or something like that. That was at that hour in the morning before the troops landed about 10.30, and yet the consul would not give any instructions for us to come out.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for that?

Mr. BURNETT. He knew of no special reason at that time for giving that order.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean that he did not know that troops were going to be landed?

Mr. BURNETT. No; he knew nothing about that at about 8 or 8.30 in the morning before they landed at ten something.

Mr. KEARFUL. What notice did you get to get out of the country before that time?

Mr. BURNETT. Along in the fall, perhaps October before this, we had the notice that was given to the consuls for them to deliver to the Americans for us all to leave our property in the hands of the consuls and to leave the country at once. That was it in substance. I have not a copy of it here. I did have a copy of that order.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason given for the order, if any?

Mr. BURNETT. The reason was not given. We considered that the order that was given like that ought to have meant that intervention was going to follow. That is what everybody really considered.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was no interpretation you could put upon it?
Mr. BURNETT. That is about the only one. I have a statement here that was sent at the time we were leaving. I do not think I have the notice. I am sure that it could be procured.

Mr. KEARFUL. This notice you say was given in the fall of 1913?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the impression created was that intervention was imminent?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You could find no other reason for such a notice being given?

Mr. BURNETT. We could find no reason for our leaving unless intervention was coming. We did not leave, and something like 10 days or two weeks afterwards we had the statement sent out that the Government did not mean by that for us to abandon all we had at a sacrifice, but the interpretation was that as soon as it was convenient to do so, as soon as we could straighten our affairs, we should get to a safer place. That was not the way we interpreted the message when we received it.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was inconsistent with the first message?

Mr. BURNETT. It was entirely opposite, and to be plain about it, that caused some of us to smile when we read it, and others as well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Some of them did more than smile, did they not?

Mr. BURNETT. They might have done more if they had had an opportunity, but that is all we could do.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were a minister and perhaps they did not swear in your presence?

Mr. BURNETT. Our people were not all swearing people anyway, but we were not real well pleased, and that is putting it mildly.

Mr. KEARFUL. What events were happening in Mexico at the time this first order was received that seemed to be a ground for interference in Mexico by this Government?

Mr. BURNETT. The conditions were getting pretty bad, and our Government was taking a stand against what we Americans that lived in Mexico thought was the last chance of the Mexican people to ever bring about a stable government. We believed that Huerta government was the last chance Mexico had, and this Government was taking a positive stand against the Huerta government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive protection to life and property under Huerta?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. At one time they had about 20 soldiers stationed there simply to give us protection, and they did everything we asked them to do to give us protection.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any looting or robbing of your property during the time of Huerta, up to the landing of troops at Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. We never lost anything. Usually the corn pens were out of sight of every house and unlocked, and never could we see that any corn was missing. We never lost any horses or cattle.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the policy of the American Government in regard to Huerta as it was understood by you?

Mr. BURNETT. It was that they had positively refused to recognize him, and it seemed to us that they were determined to put him down. That is the way it seemed to us at that distance. It looked that way, that they were taking a positive stand against the Huerta government, but we considered it was the last chance that Mexico had to bring about a settlement of their troubles.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean the American Government was losing a chance?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; the Huerta Government was to lose the chance. As a man we did not consider that he was anywhere near an angel, but we considered that Mexico needed a good strong hand at that time, and it seemed that Huerta was that kind, and as far as we could see was respecting the rights of the people, and we felt that we had had, just as the people in general had had, justice from him.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the general feeling in Mexico as to the probability of Huerta being successful except for the attitude of this Government?

Mr. BURNETT. We felt he would have brought about peace even if this country had remained neutral and taken no stand. With their help, there is no question in my mind that he would have brought about peace. So far as I ever heard, that was the opinion of every American in Mexico that I heard express themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the opinion of Mexicans generally, intelligent Mexicans, who were capable of having opinions?

Mr. BURNETT. That is hard to answer. At the time Huerta went in he had a very strong influence on his side. Of course, Carranza was up in the north and Zapata we always had with us; he was in the south, but neither one had any strength at the beginning, and I think that, recognizing Huerta, they never would have gained much strength.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they would have had any strength if they had not been supported in this country?

Mr. BURNETT. Without saying how much support they were getting, cutting off the financial support of the established government under Huerta was helping the side, and if they had been left entirely alone I believe Huerta would have handled the situation without any outside help if he could have been left free to do it without having his resources curtailed by other people.

Mr. KEARFUL. The taking of Vera Cruz had some effect?

Mr. BURNETT. That was the only reason for taking Vera Cruz. It was Huerta's greatest source of revenue. They had refused to loan money and all that, which they had a right to do, but the legitimate income from Vera Cruz was keeping him going, and the taking of Vera Cruz was cutting that off. That was the final blow, as we thought.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed now and relate your further experience at that time?

Mr. BURNETT. On this Tuesday morning, the 21st, before we had our letters—of course, there was an operator there at our station giving the news all the time from Vera Cruz. We had a man that was a telegraph operator, who understood Mexican, that sat right by the operator all day long. We had all the news that was going over the wire. It was not all truthful news but we realized the condition before we got any word through from our man in Vera Cruz that our troops had landed at Vera Cruz, and there had been firing—exaggerated reports, of course. It is not necessary to tell the rumors that were broadcast. This country perhaps would have exaggerated, too, when they had a two fold object. The Mexicans exaggerated to arouse their people so they would enlist under the banner of their country to meet the enemy, and so they exaggerated conditions at Vera Cruz, but we knew they were very critical before we had heard.

The first word was that the consul refused to give any orders until he opened his mail, and in that hour and a half or two hours troops had landed and we had a dispatch that made it necessary to leave. We got that late in the evening of Tuesday, and we planned to leave Wednesday morning.

We spent the night packing our trunks and grips, ready to take the train for Vera Cruz. Then we heard Wednesday morning, just about starting time, that the track had been torn up out of Vera Cruz, and that we could not reach Vera Cruz, and we preferred staying among Mexicans whom we knew, rather than to leave home and be among strange Mexicans. So we stayed there until Friday. Most of our people had gone into the hotel, and were staying there. Two or three families of us, mine among them, stayed in their homes until Friday.

We were expecting that the American army would rebuild that track and come out for us. They knew where we were, and we supposed they were coming immediately to the interior. All those days troop train after troop train went through, going to the mountains. They had taken most of them out of three or four States south of us, and were taking them toward Mexico City, really abandoning all those tropical States, thinking that American troops would soon be coming in, and they were turning that country over to them.

On Friday I was out at my place and my wife was in town, and when I came in I found a number of men there and found that they had taken charge of the Americans that were there at the station, had taken their guns and kind of herded them there together, and as different ones of us came in they would take our guns and put us over there with the others. We had better judgment than to show any fight. There were 30 of them, and we were coming in 1 or 2 at a time, and we had no way of knowing what was going on. We had appealed to the Mexican Government to send us a guard to protect us from bandits. We did not know but what the Mexican Government had sent them, and we did not know whether they were bandits. They wore no uniform at all.

After we came in, all except a few, they sent men out to bring them in, and then they had all our guns. They opened all of our trunks and grips to see whether we had any more guns or ammunition that was put away.

After our women had cooked a good meal and offered dinner to the soldiers, they said they did not need anything. We saw by that that they were afraid there was some poison in the food, and then we began to wonder what kind of people they were that thought we wanted to poison them. So we sat down and ate a very hearty meal, with about 12 men standing over the table with rifles watching us.

Up to that time they had been very quiet. As we came out on the porch they were through searching the trunks, and the leader gave instructions to line up. One of his men did not move quickly enough and he slapped him in the face. He jerked our men into line. He lined us up in the street and took us from the hotel and lined us up in such a way that when we faced the street our backs were to a garden. He took one man and shoved him up against my back, and then followed suit with two more men. Putting us about four or five steps apart, he would take one of his men by the shoulder and straighten him around so he was in good line with myself and the man behind me, and then another one in front of the next two. In this way he had one soldier with a rifle in front of every pair of men, and then he ordered the rest of the men to stand off at one side. He stood up there then and stated that he was going to shoot us down like dogs. We could not tell how long it was. It seemed a long time. It might have been a minute or it might have been 10 minutes. It seemed, though, quite a while. Then we were ordered to line up and march back. The men went single handed. We did not carry a thing.

After half an hour our women, who had collected the grips, gathered the grips together and their little packages so if they had any chance to leave they could carry them. Under another escort they were marched over to the station and all that we took out of Mexico was carried by the women and children on that one trip to the depot. Our trunks are still in Mexico, with their contents and everything else. Our teams were left there tied to the hitching rack.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean your trunks are left in some safe place?

Mr. BURNETT. They were left at the hotel, part of them, and part of them were left at the depot. Months later, when our first people went back, the trunks were still there, but when they later had to leave and go to Vera Cruz the trunks had been looted of everything of any value. We never got any of them or anything that was in them.

We were put on a flat car—the men were. The women were put in a coal car on a wrecking train, and then we were all taken up the line. The men were first unloaded and, midst the jeers of a great crowd, we were marched through the streets and taken to a guard-house. About half or three-quarters of an hour later we heard the women and children coming. We supposed perhaps the train was going to take them on to some other station. They brought them in and put them in another room, and we were just sitting there and expecting every moment that they were going to give us some kind of a trial. They did not even inform us that we would stay there all night. We stayed there all night and we stayed there the next day and the next night and until the following day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have food and accommodations?

Mr. BURNETT. We had food when we paid for it. They allowed some Mexican women to come to the windows and we would order some food and pay for it. We had plenty up until Sunday.

Before our dinner came we were ordered to line up and were marched to the train, and then sent up to Cordova to the military prison and were put in the military prison. We had nothing to eat from Sunday morning until in the afternoon of Monday in the military prison. We left there Monday night.

At that time they had found that it was not intervention that the United States was talking with the Mexican Government with a view of settling their differences. Then the authorities agreed to send us to Vera Cruz. We, with Americans that lived in the town, made a company of over 200 that were crowded into one coach and started off toward Vera Cruz. We went as far as the place the Mexican troops sought that were driven out of Vera Cruz—

Mr. KEARFUL. Soledad?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. We were left in the car all night. The next morning we were told that we could get out on the sidewalk, and the next thing we knew they had filled the coach with soldiers and had reversed the engine and were riding straight back up the mountains. We asked what he meant. He said it was not safe to go any further. That was 25 miles from Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you given accommodations in Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. Only as we would find Mexicans that would bring us something. We still had some money. We had accommodations. When the officials found they were charging us too much, they put a stop to it and caused the natives to sell us food reasonably.

We were just there until a little after noon. The agent said that it would be necessary to send us to Mexico City. He had no instructions about us. We were left without instructions, and they had sent them to Mexico City. We told him we wanted to go the other way and he said he could not send us the other way.

About 11 or 12 o'clock, unexpectedly a train came in from Mexico City and there were two British officers and two British marines in the car. They had been to Mexico City to try to get permission from Huerta to guard that strip of line where the track was torn up, so that refugees could go, and they refused to grant permission and refused to let him take any Americans out of the city, but he took us all in and took us to the end of the track.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he represent that you were British subjects in order to get that permission?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; he did not at all, and we did not deny our nationality. We were known to be Americans. I do not know what he did. He said he would see what he could do for us, but it was not half an hour until he took us on. Perhaps he got permission from the agent, because they wanted to get us off their hands after they found it was not a matter of intervention.

We found later that we had been prisoners of war, but we did not know what we were until that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the name of the Huerta military commander at Soledad?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know. The main part of the army had moved the day before. It was only a remnant there, so there was really no officer in charge at Soledad.

When we reached the end of the track, the marine went ahead with a white flag, behind him 100 yards was a British officer with a British flag, then 200 people strung out along the torn-up railroad, with an officer behind with a British flag. We traveled the 2 miles we were supposed to travel, and found no train at the end of the track and we walked 4 miles farther, which was 6 miles we walked in the heat of the day in a tropical sun in the hottest month of the year in that country. Then we came in sight of the outposts of the American Army and saw the United States flag. If we had had a flag before that we would have hidden it or burned it to get it out of sight, but it looked mighty good when we saw it over on that side of no man's land.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you think it looked good in Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. Splendid. It looked fine up on top of those grand sand dunes, too.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did it occur to you at the time that all your troubles were caused by the bringing of the flag into Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. They could not feel about it just then like we did afterwards, because we felt afterwards that it would go on and do what we considered it ought to do. We did not know at that time what it was going to do.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not know at that time that it was going to stop at Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. It was being suspicioned, and we actually heard soldiers say that if it did they would be ashamed, and would be ashamed to look other nationalities in the face if it went back.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that generally the feeling among Americans and American soldiers?

Mr. BURNETT. Pretty generally.

Mr. KEARFUL. The soldiers themselves felt that way, did they?

Mr. BURNETT. Surely; but to us it looked pretty good. It meant safety, and our troubles were seemingly at an end. We had everything we wanted to eat just in a little while after we came up to the outposts. They fed us, and they had already signaled the city for a train. We were through eating by the time it came, and we actually were picked up and put on the train by the marines that were acting as porters and that were swarming around there like bees. They led us on to the end, and we were well cared for from that time on and had no complaint whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you get out of Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. Before we reached the city we had all signed cards, giving our names, where we were from, and where we wanted to go in the States. When we reached Vera Cruz, we stepped off the train, and the first thing we heard was the Mexican newsboys calling out the Mexico City Herald in good English. The depot man was an American post-office man, and the American flag was on almost every building. There were American mules hitched to American wagons, and everything like that all over town.

We were taken immediately to the ship that was to take us across and were given our quarters and well cared for from that time on. About the 1st or 2d of May we started for New Orleans, and then were sent to our destination in the United States after we reached there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have good accommodations on the ship?

Mr. BURNETT. Good enough; yes, sir; plenty to eat; and, if no other place, a good place on the deck to lie down and sleep, and we enjoyed it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you well received at New Orleans?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you then went to your own homes?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was your passage paid?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; our passage was paid and as we passed from one desk to another we stated the amount of money that we had and without asking any other questions if they saw we had plenty to pay for our meals to destination we just received the passage. If they saw that we had not enough we were given enough money to give us our meals until we reached destination.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive first-class passage on the ship from Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. There was no first and no second.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was all one?

Mr. BURNETT. One thing we enjoyed, some of us, was when people would throw out their money and say, "Here, I want so and so," they would reply, "The United States is running this vessel. 'Tips don't go here.'" We were all treated the same. We all had the same food. Some ate up in the dining room that had fine furniture and fine dishes, but they had exactly the same food that we had at our long table where it was put on farmer style. Soon the first-class fellows were down eating with us. We had every reason to be proud of the way the Government treated us in bringing us across, and every one was cared for alike. There was no complaint, and no complaint about treatment when we reached the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever go back?

Mr. BURNETT. To Mexico?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why not?

Mr. BURNETT. I was ready to go back for about three or four years just whenever conditions were in any wise safe at all, and a few times was ready to go until something else would break out down there worse than it was before. To us that was home. We liked to live there, we enjoyed living there, and everything we had in the world was there.

Mr. KEARFUL. In October, 1915, this Government recognized Carranza as head of the de facto government. Did you receive any assurance then that you would be protected if you went back, or were you invited to go back at that time?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; I do not think we were ever invited. Some of our people that had no families went down in the fall of 1914 and stayed awhile there, part of the time at Vera Cruz, and we kept hearing regularly from them, but the rebels were pretty active all through that time down there and finally they had to leave again. The conditions were very bad and have been ever since and are yet in that part of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have they been getting worse or better?

Mr. BURNETT. It is difficult to tell. If you are to judge by what you read—I am taking a paper that is published in English in Mexico City that would indicate that perfect peace prevails all over Mexico and that it is perfectly safe to go into any part of the country; but information from other sources would indicate that it is not at all safe to be in that part of the country yet.

Mr. KEARFUL. If you thought it was safe, would you go back there?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; because the savings of a lifetime are all there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do many of your neighbors feel the same way, and are they in the same condition?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. I only know of possibly two or three families in our colony that had anything left in the United States at all. Everything they had was down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are any of them there now?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have they all gone?

Mr. BURNETT. Every one left. We all had to leave.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of their property?

Mr. BURNETT. When we were leaving, the man that had charge, that took us away, said our property was all right and they would take care of it and look out for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was a Mexican officer?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; that was a Mexican officer. We did not know whether he was an outlaw or an official, but he turned us over to the Federal authorities, and later we were sent by him to the headquarters of the Mexican army at Cordova.

In response to what he said, they took charge, and about two days after we left, so we heard afterwards, they sent soldiers there to take charge of our houses and our property, and they shipped out all of our horses and cattle and wagons and everything that the army or the Government could make any use of. They stationed men there to take care of our crops and ship them out when they ripened.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get pay for any of those things?

Mr. BURNETT. Not a cent. We estimated that we had at least 75 acres of pineapples that were just beginning to ripen and we would have about 100 acres the next year. It takes two years for them to ripen, and we would have had 75 acres the first year and 100 acres the next year. We never had a cent from that or from any of our stock or anything that we left there at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. What efforts have you made to recover your property or to receive compensation for it?

Mr. BURNETT. This Government instructed us before we left there, through the American consul at Vera Cruz, to make out an invoice of the property that we were leaving and have it signed by two or three witnesses and to leave it with the consul at Vera Cruz, I think four copies, so that he could send one copy to Washington, keep one, send one copy to Mexico City, whenever a government was established there, and one to the governor of the State. I think that is where the fourth one went. That is all that we did until along in the fall or really in January. In following out the instructions of the Secretary of State a number of us filled out blanks like he instructed us to fill out, and have filed them with the Secretary of State.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the ordinary blank form provided for claims against a foreign Government?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; showing our reason for being in Mexico and our right there and what we had and what we abandoned, and the reason for abandoning it, and all the proof that it was possible for us to give. You have seen the form and know about what it is. We were to fix up three copies, and send two to the Secretary of State and keep one. This is the one copy that I have here.

Mr. KEARFUL. The only reason you could give for abandoning your property was that you were ordered out by the American authorities?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, hardly that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or the taking of Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. We did not leave because of any order. We left when we were led out by the Mexican authorities.

Mr. KEARFUL. Because American forces had taken Vera Cruz?

Mr. BURNETT. Surely that was the reason, when they thought it was intervention. Three days later I believe the American authorities would have let us remain in our homes, but when we reached Vera Cruz some of us were perfectly willing to stay there, hoping we could go back, but we had no choice in the matter at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. The American authorities made you go?

Mr. BURNETT. All except a few of our number that they enlisted in their service and kept there, that they could use as stenographers or guides. The rest of us had no choice. We had to go to the ships and leave, as the easiest way for them to handle us.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do know, do you not, that Americans in other parts of Mexico did go back to their properties, and were protected by Huerta as long as he held control?

Mr. BURNETT. He did not have control for so very long; in fact, conditions kept getting worse and worse. They were worse all over the country when the United States troops left Vera Cruz than they were when they landed, or worse than they ever had been before they landed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Vera Cruz was taken in April, and Huerta left in July?

Mr. BURNETT. That was not very long, and we had no choice in the matter. We had to leave. Even our wives were perfectly willing and wanted to stay at Vera Cruz, so we could go home in a few days, but we had no choice in the matter.

We were under instructions from this country, and were taken to the rescue ship and brought across, and had no permission to go back. Some of our people went back that fall, men that had no families, and even then they later said it was monotonous to have the train fired on every time they wanted to go anywhere, fired on by men in the bush, and that that was continually happening. It never has been safe in that neighborhood so far as we know, and Carranza has not had charge of that part of the country for a good long while. The rebels are holding that part of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. The State of Oaxaca has throughout the revolution maintained its independence, and has not recognized Carranza?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think they recognized him. They did not at the start. Then that is the home of Felix Diaz. He is somewhere in that State now. Our part of the country, it has been my understanding, has been in the hands of the rebels for a good long while.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that part of the country Carranza has no control?

Mr. BURNETT. That was the case as long as any of our people were going back and forth down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you definite information as to the conditions of those farms now?

Mr. BURNETT. I have not heard anything for two or three years, but for a time, as long as any of our people stayed at Vera Cruz, some single men, and men whose families were back here, and especially those that worked for the government—while they were there, they made their homes in Vera Cruz, but would go out occasionally, and the last I heard was that a Mexican whom they did not know at all was living in my house. No one was out to my place where my stock was left, and I do not know whether my stock was ever shipped out or was left in the jungle. They said, regarding the furniture and the implements—Mr. Miles, who was superintendent for the company, wrote me that there was just barely enough that they could gather up from every source to kind of "bach" with while they were there. They had no way of knowing who any of it belonged to. It had been sacked until there was just enough for four or five of those fellows to have enough to "bach" and get along with. Even in the hotel the furniture had been taken out, and everything that was of any value was taken; just enough here and there that by putting it all together they could kind of keep house and "bach" while they were there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have any of the colonists received any revenue from their places?

Mr. BURNETT. Not a cent. There was no revenue ever had.

Mr. KEARFUL. The places are not rented out?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are they occupied and worked at all by the Mexicans?

Mr. BURNETT. The houses, where they were fit to live in, the last we heard, were being occupied. I asked who it was that was living in my house, and the party wrote me that he did not know who it was; that it was someone that had come in. Most of the Mexicans that lived in that community when we were there were driven out by soldiers when they came. They did not care to have anybody there that had been very friendly to the Americans, and that made it hard for us to hear anything, and I have not had anything directly or indirectly for two or three years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what the condition of the fields is to-day?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; by what I observed before I left. My 10 acres, that was all set to either citrus fruit or mangoes, is less than a quarter from the railroad. In a year's time it would be grown up to weeds and vines and brush, and the first time the section men burn the right of way, if it was a dry spring, the fire would run right through it. That would mean death to the trees. If no fire went through, even then it would be crowded out by brush 10 feet high, and there would be nothing left of any value, because the ground is very fertile and they would grow in that way, but I am sure the fire has destroyed all the trees before now. There is no hope of anything else there.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you file that statement with the State Department to which you referred awhile ago?

Mr. BURNETT. That statement was filed in January, 1920. When I wrote the Secretary of State he looked over his records and said that he had the invoice of my property, which is the same as the invoice that I have here, which was filed with him, and he gave the date, in 1914, just about as soon as the consul could send it. It had been in his office all the time, but he said it was not a claim for damage, but would be looked upon more as an invoice of abandoned property, but suggested the filling out of this blank as soon as he had it prepared. We waited two or three months before it was out and just as soon as I received it I filled it out and filed it with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. What efforts did you make to get any compensation from the statement that you filed? Have you made any inquiries as to what was going to be done to compensate you for your property that you left there?

Mr. BURNETT. Make inquiry of whom?

Mr. KEARFUL. Of the State Department.

Mr. BURNETT. No. They simply stated, as nearly as I can remember now—I have not brought the letter with me. I think this application states that this does not say that the State Department has passed upon it or would give any insurance or assurance that the claim would be paid, but they would consider the matter, and at the first opportunity, or something to that effect, they would present the claim. I do not know when it is going to be done. I have no idea.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your understanding as to what the effect of this claim or inventory would be at some time? It was supposed to be the basis for something, was it not?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you understand it to be?

Mr. BURNETT. It was the understanding with us that the State Department was going to assist us. Let me read the action by the State Department. I think this covers the ground:

This application form has been prepared for the assistance and guidance of prospective claimants, and it is not to be understood from its contents as committing the Department of State to take any action with respect to claims filed in accordance with its requirements. The department will, however, consider the claims on their merits and will take such action, if any, as may be deemed appropriate and opportune considering the foreign relations of the United States and the circumstances of the case. Assistance of the State Department with respect to claims has been withheld or refused in particular cases on account of speculative, exaggerated, or exorbitant nature of claims or on discovery of fraud.

There are a number of other things. These were made out for everything, and they were selling the ground on which they had refused some of the claims. My final application was returned for some changes, and I have not heard since they passed upon it, if they have. After receiving the last copy they said at their earliest convenience they would consider it, and they have not told me whether they thought it was complete or not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You lost everything you had at that time in Mexico?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, hardly. I had $9 in cash when I reached home and the clothes that I had slept in in jail and a few things that were in those grips that my wife and daughter carried. That is everything on earth we had, and we have never had one penny from there since. It was everything we had in the world.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the value of your investment in Mexico?

Mr. BURNETT. I had nearly a thousand acres of land and as you know the Government there raised the valuation a couple of years ago with the understanding that if any one could prove that they had given the proper valuation in their deed, it would be restored. Mine was restored. The valuation was $4,466.32 on the thousand acres. I am paying taxes on that basis.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are still paying taxes on that, are you?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. Those taxes were paid in December, 1916. They were 264 pesos, paying from the middle of 1913 to 1916. Since then I have paid the taxes up to July 1 of the year 1920. Of course, in this application, I am not putting in any claim for land, any more than for the citrus growth, of course, and the land that we had cleared and the crop that was growing up in brush and jungle like that tropical land does. That is all that is claimed for the land, but I have claimed, which is legitimate, for about $11,000 and I can give you some of the prices that you can see that it is not exorbitant.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee does not care to go into the items for the purpose of passing upon your claim.

Mr. BURNETT. Anyway, these items are really the actual value, and much cheaper than any of those things could be replaced for now. The principal loss was the pineapple crop, and the 10 acres of citrus fruit that was beginning to bear, and a nursery of about 7,000 trees that had been budded to citrus fruit.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your loss was $11,000?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; besides my land. My land I am still holding in the hope of some day getting something out of it, and the Government there still recognizes my right.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that in terms of American money?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; in American gold.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been nearly six years since your loss occurred?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; and not one cent of interest or anything like that is counted in, and no war-time price. Every figure that I have given is the same as the Secretary of State will have that was filed with him six years ago. It is items like $25 for a native horse, and $25 for a milk cow, and such prices as that. I am out the use of the money all this time, and am not making any note of that at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the statement by the State Department which you read a while ago there was something to the effect that in substance action would be taken at some time that would be appropriate and opportune.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; and I have had no hint when that time was coming.

Mr. KEARFUL. During the six years that have passed, have you made any inquiry as to whether the opportune time has arrived for appropriate action?

Mr. BURNETT. You see, this was just out this year, but I do not consider that there was any opportune time and that is why I have not taken the matter up. Really I was under the impression and the consul gave us to understand that that was a damage claim that this Government would look after, and the Secretary of State last summer wrote me that it would be considered in the light of invoices and inventory of abandoned property and not as a damage claim.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did he mean by abandoned property?

Mr. BURNETT. Secretary Bryan at an early date, when he was ordering us out, instructed us then to leave all our property in the hands of the American consul and that they would look after it, and some people understood that it meant that it would be perfectly reasonable that our Government was going to see that everything was cared for, and yet we did not abandon it. We stayed until we were taken away by force.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your claim is against this Government and not against the Mexican Government? Is that the idea?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir, but we do feel that this Government should see that the Mexican Government would fulfill the pledge that Carranza made to this country a week or two before they recognized him as president. He made four pledges. The first was giving religious liberty to the people. The second was to make good all damage to American property that was destroyed during the revolution, and on that and the other pledges this country recognized him as president of Mexico. We feel that they ought to see that the Mexican Government keeps that particular pledge. It was the Mexican Government that took us from our homes, and when we reached Vera Cruz this Government took their own course and did not permit us to stay to look after our things, but told us to leave an inventory with the consul and that they would be looked after.

Mr. KEARFUL. If you are right in your supposition that Huerta and his government were the only hope of Mexico and that Huerta was driven out because of the policy of this Government and that you were forced to leave and were taken away by the American authorities, how do you avoid the conclusion that this Government is responsible to you and not the Mexican Government?

Mr. BURNETT. If we would accept the statements that were first made and the feeling that existed among the people, this country was taking the responsibility of caring for our interests and it was supposed that they were going to do it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would not you go still further? Would not you hold this Government responsible for conditions in Mexico generally, for interference with the only hope that Mexico had, and removed the chance that Mexico had and imposed upon Mexico a Government that can not perform its obligations?

Mr. BURNETT. We all feel that that was the case, and although it would have made us remain there as prisoners of war almost to a man, when the troops landed they ought to have gone on and brought about order in the republic. It would have meant that we would have been taken to the mountains and kept as prisoners of war and perhaps would have starved to death. However, that is what ought to have been done when they landed at all; that is, they ought to have gone on and taken the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was not the difficulty in the landing of the troops in the first place?

Mr. BURNETT. That is all that caused the trouble, the landing of the troops. There was a friendly feeling in that part of the Republic toward Americans up until that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are naturally very much interested in what happens in Mexico and have talked with your friends who, like you, have been driven out or taken out of Mexico?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the general opinion among the American refugees from Mexico as to what ought to have been done to protect them and their Mexican rights?

Mr. BURNETT. When we came out there were about 700 on the vessel, 715 I believe. Some of them had been many years in Mexico. It was the unanimous opinion that there never would be peace in Mexico and our interests never would be cared for until the United States or some other country came in and brought about peace, after the city was taken. It was claimed that the Huerta Government was gone. We had no hope of any other Government bringing about peace. So far as I have ever heard, we are still strongly of that opinion. We do not feel Carranza has the situation under his thumb at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. What course do you and others in your condition think that that action should take?

Mr. BURNETT. I hardly know. I have been separated from the rest of the people and have not had much of a chance to talk with them for the last four years at least. In the first place, we do not feel in our part of the country like they ever ought to have meddled, and if they had not done so Mexico, I believe, would have looked after herself. But after they did meddle there was no question in our minds but that they ought to have gone on while they were there and brought about peace.

If the Mexicans had a little more respect for us and our influence and our power and our word, it might not take intervention. They might be willing to do the right thing and settle down rather than have any trouble. But as it is they will pay no attention to anything we say. They do not believe and they have no regard for our wishes as a government in their affairs at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. What would be necessary to do in your opinion in order to make them respect us?

Mr. BURNETT. Of course it is hard for one to say what they would do if they were at the head of things, but whatever it would lead to, this Government ought to take some kind of a stand and say to Mexico that certain things had to be, and then follow it up and not back down. They used to be told that it was never followed up, and there is where we were not respected by them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Following it up would mean, of course, entering that country with an armed force?

Mr. BURNETT. That would be the ultimate result if the right thing were not done. There is no question that this Government ought to see that our people that have lost the property there must be protected and their losses made good, and the people that are there should be protected, just like a school-teacher that would lay down rules to govern his school—there ought to be some way of enforcing them. He could say beforehand what would be done if certain things were not done, but if he has the respect of his school and desires to keep it, he must stand by his proposition.

Mr. KEARFUL. Suppose our new Secretary of State, under the direction of President Wilson, should make such a declaration to the Mexican people, what do you think they would do at the present time?

Mr. BURNETT. Smile.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then in order to make them feel that it was serious something drastic would be in order?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; or else know that a different one was stating it or that it was coming from a different source than the other statements heretofore made. As a school boy, I know some teachers said things that I did not respect very much, and later statements I did not respect; but when another one took charge, perhaps the snap of the eye was all that was wanted even if he did not do anything very drastic. I knew that conditions had changed. I believe Mexico must know that conditions have changed if they expect anything of an administration, but under certain conditions that might not be true at all. If they really felt we meant it, things might be done in the right way.

I am not just stating some convictions that have just come into my mind. While there we read the Mexico City Herald, which gave in English quotations from the Spanish papers of the city, and when I say the Mexicans would smile at certain things, they would tell the statements of those papers regarding things that this country would be displeased with, and it was a standing joke. They did not mind expressing it at all. That much is a fact that is generally known.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is not news to the committee.

Mr. BURNETT. Probably not; it ought not to be. It is generally known to be news.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there any further statement that you care to make about anything that has not been covered up to this time?

Mr. BURNETT. Just now I do not think of anything; no.

Mr. KEARFUL. Perhaps between now and the time we convene tomorrow morning something else may occur to you. If so, you will be given an opportunity at that time to present it.

Mr. BURNETT. Thank you very much.

(Thereupon, at 8.30 o'clock p. m., the hearing was adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 9, 1920, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., April 9, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES M. BURNETT—Resumed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Burnett, I believe you have a further statement that you wish to make this morning?

Mr. BURNETT. Regarding the people of the colony, I desired to add the fact that more than 200 people owned land and were only waiting for suitable conditions to come down and make their homes there, but were debarred on account of the revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those were in addition to the ones who were at that time living there?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. Two hundred above the ones who were already there.

Regarding my answer as to my holdings, I would like to say that while I owned a little less than a thousand acres, 950 acres to be exact, I took this land with the understanding that others were to take a part of it. They held contracts from me and intended long before I left to come down, to make their homes there and get their deeds, so that instead of holding the whole amount myself there would have been eight of us holding the 950 acres. It is mine, as I answered, from the fact that they were not willing in 1916 to pay three years taxes. They said it looked as though we would lose it all and they were willing to throw up the job, and as it is in my name I answered that I had that much land. That is the way I happened to have that much.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were prevented from going there to establish their homes by the conditions which you have described?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. Regarding the question as to the amount of land being developed, our ideal there was small farms for the settlers. The majority of the actual settlers were living on 10-acre tracts, set to citrus fruit and pineapples, and the intention of all except a few of the ranchmen was to subdivide the larger tracts, and they had their men ready to come any time that it had been safe for them to cross the border.

Mr. KEARFUL. We have heard about the agrarian problem in Mexico, which is a project to subdivide large holdings into small tracts, but it has never been put into operation to any large extent. What was the condition in the locality of the Medina colony in regard to that project?

Mr. BURNETT. I knew of no Mexican owning less than 4,000 acres, and no tract of less than that amount could be bought by any individual; that is, until it was subdivided by Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. The first subdivision into small tracts in your locality occurred in connection with your colony?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. I would like to add something regarding the subdivision of land. Mexicans could not appreciate what that meant as they never had known what it was to have small homes and live in them. None of their ancestors had owned land. Those who observed it commenced to want homes. Until they saw it demonstrated and knew what it meant, they could not realize the benefit of it, but they were already wanting and some were getting their homes, buying them from the Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then you and your neighbors by your example educated those people toward the ambition of small homes which they could own and improve themselves?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; and several of them had been sold land. The tract adjoining ours under a few months' favorable condition would have been planted with the express purpose of selling it to Mexicans on easy terms in small tracts, because of the fact that there was going to be public sentiment in favor of that. They could see what it meant, and that tract in a short time would have been planted and sold to Mexicans for homes adjoining ours.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did these Mexicans appear to be capable of taking advantage of the opportunity as to homes upon small tracts and operating them, after seeing the example of the Americans?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And some of them did do so?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; at that time, and had their own fruit, fixed up their homes beautifully, and were prouder and respected themselves more than any of the people that had no homes, but they knew not how to go at it until they saw how the Americans did.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further that you desire to state?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think of anything further at this time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you very much; you are excused.

TESTIMONY OF DR. PAUL G. MANLEY.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your full name?

Dr. MANLEY. Paul G. Manley.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Dr. MANLEY. Mount Carmel, Ill.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Dr. MANLEY. Physician.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you a native-born American citizen?

Dr. MANLEY. I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. From what State?

Dr. MANLEY. Illinois.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long were you in Mexico in business?

Dr. MANLEY. I was not there very long at any one time. I never lived there in a regular way. I was there frequently for periods of a month to three months over the period that I was operating down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What period was that?

Dr. MANLEY. It began in the fall of 1906 when I sent my first man down there to take charge, and continued until the time when this same man was brought out at the time of the Vera Cruz incident.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was April 21, 1914?

Dr. MANLEY. I believe so.

Mr. KEARFUL. What interest did you have in Mexico?

Dr. MANLEY. I had nearly 6,000 acres of land at the time that Mr. Peter, my representative, came out of there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where was this located?

Dr. MANLEY. It was located near Medina, Agua Fria tract of land.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the State of Oaxaca?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were you doing with this tract of land?

Dr. MANLEY. I sent a man down there in the fall of 1906 on a two-year contract. Prior to that I had acquired three or four hundred acres of this land through the Mexican Agricultural Land Co. Mr. Peter, this man I had sent down, took charge and went ahead and cleared up more land until I had something like 800 acres of land clear that had been put to grass and cattle. I imported a couple of carloads of registered thoroughbred white faces.

Mr. KEARFUL. Herefords?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes, a thoroughbred Percheron and a Clydesdale stallion and a Kentucky stallion, and a large black Spanish jack and a good start of thoroughbred Duroc Red Jersey hogs, and O. I. C. white thoroughbred hogs, thoroughbred chickens, etc., household furniture and agricultural implements.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you buy your land and pay for it?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you paid taxes on it ever since to the Mexican Government?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any special concession from the Mexican government that gave you advantage over anybody else in the country?

Dr. MANLEY. No, sir. They have been unjustly raising my assessments, that is raising my assessments without raising the assessments of others around me. I have been paying more taxes proportionately than others.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean other Americans?

Dr. MANLEY. Even other Americans, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about raising the taxes of Americans as compared with the taxation of the Mexicans? Has there been any discrimination in that respect?

Dr. MANLEY. I could not really tell you about that. I have left the matter of payment of taxes mostly to my representative down there during the time that he was there, and it has been partly in Mr. Kerr's hands since that, up to the time of his death, and since that time in Mr. Crigsby's hands, and I have not paid much attention to it. I supposed I had the taxes to pay and I just paid them without question, but Mr. Kerr did get a reduction of my assessment at one time and Mr. Crigsby is now refusing to pay my taxes until they correct the matter of overcharges, which he hopes to get done very soon. That is about all I know about the taxes. I do not know as to the assessments of the Mexicans around me, but I have been told that there is a great difference in my assessment at least and probably other Americans also.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you state now much money you had invested in these operations?

Dr. MANLEY. I spent $20,000 in Mexico that is lost—lost from the fact that my clearing has grown up into the original tropical jungle, my home has been burned, my citrus fruit orchards have been burned over, my fencing has been burned, and I suppose the wire, etc., hauled away. I have nothing of my investment down there. The white face cattle that were left there when Mr. Peter and my son came away, they being the men who managed my affairs down there during this period of my ownership, have all been taken away. There were none of them left in three or six months after leaving there. I have nothing left there of all my improvements, excepting the land.

Mr. KEARFUL. When you went there did you anticipate that these things might happen to you and did you not realize that you were taking chances with the prospect of making great profits?

Dr. MANLEY. When I first went down to Mexico I went not with any intention of buying at all. I had not thought of such a thing. I went down there to Mexico City for my health more particularly than anything else. I had had a railroad accident in which a southern train ran through my buggy one night and gave me a gentle toss of a couple hundred feet, and I suffered from headaches. I went down to Mexico City thinking the altitude might benefit me. I had been greatly interested in Mexican history and I went down on a kind of pleasure trip.

On the way down I got accidentally in association with Mr. Grigsby and the company that he represented, the Mexican Agricultural Land Co. at Laredo, and luckily got into their private car and went on down to Mexico City in that way. Of course, not being able to talk Spanish, we were lucky in that respect. When they got ready to leave Mexico City we did not feel like being left behind, so we went on down with them to the Tropics. I was so charmed with the beauties and the richness of the country and its prospects that I invested in this land, only part of it at first, and then gradually my enthusiasm and my further knowledge of the situation and the encouragement of the Mexican Government, as shown particularly in Mr. Fitzgerald's book which was published by the country, and being assured of the favorable attitude of the Government toward American investors, I kept on buying until I got the amount which I now have.

This book of Fitzgerald's I understood to have been published, and it was published, I think, or at least the money furnished to publish it by the Mexican Government. I took that to be a guarantee of the friendliness of the Mexican Government to American investors, and I bought my land largely upon that assurance. Then, too, I knew that they had had peace in Mexico for 20 or more years prior to that time, and it was generally believed by everybody, as well as myself, that the Mexican Government was quite stable, and I had no fears at that time of any interference on the part of the Government whatever. I had faith in their ability to control the country. In fact, I think the first five or six years of my holdings down there I felt as secure and safe as I did in the United States, and I think we were absolutely secure.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are not one of those speculators that we have heard about who went down to the revolutionary region of the country operating under a concession from the authorities?

Dr. MANLEY. No, indeed. I sought nor had any concession of any kind. Mine was an individual proposition. Nobody had any interest excepting myself. There was no company or organization or anything of the kind. I began there legitimately and earnestly to develop my own proposition for my own purpose.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any reason to believe that in case you were persecuted by the Mexican authorities you would be abandoned by your own Government?

Dr. MANLEY. Not at all. I believe in the sovereignty of the Stars and Stripes and supposed I would be protected by that flag anywhere on earth.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you subsequently have any reason to change that opinion?

Dr. MANLEY. I have thought that the attitude of the Government toward Mexican affairs has not entirely justified my former faith.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to you that diminished your faith in the constitutional right of American citizens to protection of their lives and property in foreign countries?

Dr. MANLEY. Personally, nothing. My representative, Mr. Peter, suffered I suppose about as much as any of the parties who were brought out in 1914. He was one of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. You refer to the personal hardships of your representative. What about your own property interest? What happened to you with respect to them?

Dr. MANLEY. My property interest?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; with especial reference to the attitude and policy of the American Government?

Dr. MANLEY. I hardly know how to answer that question.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your first troubles begin down there? You say your property has all been taken away and destroyed. When did your first troubles begin?

Dr. MANLEY. I might say that my son and his young wife went down there at the expiration of Mr. Peter's first two year contract, the man I first sent down there. Then my son and his wife went down there and they were there about five years. During the latter year probably of the time that my son and his wife lived there, bandits or bands of bandits would come along past there once in a while and not conduct themselves just properly. They did not do anything very bad, but they were always in rather a threatening attitude and my son began to appreciate the fact that there was going to be trouble and he thought it best to get his wife out of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What year did that begin?

Dr. MANLEY. I really can not tell you.

Mr. KEARFUL. During whose rule in Mexico?

Dr. MANLEY. Just about the time I think of the end of the Huerta régime. I am not really positive about that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Huerta abdicated in July, 1914. Was it prior to that time?

Dr. MANLEY. It was a little earlier than that I think.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it during the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Dr. MANLEY. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or of Madero?

Dr. MANLEY. No; I think it was in Huerta's time.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had no trouble prior to that time?

Dr. MANLEY. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just visits from marauding bands, which were not very serious?

Dr. MANLEY. No; they had not done anything very bad up to that time, but were threatening all the time. A man had been killed very near my place before that, but that I think had nothing to do with it. I think that was a little personal matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your worst troubles begin?

Dr. MANLEY. It was just about the time the trouble that all the rest of the colony began there.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the landing of the American forces in Vera Cruz?

Dr. MANLEY. That was the most serious; yes. I do not think they had much trouble up to that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you there at that time?

Dr. MANLEY. No; and my son was not there just at that time. He had come to the States. In the first place he sent his wife out, or came out and brought his wife out. Then he went back and stayed a period of time. Then he came home again to see her, and it was along about that time that this happened. He left the case in the care of Mr. Peter, the man who had had charge of it then and who owned land there. He bought land at the end of his first two years with me, between me and town, and the place was left in his care. They were brought out, as you know, at the time of the Vera Cruz incident.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was done with your property when they were brought out?

Dr. MANLEY. Mr. Peter left it there and left it in the care of a Mexican caretaker, I think, as nearly as he could.

I might say that prior to the time my son came out the last time, he sold off—but I am getting ahead of my story. I bought about 250 native breeding cows in addition to the importation of my white faces. I bought also about 40 or 50 Mexican mares to breed to my thoroughbred stallions. Prior to his coming out the last time, my son sacrificed or sold, at a very great sacrifice, the cows, to get rid of them, foreseeing what was coming. Then the thoroughbred white faces that we had there we did not care to sacrifice, but thought we could leave them with my half-breed horse animals in the care of others, so they were left in Peter's care, and he turned what was left of them over to the Mexican caretaker, and they were all taken away in a little while. I do not know what became of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of your thoroughbred hogs and chickens?

Dr. MANLEY. They disappeared the same as the other things that were left there.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not know who took them?

Dr. MANLEY. I do not know anything about it. I think that there were some of the animals that were taken away by the authorities, but really I do not know. I was not there at the time and I could make no definite statement regarding that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for your representative leaving the country in 1914 and leaving the property in the hands of the Mexicans?

Dr. MANLEY. It was an order from the Mexican Government to board a train and come to Vera Cruz, or rather they were taken out, as I understand it, by the Federal authorities.

Mr. KEARFUL. What order or notice was given by the American authorities in regard to getting out?

Dr. MANLEY. I know nothing about that, only as I have heard others talk about it. I remember Mr. Bryan's instructions to get out at one time and later on his changing his interpretation of what that language meant. We were advised to get out of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the year before the taking of Vera Cruz, was it not?

Dr. MANLEY. I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or at least some months before?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then at the time of the taking of Vera Cruz did you know about the instructions that were first given by Mr. Bryan in regard to getting out of the country?

Dr. MANLEY. I do not remember.

Mr. KEARFUL. Since that time has it been possible to return to your property and continue operations?

Dr. MANLEY. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or to recover any of it?

Dr. MANLEY. No; not with any safety. I certainly should have done so if I felt that it was at all permissible or safe.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your Mexican experience, did you have occasion to observe the attitude of the natives toward the American settlers and the treatment that the American settlers gave to the natives?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes. During nearly all the period that we were there, up to near the last, the attitude of the Mexicans was very polite and genteel. They were very serviceable to us, pleasant and agreeable, good laborers, easily managed. We had no trouble with our labor and the Mexicans seemed to appreciate us from the fact that we would give them about four or five times as much wages as they had received before we came there. We were paying our men $1.25 a day and they had been accustomed to taking about 25 cents a day prior to the time of the American colonization there. We liked them and they seemed to like us very well, and we got along splendidly up to about the last year or so. Then the clouds began to spread over and difficulties began to arise.

Mr. KEARFUL. What other benefits to the Mexican natives did you observe beside the raising of their wages, by way of education and improvement in living?

Dr. MANLEY. There seemed to be quite an improvement. The Mexicans were picking up our methods of doing things and had a tendency to use our implements and methods of farming.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of implements had they used prior to that time?

Dr. MANLEY. The very simplest—a sharpened stick and a piece of steel on the end of a stick to shove along, instead of a hoe. They used oxen once in a while.

Mr. KEARFUL. With a wooden plow?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes; entirely primitive.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they readily adopt American methods when they saw how beneficial they were?

Dr. MANLEY. Oh, yes. Of course they were a little slow about it at first, but they were catching on and seemed to be glad of the chance.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you notice any change in the good feeling of the Mexicans toward the Americans while you were there?

Dr. MANLEY. Not until along about the time of the Vera Cruz incident.

Mr. KEARFUL. Up to that time they were friendly and good feeling existed?

Dr. MANLEY. Oh, yes. I saw no sign of any trouble whatever until possibly six months or so prior to the Vera Cruz incident, when there seemed to be a little feeling of enmity that grew up to the time of the Vera Cruz incident, and when that affair occurred, of course they were inflamed by that and were rather hostile.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you made any effort to recover your property or get any compensation for it?

Dr. MANLEY. I have filed a claim against the Government for damages.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you file it with our State Department?

Dr. MANLEY. Mr. Grigsby is managing it. I have here a copy of the claims that I have made. Of course that does not represent my damages at all, but I have made this claim.

Mr. KEARFUL. This appears to be a statement of losses of personal property and improvements?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. If you have no objection we will insert that in the record.

Dr. MANLEY. That is all right.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, encouragement have you received in regard to the settlement of your claims?

Dr. MANLEY. Nothing whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you made any efforts subsequent to the filing of your claim?

Dr. MANLEY. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you received any information as to when it will be acted upon?

Dr. MANLEY. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any idea at all as to when you will be able to get compensation for the injuries which you suffered?

Dr. MANLEY. None.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you expect this Government or the Mexican Government to settle this claim?

Dr. MANLEY. I thought possibly this Government might persuade the Mexican Government to pay it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you known of any effort being made in the last six years by this Government to persuade the Mexican Government to do anything of that kind?

Dr. MANLEY. I do not know of anything. I have been rather patiently waiting for them to do something.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much longer do you expect to wait?

Dr. MANLEY. As long as we have to. I do not know how long it will be.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are very naturally interested in how long you will have to wait?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. KEARFUL. And when the appropriate time may come for some action?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any definite idea as to what action ought to be taken?

Dr. MANLEY. Nothing definite; no.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think there is any chance of your receiving justice under the present Government of Mexico?

Dr. MANLEY. It does not appear to me so just now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any opinion that you care to express as to what ought to be done with respect to yourself and other Americans similarly situated?

Dr. MANLEY. It has appeared to me that we could not hope for very much until a change of administration occurs in the affairs of the United States. I think that Mexico will have to be brought to terms by a change in attitude on the part of the United States Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have faith that a new administration of a different character will entertain a different policy toward Mexico and one that will result in settlement of your claim and claims of others like you?

Dr. MANLEY. We have hoped so. There does not seem to be much chance under the present administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything that has been done in pursuance of the present policy that leads you to believe that the American Government is under any duty to American citizens who have been robbed and driven out of Mexico?

Dr. MANLEY. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. In reference to the policy of eliminating Huerta and the taking of Vera Cruz for that purpose and the consequent necessity for you and others similarly situated to leave Mexico, does that indicate to you that there is any duty to repair the result of that action?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes; there surely is a duty to repair it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to observe other Americans who were located and operating in Mexico?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe what they were doing and the kind of people they were?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the character of American citizens with whom you came in contact?

Dr. MANLEY. In our colony?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; or in other parts of Mexico. What kind of people were they in the colonies?

Dr. MANLEY. They were individual farmers who were conscientiously operating their own farms for their own good and the good of their families and the good of their surrounding neighbors, both American and Mexican, who were making an honest endeavor to establish homes in Mexico and earn an honest living.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they people of small means as a rule?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes; as a rule nearly all of them. In fact I was the largest individual holder in the colony. It was not my intention to have such large holdings as I had, but it was rather by accident that I got as much land as I did get.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did these colonists, as a rule, have invested there all that they had in the world?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes; as a rule that is a fact, I think, almost to a man.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they had purchased land and were building homes upon the small tracts of land which they were developing?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did these colonists in character compare with farmers of the same class in the United States?

Dr. MANLEY. Very favorably.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were all good citizens and paid their taxes and obeyed the laws?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And paid their debts?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether they maintained schools at those places?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. At their own expense?

Dr. MANLEY. Yes, sir; also a church and religious services.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the influence of their operations upon the Mexicans was good in every respect?

Dr. MANLEY. I think so; it certainly was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that their leaving the locality was a benefit to the Mexican natives?

Dr. MANLEY. It was a detriment.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further, Dr. Manley, that has not already been covered that you would like to state?

Dr. MANLEY. Not that I think of at this time.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee are very much obliged to you.

(Witness excused.)

TESTIMONY OF MR. SLOAN W. EMERY.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your full name?

Mr. EMERY. Sloan W. Emery.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you reside?

Mr. EMERY. Tibbee Station, Miss.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your business?

Mr. EMERY. Dairyman at the present time, and I am still president of the Vista Hermosa Sugar & Mercantile Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you a native-born American citizen?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of what State?

Mr. EMERY. Texas.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you first go to Mexico?

Mr. EMERY. In 1900.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long were you in Mexico?

Mr. EMERY. I visited Mexico in 1900 and was there for several weeks. In 1901, in December, I returned there as manager of the Vista Hermosa Sugar & Mercantile Co. and was there in that capacity until April 27, 1914, I believe, when we were deported by the Huerta troops.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the properties of this company that you were managing?

Mr. EMERY. We bought originally 7,000 acres of land for which we paid $80,000 gold. When we came to make a survey of those lands, we found that there were less than 2,500 acres instead of 7,000. That is as near as we came to robbing the Mexicans. We had a straight deed carrying 7,000 acres of land, and it came through a prominent Mexican, Jose Maria Ortiz, of Mexico City, a very prominent man in those days, and is yet, I guess. We put the matter to him so strongly that he had to make up the shortage of this land.

Our lands bordered on the Rio Tonto. There were no other lands on our side of the river available. This Tonto River is quite a considerable stream. It is about 500 to 800 feet wide in front of our property and perhaps 12 feet deep. There were no lands suitable for our business on the same side of the river on which we were. However, there was a large tract of land on the opposite bank of the river consisting of some 43,000 acres, and by a compromise between Mr. Ortiz and our directors we paid $54,000 for enough land to make up the shortage and some 15,000 acres more, making our investment down there in lands something like $134,000 gold, and we had between 24,000 and 25,000 acres in all.

Those lands were devoted to the production of sugar cane mainly, sugar cane, rubber, coffee, and bananas.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the principal character of your operations?

Mr. EMERY. Sugar was our principal crop.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a sugar plant?

Mr. EMERY. We had one of the best in Mexico. We had an investment of $250,000 in machinery alone. It was conceded to have been the finest distillery in Mexico. We had made and used in our construction work 4,000,000 bricks. We had very fine brick clay, and we made our own brick. Everything that we used there was for keeps, so to speak, a permanent investment.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the total amount of your investment?

Mr. EMERY. $1,250,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of labor did you employ?

Mr. EMERY. Native labor entirely.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many men did you employ?

Mr. EMERY. We had, dependent on the season of the year, from 300 to 700 hands. I would like to say that I would never want to have better labor under the system we employed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the laborers peaceful and industrious?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. In the 15 years that I was there we never had but one fatality from quarrels among themselves. We worked entirely with what were known as contract people. I should not say that either. We had perhaps 100 men who were regular volunteer labor, but the great bulk of our labor was derived from two sources. One was from the villages about. A peon would drop in there and become accelerated and get into trouble and be put in the juzgado, and our agents would pay their fines and advance them a certain amount of money, usually about $30, and those people would come to us under a six months' contract. As soon as they were received, they were examined by the physician, and if their physical condition was such that they could work, they were kept. They were searched for anything in the line of weapons. If they had any weapons that were at all dangerous, those were taken away from them until their term was up, because we knew their character so well that if they had anything of that sort there might be trouble and there might not. We were so careful that we had only one case. In that case a man had an opportunity to get hold of a file and in a controversy over a woman he drove this file into his companion's side, and although we sent him immediately to headquarters, as were our instructions in those cases, blood poison ensued and this man died. That is the only case we had on our place of anything arising from trouble with the people.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were the laborers treated by you and your people? Were they oppressed in any way or were they well treated?

Mr. EMERY. We had frequent visits from the authorities who had charge of this business. I would like to state one little occurrence that happened that opened my eyes.

Soon after we went down there we had three men who ran away from us. They were Indians that were contracted, and for some reason or other they left us in that way. By the way, our loss from that source was about 3 per cent of our entire work. Year by year it would run until it was about 3 per cent out of 100 that we would employ that for some reason or other would get out and go.

Those people were brought back. We were making excavations for our sugar mills, which weighed 10 or 12 tons apiece in the rolls, and they required very solid foundations, and we had a pit perhaps 15 feet deep. I said to my mayordomo, "Put those three men down in that pit. They can not get out of there without being helped out, and we will be pretty sure of finding them there when we want them through the day." I had had some leg irons made, or rather bought them, and I put leg irons on those people.

After doing it, I got to thinking the matter over, and I wrote to the local official in the town what I had done. He did not make a reply to that letter, but he sent a private message to me to tell me that I had done what the governor of Oaxaca would not do, and he would advise us to never do anything of that sort, never put anything in the line of irons on a Mexican. He said, "If you have occasion to control any of these people, you are at liberty to tie them and you are at liberty to put them in the carcel (jail)." We had a carcel that we used if a man made us trouble, where we locked him up for a day or two. We used that as a place of confinement, and by little fines that were imposed—and that was done very seldom—we kept the whole business so that we could move them about. The favorite expression of our foreman was that the men were "very contented." We never had any trouble with our help and we tried to get our people to feel that it was a good place for them to labor, and labor was just as much of a want there as it is anywhere, and you had to treat people right in order to get them.

Mr. KEARFUL. With whom were these contracts made?

Mr. EMERY. We had agents; we had two or three different agents at various points, who were instructed to pick up all the labor they could at any time and to take them before the proper officials and to draw the papers and have them sign and everything executed properly, and then to deliver those people to us.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that done in accordance with the Mexican law?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was during the time of Diaz?

Mr. EMERY. During the Diaz administration; in fact, clear up through the Madero as well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were any changes made in that system of operation by Madero?

Mr. EMERY. Only that I think the inspectors were a little more attentive to their business. They came around to see if the people were being treated right, and of course they always had the right of way and could talk to anyone they wanted to and find out.

We had a very elaborate system of accounts with those people. Every man when he came there was given what we called a boleto, a ticket for wages. It was a statement ruled for six months' time in weekly periods, and the man's name headed that and the amount he owed us to begin with. Then there was a column for his weekly earnings, and those weekly earnings were extended each week. If he bought anything from the tienda, or store, it was charged against him, and the balance carried, so that everybody knew exactly week by week where he stood. If there was any dispute about the time the man had given or about amounts, it was fixed up right then and there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if anything, was provided by which the company looked after the welfare of the Mexican workmen?

Mr. EMERY. We kept a general stock of goods. We sold the goods at the prices that were common in the country. We fed our people and saw that they were suitably clothed and had medical attention.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a hospital?

Mr. EMERY. Oh, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a school?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the workmen assessed to support the hospital and school?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was done as a company expense?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that voluntary?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; we felt that with our property it was useless without labor and that we could afford to treat labor right in order to have a good standing with the Mexican laborers.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you treat them as compared with the treatment they received from the Mexican operators?

Mr. EMERY. There were very few of those. There is a singular thing. I do not know that that fact has ever been brought out before you committee. The Mexicans do not do big things. When a property gets so large that a Mexican and his immediate family can not handle it, they either stop progress right there or else sell it to some one else. If you will stop and look over the record you will find that the big business in Mexico is not handled by Mexicans. It is handled by English, French, German, Spanish, or American business men.

The Mexicans do not trust each other. There is the source of all this political trouble down there. These revolutionists do not dare put their lives in the hands of the present Mexican Government or former ones outside of the Diaz Government, because they might make all the promises in the world to a man, but once they get him into their power, they take him out and stand him up against the wall for the "good of the people."

Mr. KEARFUL. What has become of all this property you have described that you say represented an investment of $1,250,000?

Mr. EMERY. It stands there idle, dismantled, the copper stolen out of it, the machinery going to wreck, the cane fields practically grown up to monte—that is, to young timber. The property has been headquarters for bands of bandits for three or four years past, so we are informed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have live stock and supplies of all kinds?

Mr. EMERY. Oh, yes. We had 125 head of mules, 250 oxen, we had, I think, 12 or 15 head of horses, and 8 or 10 head of milch cows. We had a going concern.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have a stock of supplies in your store?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir, we carried about $12,000 worth of stock in our store.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you had buildings of various sorts?

Mr. EMERY. Oh, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has become of your horses and implements and supplies?

Mr. EMERY. They were stolen. The oxen were killed and eaten, I suppose.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the horses and mules driven off?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the amount of your production at the time your trouble first began?

Mr. EMERY. We were making about 900 tons of sugar a year. We were making about 50 barrels of aguardiente daily.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is alcohol derived from the cane?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; that is to say, it is not alcohol until it has been refined. We redistilled. We sold it usually or sometimes as guardiente and again we rectified it and sold it as alcohol. At one time I sent 5 gallons of alcohol to the United States gauger at Peoria, and our 5 gallons tested out 8.35 gallons under the United States test. We made a very superior article of alcohol and that in large part went across to France to be used in the manufacture of fine liquors.

Of course we did some retail business. A Mexican who did not drink was as much of an anomaly down there as an American here who got drunk.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are familiar with the very high price of sugar in this country, are you?

Mr. EMERY. I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think would be the effect upon that of the continued operation of the sugar plantations in Mexico under the old conditions?

Mr. EMERY. They never would have seen sugar at 19 cents a pound, as I saw it advertised the other day. We made sugar for 1½ cents a pound and we made money at that price. Of course, we had our alcohol. These people have the same thing here. It is true that they do not make it in the alcohol, but they get just as much out of the molasses, which will not crystalize in manufacturing various feeds and other uses that they are putting molasses to. They are not throwing any molasses out nowadays. They are getting a good price for their molasses.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know how the sugar industry in Mexico compares with that of Louisiana?

Mr. EMERY. It is about the same—it was at that time, with capacity for very great development.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those developments in progress or in prospect?

Mr. EMERY. In Mexico?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. I should say not. I do not know of a single sugar property operating in Mexico to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean during the good times were further developments in prospect?

Mr. EMERY. Oh, yes, indeed. We were clearing land every year and adding to our acreage.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was this a profitable operation of yours?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; it was going to be very profitable.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any concessions from the Mexican authorities that gave you advantages over other people operating in the country?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; and never asked for any. We knew it would be useless.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know of any other Americans operating down there who had concessions that gave them special privileges?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; I do not. The only people that had any concessions from the Government that I know of are the concessions given to Cubans who have cut our throats.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did that occur?

Mr. EMERY. When Cuba was specified. They were given an advantage in the matter of the introduction of their sugar here, I think, amounting to about 25 per cent perhaps of the customs duties. It was something like that, enough to make quite a considerable difference in their profits.

Mr. KEARFUL. So that it was difficult for American citizens operating in Mexico in sugar to compete with them?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. One of the most iniquitous things that was done was when our sugar came here it was not tested by the polariscope. The polariscopic test is a scientific test. It tells exactly what sugar is worth and the amount of saccharine that exists in the raw sugars. They judged solely by the looks of the thing. You can imagine how difficult it is to glance at an article and tell what there is to it, when you could have a scientific test that could tell absolutely, beyond what you might term the vagaries of the eye. I made a desperate effort to get that matter changed so the polariscopic test would rule, and finally succeeded in getting it about the time the trouble came up in Mexico. They took the polariscopic test here in the United States. We were not able to ship sugar into the United States on account of the risk that we ran of having our sugar rated so high that the duty would take up the value of the sugar. Our sugars were sent entirely to England.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did your first troubles begin in Mexico?

Mr. EMERY. We never had any trouble until 1914, the night that we ourselves were taken out.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that the occasion of the landing of American troops at Vera Cruz?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of your property at that time?

Mr. EMERY. It was confiscated by the Mexican Government. The officials were sent over one morning, an inventory taken, and the property taken into the hands of the Mexican Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of it subsequently?

Mr. EMERY. They operated the property for about 12 months, and then we made representations that enabled us to recover the property, and the property was jointly put into the hands of my cashier and my mayordomo, two men who had been with me for many years and were very responsible and reliable people—my right hands, you may say, in our work down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they Mexicans?

Mr. EMERY. One was a Mexican, and the other was a Cuban. They held the property together. The railroads were disorganized, and they could not get material in which to ship, they could not get cans for the alcohol, they could not get sacks for sacking the sugar, and their instructions were to keep the cane fields alive and to do enough cultivation to keep a good stock of cane, so that when it was possible to resume operations there we would have plenty of seed cane.

It requires about 5 tons of cane to plant an acre, and it is a very important matter to have cane of the right quality in order to secure a good stand in your cane fields.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they able to follow out those instructions?

Mr. EMERY. For a time. They were until the operations of the bandits became so rank that their lives were both threatened and they did not dare stay, and they were forced to leave the property.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who were the bandits you speak of?

Mr. EMERY. Little, isolated groups who lived by plundering and robbing and murdering.

I said we had no trouble at first. The Madero difficulty began about 1910. There never was a greater fake in the world than the raising of the Madero revolution. The Madero family had made $15,000,000 from the handling of the very peons that they claimed as being the cause for their revolution. They got into power and found $52,000,000 in the treasury in Mexico City, and an uncle of Francisco Madero was put in charge of the finances of that country, and at about the time Madero was killed there was not a dollar in the treasury. Every dollar had been expended.

The brother of Francisco Madero organized the Zapata raids in the State of Morelos. The State of Morelos was called the Sugar Bowl of Mexico. It was devoted almost entirely to sugar. It was his idea and his hope to get control of those properties in that state, and he conceived the idea that if he could scare out the people who were in there by some hocus-pocus, the Madero family would get control of that state.

Mr. KEARFUL. This was Gustavo Madero you are speaking of now?

Mr. EMERY. Yes. I omitted something. At the uprising of the Madero business we had a little settler over in a neighboring village by the name of Penuncio Martinez. He had gotten into some trouble with the government. They had given orders to arrest him, and he had been in an unhappy state for some little time with the Diaz government for his peccadillos—this I found out months afterwards—and he came to my foreman and begged him to let him have a rifle, and after a certain length of time he gave him this rifle. That was the initial step toward one of these bunches.

This man gathered together three or four others with him and they began circulating around the country, going into plantations and getting what they could and living off the country, so to speak. Their force kept augmenting, and finally he began sending me word that I need not worry at all, that we were not going to be disturbed by them. After this thing had come to me half a dozen times I began to take some little stock in the idea that Penuncio Martinez was acting in a small way much as Pelaez was doing in the Tampico district.

The thing went along for a couple of years, with Penuncio making headquarters there. We were a little way off from the main road and I think he came to see us only once. Toward the latter part of that time it seemed to me that it was a bad state of affairs to have this man operating and I suggested to him why not fall in with the Madero government. He said he would if he thought he could do it safely. I went to Mexico City and arranged matters so that he could become a good Indian, so to speak, and come in on the reservation and resume relations with the government, and this was done.

It went along until shortly after the time that we left there. Penuncio was the last man I saw on leaving Cordoba. He came in and was very regretful to see the condition we were in and promised to do all he could to look after our property, and he did as long as he was alive. I think finally they killed him; I heard they had, but I think we owed in some small measure a debt of gratitude to him. At one time he came to me and wanted $500, not as a forced loan, but simply as one business man would borrow from another. I let him have the $500 and perhaps 60 days after that he returned the money. He always seemed to be very friendly and very grateful.

I think we owed in large part our immunity from any trouble there to his actions.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was a free lance up to the time you arranged for him to join Madero?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; and he operated with the Madero government for, I think, several months after we left the country, and for some reason or other something came up that displeased him and he went out again. I have heard since that he was killed, but it has never been confirmed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Don't you mean that he operated with the Carranza government after you left?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You said he operated with the Madero government.

Mr. EMERY. I mean the Carranza government, but he fell out with that government and resumed his old tactics later, I believe.

I recollect at one time there was a very large movement of perhaps 1,500 revolutionists—two separate bands—that passed down through our property. When they approached the highway leading into our works, which was some three-quarters of a mile from the highway, this other man was in the lead and they started to come in. Penuncio rode up to the head of the column and said, "Where are you going?" He said, "This is an American company. We are going in there and see what we can do." Penuncio said, "No, you must not go in there." They insisted, and he told them no. He had some people whom he knew were straight, and he said, "There is only one way you can go in there. They are friends of mine, and you shall not molest them. If you get in there you will have to do it after disposing of us." He had that sort of feeling for us.

Mr. KEARFUL. He did protect you then?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; there is no question about it. They passed on and there was no further trouble about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to you at the time of the occupation of Vera Cruz?

Mr. EMERY. We had been urged by our bankers in Mexico City and by our attorney, Mr. Robert J. Kerr, who at that time was in Mexico, to leave; we had been very urgently advised to get away from the plantation. We were off to one side; we were some distance from the railroad and rather in a remote inaccessible section in a way.

I went to Vera Cruz and arranged to get a place to move my family. I disliked leaving until it really seemed a case of have-to. I arranged with Consul Canada to send me a telegram if the situation ever got dangerous, to wire me that my presence was needed at the Aduana in Vera Cruz, that he had a consignment of goods that needed my attention. That telegram was sent the day before the invasion of Vera Cruz by our troops. I did not receive it for 48 hours after it was sent. I never knew why.

Immediately on getting that telegram we threw together our personal belongings that we had had already packed, and started to the train. We had a little stream to cross about midway between the plantation and the railway, which was about 6 miles distant. We were met at this stream by some of the prominent citizens of the little towns—there were two little towns that we had to pass through—and they told us that there was no use in trying to go on, that the bridges had been destroyed and the Americans had attempted to take Vera Cruz and that they had killed hundreds of women and children, and that they had been driven back to the vessels with great loss, and that hell was popping generally. We thought we would take our chances right at the plantation, and so we returned to the place.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the first notice you had of the taking of Vera Cruz?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. We returned to the plantation, getting back about noon. We went about our ordinary vocations until about sundown, when a captain of the Huerta troops came up to the place, hitched his horse outside of the yard, started in, laid his rifle down on the grass, and extended his hand and was pleased to resume his acquaintance with me, which had been very pleasant. He came to tell me that the commander at Tierra Blanca was very anxious to have a conference with me. I told him I would be very much pleased to meet the commander and would go the first thing in the morning. He said, "That will not do. You had better go to-night." I said, "It is too late," and I assigned various reasons. My cashier came along and joined the conversation and tried to show that it would be better to go in the morning, but finally the captain became rather provoked, and said, "We can not waste any more time over this proposition. If you do not choose to go with me willingly I will have to take you."

Meanwhile 50 of his men had appeared. He had come alone at the start. My wife had joined the group by that time, and she said, "If you are going I am going, too." She was English, and she had a hunch that maybe all was not as it ought to be, and she insisted on accompanying me. They made no real objection, although they said there was no use in her going.

I and two other American men started. We had no means of conveyance. There was a lady there, an American who had been with us a great many years down there, who had charge of our store.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was that?

Mr. EMERY. Mrs. Wetherell. I do not know whether she has been before your committee.

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; she has been.

Mr. EMERY. We of course never would have left her if we had dreamed of the outcome of the proposition. As we started away they gave orders to turn loose all of our people and to give them full liberty in every sense of the word, and they took it. I suppose a white woman never underwent such a night without absolutely having been abused personally. The physician and the mayordomo were able to shift her around from place to place—she told you all of that, however—to protect her through the night. The next morning they got her over to the station and she rejoined us in Cordoba.

We reached Tierra Blanca at 2 o'clock in the morning, and were shoved into an empty room with no bedding and no convenience whatever and were told we could remain there. The next morning we started out to look around and one of the troops returned and said to me, "You had better not show yourselves. There is a very bitter feeling here against Americans." We were told that the night before the Mexicans had assembled and had held a joint meeting—there were 11 Americans in and about Tierra Blanca. It was railroad headquarters for that part of the country, and they put it to a vote as to whether those 11 people and ourselves should be executed then and there. That was decided by one ballot.

Mr. KEARFUL. In favor of not executing you?

Mr. EMERY. That they would not resort to extreme measures. We were put on the train and started for Cordoba, I should say about 9 o'clock the following morning. Midway between Cordoba and Tierra Blanca, one of the officials from Tierra Blanca, together with this same captain who had arrested us, came to us and said, "We have a proposition to make to you." He said, "We can do one of two things with this company." There were about 15 or 16 in our party. He said, "We can take you down to the front and leave you with the Mexican troops, or we can take you to Cordoba. Which would you rather have?"

We said of course that we would prefer going to Cordoba. We did not think it would be a very pleasant place for my wife and little child down where the fighting was likely to be and where there was a great deal of smallpox. They said, "You will have to give us a thousand pesos to take you to Cordoba."

We debated a little while over that and finally consented to do it, and paid that money to those people. When we reached Cordoba we were met by a file of 50 cavalrymen. The train was drawn up to the regular station in Cordoba and stayed there until the usual passengers and mail were unloaded, and then the train was reversed and we were run back about two blocks. This captain came to us and said, "The minute this train starts you want to get off of it as quickly as you can." We knew enough to obey orders, and we got off the train. We were then, I should say, perhaps 2 miles from the center of town. We were taken that distance on the double quick. We were taken all the way through back streets and we did not reach any evidence of any excitement until we got almost to the municipal building. Then we found a tremendous crowd there and we were ushered up through the guard of 25 soldiers and put into this room. I suppose that room was perhaps 30 by 50 feet, a bare room, with no provisions of any kind in it, a tile floor. We were kept there for six days and nights.

When Mr. Grigsby's party came it was necessary to shift us down into the cells, and the following morning we were told by a resident of Cordoba that there had been 50 peons' corpses taken out of those cells 30 days before, dead from the smallpox. There was not any use saying anything to anybody about it. I talked with my wife, who had had the smallpox, and I had been vaccinated and our little boy had been vaccinated. Eleven days later in quarantine in the Mississippi River my little child had a very high fever and I was certain then that this smallpox had broken out, but it developed into something else.

I speak of that to show the lack of foresight or forethought. There were six days and nights there that I think our lives just hung by a hair.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of the Mexican populace?

Mr. EMERY. The municipal building fronted a plaza that contained perhaps three acres, a beautiful place. That plaza would be filled up with peons at night, and about the only thing that would satisfy them was to turn us over to them. That was their attitude. They wanted the blood of the Gringos.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long were you kept prisoners there?

Mr. EMERY. Six days and nights.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many of you were there in the party, eventually?

Mr. EMERY. I think there were 85 altogether.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you get away?

Mr. EMERY. We were trying to get away for several days. We could get no information from anywhere. We would canvass the situation with the colonel commanding and with the jefe politico of the district, and they all seemed to be in the dark.

Finally on Monday—I think we were landed there on Wednesday—they told us we could get out that night. We were marshaled out between sundown and dark. We had a guard that day and there was no opposition to our going. They were quiet and civil. We found no trouble until we got down to a point called Paso del Macho. That is about 15 kilometers below Cordoba. There the train stopped. It seems the train people were in the habit of taking luncheon there, and there was a very large delegation of Mexicans there, and they bombarded the car with rocks and everything else they could get hold of. One lady was sitting by a window and a peon stepped up and spat in her face. They showed in various ways their animosity. If they really believed what I honestly think they did believe, I do not blame them. If they thought their women and children had been shot down in the streets of Vera Cruz by the hundred, as they were made to believe, I can not question very much their attitude toward Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that their feeling was justified according to reports?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, I do. I would have felt much the same way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether any Mexican women and children were killed in Vera Cruz?

Mr. EMERY. I have been led to believe there were. I would not attempt to state the number, but I am under the impression there were one or two children and perhaps three Mexican women that were accidentally killed by the fire of American marines. They were quite outraged at the landing of those troops.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where were you taken then?

Mr. EMERY. We were put on the train. The train was at Paso del Macho perhaps for 30 minutes, perhaps an hour—it seemed like a lifetime to us while those cars were being bombarded with rocks and everything else. We saved ourselves by piling our valises and anything we could get against the windows.

We were then taken down to a station that was some 15 miles below, to Soledad. We were landed there about daylight and we were held there. The train immediately was returned to Cordoba and we were left there stranded.

There was quite a large collection of Mexican troops there and nobody seemed to know anything about it, and we could not get any advice from anywhere. We did not know whether we were going to be allowed to go on or not, and the troops were not feeling very friendly. There was a very well-defined feeling among a good many people that there would have been very serious trouble there if we had been held there another 24 hours. But meanwhile a train came bearing a commander of the English fleet, who was afterwards killed in the Pacific. He was sent up to Mexico City to see if he could not persuade Gen. Huerta to resign. He went to Mexico City on a special train. Of course his attempt was futile, and when his train returned about 2 o'clock in the afternoon a committee from our people went over and made a very strong plea to him to allow us to board his train and we were taken to Vera Cruz on board his train. We were rescued really by the British Navy. They had a flag of truce. The column was headed and followed by a white flag.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you meet Consul Canada and Admiral Fletcher in Vera Cruz?

Mr. EMERY. On arrival at Vera Cruz, I knew the shortcuts to American headquarters there and my wife and I slipped out of the rear of the coach, which was very well filled. By the way, we traveled 9 miles afoot the worst walk I ever experienced, over a torn-up railway to a point about 4 kilometers from Vera Cruz, to Boca del Rio, and we were there given a train and taken into Vera Cruz. As I say, I made my way to Consul Canada's office and I opened the door and he grasped my hand and he said, "Old man, we sweat blood over you." They could not get word from us and could not get any advice as to where we were or what had happened to us or why we were held. Our own thought was that if the American troops had continued to march toward Mexico City, that we were held there as a sort of hostage to get terms.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you released upon information that the Americans were not going in any farther?

Mr. EMERY. I imagine so. We never did get any information one way or the other. There was a very singular occurrence. In entering the municipal building where we were kept, a miscount was made of our party and my wife was not counted with the number. For example, we perhaps went in there with 15 people and they only took tally of 14. There was a hotel right across the street, the Hotel Diligencia. We attempted to get Mrs. Emery out of the building. It was not pleasant for women there by themselves, but nothing was doing. We understood the leading Spanish merchants in the town, with whom we did business, and we got word to them and they would say, "We will do what we can," and they would come back to us again, but she was held there until the very last and she was held there simply because the colonel commanding felt she was safer there than in the hotel.

I am satisfied that but for the position of the leading Spanish and Mexican merchants of Cordoba there would have been one of the most horrible slaughters there. I was told that perhaps the first night after we reached there—by the way, the day before we came there a little party was brought in that was attacked, and they were from the first plantation out of Vera Cruz. At any rate they were stoned and one of the party had quite a severe wound on his head. That is the reason why they were so insistent on getting us up by the side passages, so as to avoid knowledge of the populace.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any conversation with Consul Canada or Admiral Fletcher in reference to plans that had been made for the Vera Cruz landing?

Mr. EMERY. The following morning after our arrival in Vera Cruz, I paid my respects to the consul and to Admiral Fletcher, who happened to be in his office, having been entertained on Admiral Fletcher's ship previously and he having been at the plantation. Of course my relations with Mr. Canada were almost as a brother. I had the very deepest respect and feeling for Mr. Canada. They talked very freely to me. I do not know that this matter has ever come out. They told me this, that they had perfected this sort of an arrangement. They knew that the steamer Ypiranga, the Spanish steamer, was due to arrive in Vera Cruz, in fact was in the offing then.

Mr. KEARFUL. A German steamer, was she not?

Mr. EMERY. A Spanish steamer, I thought. At any rate, it does not matter whose steamer it was, it had a large consignment of arms for the Huerta government, and it was desirable from the standpoint of the United States at that time to prevent the arrival of those arms and their going into the hands of the Huerta government. They did not care to lock horns with the vessel. That would have been an act of war, of course, against that nation which owned the vessel. They conceived the idea of arranging with the colonel commanding the Mexican troops that he would withdraw his troops—I think he had something like 1,000 men there—and that in the early morning before daylight a detachment of marines would enter the city by rowboat or motorboat, and would occupy the customhouse, the post office, and the telegraph office, and that when the vessel did come in our people would receive the arms and would see that they did not reach Mr. Huerta.

After perfecting this plan they submitted it to Washington for confirmation. In place of receiving a prompt reply from Washington, as they had a right to expect, they received the order the following morning about 7 o'clock telling them to go ahead and carry out their plan. They did so, and by some oversight a little handful of boys—they were nothing but lads down in the naval academy there—when they saw this foreign invasion, not knowing that the Mexican troops had been withdrawn, jumped in the breach and turned loose on the marines and killed a few of our people, and that was the trouble. Had our people gone in there—they should never have gone in, in the first place; it was a horrible outrage; I do not care who authorized it—had they gone in there as was planned, I am satisfied there would never have been a gun fired.

(Thereupon at 12.30 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m., at which time the hearing was continued as follows:)

AFTER RECESS.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SLOAN W. EMERY—Resumed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you acquainted with Mr. John Lind, who was sent by President Wilson to Mexico to eliminate Huerta from the Presidency of Mexico?

Mr. EMERY. Are you a mind reader? I was just going to tell you the pains I went to with John Lind to show him the manner of treatment that the Mexican peon received at the hands of the American hacendados. Yes, sir; I knew John Lind in Minnesota. I lived in Minnesota 25 years and thought a great deal of John Lind and watched his course in Congress with a great deal of interest—helped to elect him, in fact—and felt he was an old friend and one to whom an appeal could be made and that, perhaps, he would take some stock in the observations that I might offer.

Mr. KEARFUL. After John Lind presented his proposition to Huerta and had been unsuccessful in his mission at Mexico City, he went to Vera Cruz. While he was there did you have occasion to take him out to your plantation?

Mr. EMERY. I visited him in Vera Cruz immediately when I heard he was there. I had great hope that his coming would bring beneficial results with our Government, because I thought that representations could be made to him by people whose opinions he ought to have respected and might have some influence upon his actions. We had a great deal of business in Vera Cruz and I frequently was there.

Finally I received a letter that John and the admiral were coming with a little escort, and they did arrive. They spent a day with us. As I remember it, they spent a couple of nights at the finca, and we went all over the ground with them. I showed them the manner we had of handling our help and how they were treated. I took him out in the field and introduced him on our farm to one of the old caciques. He had a very good interpreter with him and he carried on quite a conversation with this man.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did John Lind know any Spanish?

Mr. EMERY. No. There is Mr. Wilson's great fault. I was taught as a boy a mighty homely old saw, never to measure another man's oats in your half bushel. Mr. Wilson's whole treatment of this affair down there, or rather this Government—I do not know that I should specify Mr. Wilson—has been that they could be handled as Americans could be handled. One has to have some insight into their character and into their disposition. You have to know the genesis of such people before you can measure them up or outline any line of action for them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the national origin of John Lind?

Mr. EMERY. I know he is a Scandinavian.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything more different that you can imagine than the temperament of a Scandinavian and a Mexican?

Mr. EMERY. No, indeed. I might add that within, I think, 60 days, or possibly 90 days, I addressed a letter to John Lind to this effect, that "I trust by this time you and President Wilson have had your bellies full of the Carranza régime," and signed myself "Very respectfully," but I never had a reply to that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What impression were you able to make upon him at that time?

Mr. EMERY. None whatever. I could not get anything. We talked about Carranza and what was being done up in the northwest. At that time the operations were confined mainly to the northwestern part of Mexico. He said he thought something could be done, etc., but I gathered my impressions from our resident Mexicans who were men of affairs, who were leaders and who studied the situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. And with whom you could talk?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; and whom I could sound out to get their ideas and their impression.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any other trip into the interior that John Lind ever made?

Mr. EMERY. I do not think he ever made any to a plantation except to ours.

Mr. KEARFUL. How far is your plantation from Vera Cruz?

Mr. EMERY. About 45 miles—106 kilometers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Lind expound to you any of his theories in regard to what should be done about Mexico?

Mr. EMERY. The only thing that I could gather was that he thought Carranza would be able to pull out and make good; that Carranza and Villa between them would pass by the country, and it was a longer shot and a better one than to attempt to place any dependence in Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had you been receiving protection to life and property and did you have all security under Huerta?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; and not only that but we had obtained permission to import arms into Mexico for the protection of our property from bandits, and it would often happen that a company of perhaps 100 men would come through and we would entertain them, we would provide them with quarters for the night and feed them, and they would move on to the next point. We enjoyed the very kindest relations with the Huerta government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever receive any concessions from Huerta?

Mr. EMERY. Never.

Mr. KEARFUL. Any special favors?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir; none except I might say the permission to bring arms into our plantation. We brought in 10 Winchester rifles and had our own police force that patrolled the grounds for months.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was merely for your protection?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Lind's idea about pacifying the country that was not in need of pacification? Was there any need to pacify the country that was safe and secure under Huerta?

Mr. EMERY. He knew there was a good deal of objection, that Huerta was putting up a very strong fight against Carranza. They seemed to have held Huerta responsible for the death of Madero. Nothing that you could say to the contrary seemed to alter that impression, that such a man was not fit, that no man that had the remotest association with such work should have the right to rule Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was the American administration idea?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that the Mexican idea?

Mr. EMERY. Oh, no, indeed. I think had a poll been taken as between Carranza and Huerta, at the time, say, six months after the assassination of Madero, that Gen. Huerta would have had practically the support of the American people by a very big majority.

Mr. KEARFUL. Lind thought it was the function of the American Government to supervise the political morals of the Mexicans and to put in any man that they might be satisfied with even if he was not acceptable to us?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; we were the people to be satisfied and not they. That was apparently the position he took.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he expound to you an idea which he subsequently published in a book about the pacification of Mexico depending upon the good Mexicans of the north defeating the bad Mexicans of the south?

Mr. EMERY. No; he did not. We had very few bad Mexicans in the south.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the truth about the difference between the Mexicans of the north and the Mexicans of the south?

Mr. EMERY. There is no comparison between them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which are the better?

Mr. EMERY. The southern Mexicans. Here is a point that I question whether it is generally known in the United States. What is your idea of a Mexican?

Mr. KEARFUL. I would rather have you tell the committee your idea.

Mr. EMERY. A Mexican is the result of the crossing of the Spanish blood with the native Indian. You know what they used to say about the northwestern Indian half-breed, that he inherited the vices of both and the virtues of neither. The old conquistadores—I expect you might scratch all hell and never find a tougher lot than those conquistadores that came into Mexico. We see what the Germans do and what they are doing everywhere they colonize. They are insisting on their people cohabiting or living with the native women in order to infuse their blood as largely as possible into the native races. As for the Indian, the pure Indian, the pure Aztec, he is a noble character. He is just as different from the American Indian as day is from night. The American Indian is a meat eater, he is a loafer, he is a tough, he is a roustabout, a good for nothing, prior to that time this Government had undertaken to starve them into something like making a living for themselves; but to the contrary the Mexican Indian is one of the finest original forces that this continent has ever known. He has been steady, law-abiding, peaceable, and industrious. He is not industrious in a way that we consider men industrious, because he can take 5 acres of land and can have a pig or two and his 5 acres of land will grow all the corn and beans he wants, and it will enable him to buy the very small outfit of clothing that is necessary and pay his taxes, and when you have done that what more does a man need to-day if you get right down to it? What is the use of worrying and fretting over the future and over life? Those people are the salt of the earth so far as the aborigines are concerned. They are the people we have in the south.

Mr. KEARFUL. They are the natives of the State of Oaxaca?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. By the way, I stated this morning that we recruited our labor largely from the natives of the State of Oaxaca. We had an association with two brothers whose grounds were almost in sight of the Pacific Ocean, and when the cane-grinding season came on we used to send there and say, "We need 200 or 300 or 400 people and would like to have them about such a time." We would send money that would enable them to make arrangements for the people to live, and they would come down there under a six months' contract, which was written up by their own officials, and we would pay their taxes in advance for them, and those people would march across the isthmus, an eight days' journey, and come in there and settle right into their work. We paid those people a dollar a tarea (task) for cutting cane, and oftentimes they would cut two or three tareas (tasks) a day. They were not locked up or anything of that sort. They were treated just as you would treat laborers in the United States. We had that relation with those people. They trusted us and would do anything in the world for us that we could ask them to do. There was never any trouble with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the history of Mexico two great men stand out with prominence, Benito Juarez and Porfirio Diaz. From what part of Mexico did those two men come?

Mr. EMERY. From the State of Oaxaca. I have said that when the true history was known Porfirio Diaz would rate with Abraham Lincoln. He was one of the finest characters I ever knew.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that opinion you are corroborated by Mr. William Jennings Bryan in an article published in 1903 in the Commoner.

Mr. EMERY. I had the pleasure of knowing Porfirio Diaz personally. Before going to Mexico I had been a director of the Montana Experiment Station for seven years, and when I got down there I saw a good many things that did not look right to me, and I volunteered and wrote the President of Mexico that if I could be of any service to his agricultural department in fostering the cause of agriculture down there I hoped he would command my services at any time without remuneration. It was money in our pockets to have better agriculture there. We were doing exactly what the cotton planter does down in Mississippi and the South. We were making a specialty of cane, while they are making a specialty of cotton. We needed things that could be produced outside of our plantation, and we needed them in abundance with the forces we had.

I received a nice letter from the President on the subject and some months later he offered me a position at one of the principal experiment stations, but, of course, I could not leave my own business there and undertake that. That was the nature of my relation with Gen. Diaz. I had nothing but the very highest respect for him. He did things that would be shocking to people up here, but he did them because they ought to be done.

I remember when I interviewed Gen. Funston, and he wanted to know my opinion, as to whether they would have trouble in going to Mexico City with the force then in Vera Cruz. I said, "If you handle this proposition right, Gen. Funston, there need never be a gun fired on your trip. If I were handling a campaign like that, I would pick out half a dozen responsible men who were well known to the next one or two towns on your journey. I would send those men ahead of me and have them call together the settlers and explain the situation, that you are going up to Mexico City to see if you can not get order, and that if they have anything to sell you will gladly buy it and pay for it.

"Then from town to town I would pick out and send runners ahead in that way, that would pave the way for them, and that they could go to the capital without having a shot fired." I said, "You are going to find when you go into the country this sort of thing: Men will say to you, 'Here is So-and-so, nothing but a notorious cattle thief and murderer; he is a bad man and he may make trouble.'" I said to Admiral Fletcher, "If you catch any of those people and want to make a good impression on the settlers, the law-abiding settlers, just shoot a few of them." He threw his hands up and said that would never do in the world; that those people would have to be tried. But they did not understand that sort of thing; they did not know anything about the slow movement of the law, which is a farce in many cases in this country.

I recall an incident where a family of people went out to a station a day's trip with some fat pigs. They sold those pigs and made their way back home. They reached home Saturday night. They were a day's journey from the station. Their little houses were scattered here and there, perhaps two or three hundred yards apart, a little settlement, of which there are many in Mexico. There is no motion seen around that property the next morning, so the neighbors went over to inquire and found that the eight people were lying around scattered through their little shacks with their throats cut and heads caved in. We had a contractor working for us and he happened to be on the ground, a very intelligent fellow, and he had foresight enough to note the tracks leading from the houses in the direction of an adjacent property. They immediately sent messengers down to the Atlixco advising of the situation, and the following day the jefe politico, together with his secretary, the judge of the district with his secretary, and a file of six gendarmes, came up to the vicinity by rail. They rode into this little settlement and rounded up everybody in the country and inquired into this business and looked into it thoroughly, and finally they located this family to whose house the tracks led, and they secured a confession. I think there were five of them, two boys and three men. There were three entrances to these houses. They put these boys at the entrances, and these other men went in there and did up the whole outfit.

They secured their confession, and they did this between Tuesday and Friday. Friday morning those five men were taken out, and they dug their graves and were stood up against the buildings and shot and buried, and that is all there was to it. It was that sort of dispensation of law that made that country safe for anybody and everybody.

There was a funny thing about that. That occurrence was on the same stream on which we were. That party came to our plantation and reached there between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon. They had had nothing to eat, and we were very glad to see them. We were always glad to see the officers and we entertained them. They procured a conveyance to take them to the next town. There was never a lisp about this occurrence. We knew nothing about it until some hours afterwards. The contractor followed them down the river and told us what had happened. That is the sort of thing that Mexicans have been accustomed to and that they expect. They expect justice swift and sure, and it is this that makes good Mexicans.

MR. KEARFUL. Did John Lind express to you his idea about the iniquitous operations of the church in Mexico and the necessity to take some drastic action to eliminate that influence from the Mexicans?

MR. EMERY. No. He talked very little. You may observe that when a man's head is set, when his "eyes are sot," so to speak, you can not get much of an argument out of him. The burden of his idea seemed to be that if we could just get rid of Huerta, everything would be serene and peaceable.

MR. KEARFUL. He thought Carranza and Villa were the men to do that?

MR. EMERY. Yes.

MR. KEARFUL. Nothing else seemed to have impressed his mind?

MR. EMERY. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about the influence of the church upon the Mexicans as to whether it is bad for them or not and whether it is one of the things that constitutes the problem in Mexico?

Mr. EMERY. To the extent of the ends justifying the means, I am not prepared to say that the church works along the right lines, and yet you have to consider this. There are people that if you deprive them of the Catholic religion there is nothing that will take its place.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the only religion that the large body of the natives have in Mexico, is it not?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; it is the only religion.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe as to their being very religiously inclined those who professed religion?

Mr. EMERY. We had a friend come down to visit us in the early years of my being down there. He was a particularly fine-looking young man. He happened to have on a clerical looking shirt and sack coat. He rode in to a Scotch plantation near there and the people rushed out and proceeded to take his hand and kiss it. He did not know what to make of it. They thought he was a priest. All of them were good Catholics, as good Catholics as I ever knew anything about.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they devoted in their religious exercises?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What character of men were the priests?

Mr. EMERY. I think you might say that the Mexican is very much more faithful about his religion than the Protestants are about theirs.

Mr. KEARFUL. What character of men were the priests?

Mr. EMERY. In the main they were very good. We had of course, the black sheep. There was a priest killed in a little village 4 kilometers from us by a prostitute woman he had been living with. There were some little trouble between them and she stuck a knife in him and killed him. There was nothing said about that. The church shut it up, and there was no scandal about it. They have some queer ideas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe that the priests made improper use of their influence over the lower classes for the purpose of extorting money from them?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the priests seem to be really conscientious in the exercise of their functions?

Mr. EMERY. I have known first and last a great many ministers of the Gospel. I never knew one that enjoyed a higher place in my estimation than Father Riley of Cordoba. He was an Irish priest who in times of yellow fever established his own private hospital and went out and gathered by himself persons stricken with this disease and carried them in and did everything in his power that he could for the sick and distressed always. He was a wonderful man. We had a resident priest in the village 4 kilometers from us that was a splendid character, always counseling and advising good living and upright actions on the part of his people. You have to stop and consider this, that those people have the influence. If they told a man to do right it would go a long way further in the direction of causing him to do right than if one of us told him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe whether or not that influence was exerted for good?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; always. If there was any suggestion that we had that would be better for the people, he always fell in with it and was anxious to do all he could to help along for the betterment of his people. I attributed in no small degree our success, if it may be called a success—because I think it was up to the time we were forcibly deprived of the opportunity to go further—to the fact that we recognized their rights to enjoy whatever religion they pleased, and we did not attempt to force any other ideas upon them. We took it as a matter of fact that anybody that belonged in that country was Catholic by nature and by birth and by practice. There was a little church in that village said to be 200 years old.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you place the blame for the present disturbed conditions in Mexico? Upon whom do you mostly place the blame?

Mr. EMERY. I think the lack of confidence that one Mexican has in another has a great deal to do with the situation. There are no big men, when you get right down to it, in these revolutionary movements. I think there was one man down there, Gen. Alvarez. It was a great pity that he was killed, for there was a very fine man. Felix Diaz was another. Those people were above graft, they were above petty malicious looting or plundering. They believed in Mexico and wanted to see it come out in the open and be a strong nation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the interference of the American administration in Mexican affairs in the time of Huerta had anything to do with the subsequent trouble?

Mr. EMERY. I think it has all to do with it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who do you think was responsible for that?

Mr. EMERY. I have felt that Mr. Bryan was originally to blame and that he headed the Government in that direction, and that they thought perhaps the better things to do was to try to make good on those lines.

There is no question in my mind whatever that had Gen. Huerta been recognized by this Government, as he was by nearly every other government of importance, that the troubles would have been over in Mexico long ago. Huerta wanted to do right and that is more than some of these other people have been doing. Do you know the primary cause of this trouble?

Mr. KEARFUL. What are your ideas about it?

Mr. EMERY. A brother of my cashier saw among the first checks drawn by the Madero Government a check for $685,000 to the Waters-Pierce Oil Co. We were paying $8 a case for kerosene oil under the Waters-Pierce administration. Cowdray came down there and opened up those oil wells and immediately began to attempt to get into a standing with the people there that could not be done, and they began striking back and forth until oil was worth $2.75. Of course, that was Mexican money. Eight pesos a case was $4 American money or 40 cents a gallon for kerosene. That is a pretty good price, you know, in those days when we were selling oil here for about 10 cents a gallon.

Pierce and his people have their concessions on all that oil territory from Mr. Diaz. He was a very strong man. He did a great deal in Mexico. I know that Pearson, both in Salina Cruz and in Vera Cruz, spent a great deal of government money in fitting that region up to do business. They had great confidence in him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was this man?

Mr. EMERY. He is now Lord Cowdray. The Standard Oil Co. had done nothing except put in a vast refinery or two, and these other people had been exploiting these mixed oil products down there, and it has always been my opinion that that was the original source of the attempt to break down the Diaz government. They knew there was no use trying to handle that Government as long as the Diaz people were on earth.

Mr. KEARFUL. What to your mind is the significance of the payment of this large check you speak of?

Mr. EMERY. Moneys they had advanced the Maderos to carry on that revolution. They were friendly to anything that should upset the Diaz Government and were willing to show their friendship by advancing funds.

Mr. KEARFUL. After Madero had been in power for some time and the effects of his rule were felt, what was the prevailing opinion among intelligent Mexicans as to whether his rule was a success?

Mr. EMERY. I think they realized it was an utter failure.

Mr. KEARFUL. When Madero fell and Huerta came into power, what was the general feeling among intelligent Mexicans as to the prospects of improvement?

Mr. EMERY. We received our mail about 5 o'clock in the evening. My people usually came around the office about that time to get their mail and to talk over the doings of the day and plan the work for the morrow. I shall never forget the incident. We had four or five very bright Mexicans in our employ, and when the paper came in there narrating the facts of Madero's assassination and the occupancy of the position by Huerta, I could see those people all sit back with a satisfied look and "Thank God" on their faces. That was the expression on their faces that the farce was ended of the Madero administration of the Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. They received it with equanimity, or with satisfaction?

Mr. EMERY. With the greatest satisfaction. The result had been so disappointing to them and so unsatisfactory, the administration of affairs under Madero, that they received this news with the greatest satisfaction.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you know about the feeling of substantial Mexicans in regard to Carranza and the prospect of successful government by him?

Mr. EMERY. I have had very little intercourse with Mexicans since leaving there, and I am not prepared to say, but I think the majority of them would welcome something of a change—that is, the right change. I wrote a great many letters in the early days of trouble down there, I would say perhaps three or four letters, to Mr. Bryan, calling attention to the fact of what would be the result of intervention and the position Americans would be in down there, and urged that everything be done to prevent that catastrophe. Very little attention was ever paid to this. Sometimes I would get an acknowledgment of a letter, but that would be about all.

I have quite changed my mind, very much. I think if we ever wanted to do anything with Mexico or in Mexico that it could not be done by our going down there as an armed body and compelling those people. The better read Mexicans have never forgotten the separation of so much of their territory from them by the United States. There is a constant fear and dread that is in the minds of Mexicans that sooner or later the Americans expect to take Mexico the same as they have territory that they already have acquired formerly from Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think this country ought to do, if anything?

Mr. EMERY. I think we ought to tread on the toes of the Monroe doctrine enough to ask England and France to join us in issuing an ultimatum to the Carranza government to get down and out and get out of the way of people that would be selected by a suitable committee or body that would be put in charge of the business of Mexico in the various States and the Republic at large, and that due provision be made for the payment of damages that have resulted from all this horrible work, and that when the things were in shape so that they could be turned back to the Mexicans, that they would be given the right of way in the matter.

I have thought that on this account, that with the feeling already so bitter against Americans, if we attempt to do it ourselves it will make an unending source of bitterness with the American people, whereas if these parties are jointly interested with us, quite as much or more than we are, were to join with us, they would not dare buck such a combination.

Mr. KEARFUL. They would not have the feeling then towards Americans?

Mr. EMERY. If the French and English join with us in a matter of that sort, I do not think there would ever be a harsh word or thought toward anybody. They would feel that here are these three great nations through whom our only hope lies, that this thing is the best thing for us, and we are going to submit peaceably, whereas if any one undertakes to do it, we will again find that they are a cocky race. Gen. Huerta was heard to say one day with 80,000 men he could take Washington.

Mr. KEARFUL. He believed it, too, did he not?

Mr. EMERY. I think so. I think he was perfectly honest about it. A friend of mine sat at the adjoining table and heard him make that statement. You can not conceive of the ignorance and of the lack of information that those people have. There is no means of passing information back and forth. They have no public press outside of the cities. They used to take fresh fish to the old tiendas (stores) in Mexico City, a day's run from Vera Cruz, a 10-mile jaunt, and they get their information about the same way to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. A great majority of the people are not able to read to-day even if they had papers, are they?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir, but I want to say one thing. In the 15 years we have had a $100,000 of business with one firm and we had an extended business relation, you might say, from the City of Mexico down in many different places. I do not know that it is any more peculiar than the United States. The various industries seem to be located in centers. Puebla is a great center for everything in the line of earthenware, and they make just as fine china as you ever saw come from France or from any of those places. The various industries are scattered around. We would have our dealings wherever we would find we could buy these things first hand. I never yet have found an error in a Mexican invoice. They were accurate, they were correct. If you bought a bill of goods from those people you got what you bought. You did not have to go through and examine it and tally up and see whether weights and quality were right and whether you were getting things you paid for or not. They were good people to do business with. In other words, the people who are educated are better educated by far than the business men of this country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you find to be the character of the ignorant Mexicans with reference to honesty and responsibility before the Madero revolution?

Mr. EMERY. We were there for 10 years before the Madero revolution broke out. For a good part of that time we lived a mile from anybody—that is, any of our forces. They were off down in the other part of the plantation, and we were up by ourselves in a frame building screened with wire. We had no locks for the doors. We did not dream of ever locking anything. The doors were open day and night, and in 10 years there I lost a pocketknife and a pair of glasses. We could take a barefooted peon and give him a draft for $500 or $800 and send him to the railway, and he would trot out there, and we did not any more doubt his getting that money back than if I sent 10 men down here to the bank with a like draft and asked them to bring the money to this office.

Mr. KEARFUL. You found them to be thoroughly trustworthy?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; when I went down there we were quite a distance from our source of supply financially. It cost us $6 per $1,000 express rates to get currency down into that country. I began canvassing with the little traders around through the country there for 10 or 15 or 20 miles about us. There were a great many little tiendas (stores), all of them doing more or less business. It took me four years to say to those people, "You are paying $6 per $1,000 to send money out, and we are paying $6 per $1,000 to bring it back. Bring your money to us, and let us give you drafts on Mexico City." The point is that after we got the confidence of those people we never had to bring a dollar in by express. As fast as they would get $100 or $200 they would come right in to us and turn over the money and say, "I would like to have a check for $100 or $200 for so-and-so." That was all there was to it. That relation existed up to the very last. It showed that once we secured the confidence of those people there was no further trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the native character of the large majority of the people of Mexico is such that they are capable of being a great people and of having a good government?

Mr. EMERY. With the right rulers I believe they would. They would be law abiding.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that that condition has been impaired by recent revolutions?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; it will take a long while to recover the equilibrium that they enjoyed before, because they have been able to get so much for nothing during these years of trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe if this Government had not interfered to eliminate Huerta and impose Villa and Carranza on Mexico, that the conditions would have remained as they were and improvement would have gone on?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; I have not the least question of it. I have not any doubt of it whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not it is true that in addition to the sufferings of foreigners in Mexico, that the Mexican lower classes have suffered infinitely more on account of the revolutions?

Mr. EMERY. The Mexicans themselves?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. EMERY. Oh, Lord, yes. The mortality there has been terrible. There is one thing to remember. If you have read your Prescott, as doubtless you have, you know that they used to sacrifice 25,000 people a year—at least, they were said to, and we have every reason to believe, whether there were that many or not, more or less were made away with. The blood is in their veins and in their minds, and you have to take that into account when you come to consider any of these revolutionary problems.

Mr. KEARFUL. The point I was getting at was this: If the American administration interfered in such wise as to injure this great nation of people as you have described, is not this country under a duty to right that wrong?

Mr. EMERY. They certainly are.

Mr. KEARFUL. Irrespective of the rights of foreigners?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or of American citizens?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In other words, if this country imposed upon the Mexican people a predatory band from the north led by Villa and Carranza, it is the duty of this Government to take some action to correct that mistake?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir; absolutely.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that as a matter of good policy we ought to invite some of the other great nations to join us in that work?

Mr. EMERY. I think there would be a great deal less bloodshed and a great deal less loss of property and life if that were done. They would realize the fact that it was hopeless to resist.

There has been a great deal said, and it has been said mainly by the Madero crowd, "Can the científicos"—I do not know whether that expression was ever used as a mark of opprobrium, because I knew a great many of those people and they were the people that made Mexico. They were the people that put their currency on a 50 per cent basis, and that built those railroads and that made it possible for Mexico to make the progress she did make, and yet there is scarcely one of those people in that Republic to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further that you desire to say that you have not already covered; anything that you would like to state to the committee, Mr. Emery?

Mr. EMERY. I do not know that there is anything further than this, that as an American and a man that is proud of his country I would like to see something done to restore respect for Americans and for the United States. So far as our property down there is concerned we have practically kissed it good-bye, although we have a claim for $200,000.

We have a bond issue of $200,000 and they have not all been disposed of, but a large percentage of them have, perhaps 75 per cent.

The trustee for our bonds filed a claim on the $200,000 for the loss of our first crop with the Mexican Government, through the Brazilian minister, who was then acting for us down there, and also here in Washington. We feel that the action of this Government has damaged us personally, not only in the loss of our property that stands us over a million dollars, but that we could have made very easily a million dollars since the time we were dispossessed down there owing to this action. We had not the remotest question in our minds that this Government will have to stand the shock on a lot of this stuff.

When it comes to establishing the exact blame for the situation down there I think it will be found by right-thinking people and by the Supreme Court of the United States that the United States is back of the trouble and the loss that has been sustained by people who were down there honestly trying to make a living.

In the early days of our being down there, personally Gen. Diaz has told everybody that ever called on him, and our people always called on him whenever they were passing through, that anything in the world he could do to help us he wanted to do, and if there was anything ever arose that demanded attention from the Government just let him know and he would see that the business was seen to. He had every reason to be satisfied with our being there. He was glad we were there.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke of the possibility of your making a million dollars profits if you had been allowed to proceed?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would that profit have been a detriment to anybody? Would you have been taking any money away from anybody?

Mr. EMERY. On the contrary, we would have been clothing and feeding thousands of people, literally thousands who have suffered since.

Mr. KEARFUL. You would have been taking nothing out of the country?

Mr. EMERY. Nothing.

Mr. KEARFUL. On the contrary, you would have been doing good there?

Mr. EMERY. We had 1,200 investors in our company, many of them people who could ill afford the loss of that property down there. We would have been able to do the right thing by those people. We were just getting to the position where we could go right ahead.

Mr. KEARFUL. For every dollar of profit that you made the country itself would have been correspondingly benefited?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir. We had a little family trouble down there that I might relate. A family row in our certificate company resulted in an investigation of the affairs of the Vista Hermosa Sugar & Mercantile Co. in Mexico through chartered accountants, who spent five weeks in investigating the books and records of the company. The closing sentence of their report to the parties who had sent them there was that they discovered nothing reflecting on the honesty of the administration of the affairs of that company, but on the contrary they had observed every effort made to be economical and careful in the management of the property.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did your company ever have any difficulty with the Mexican authorities?

Mr. EMERY. No sir. I have heard a great deal of the disposition of Mexicans to graft, to cinch people. I recollect we had a cuadrilla that came in there through the contratista, the first and only deal that we ever had with him. He went off and fixed up a lot of people, some 200, without making any contracts with them. He gave them a verbal talk to the effect that we were going to have them come up there and work as long as they wanted to and when they got through they could quit. That did not suit us at all. We could not depend on that sort of labor. When he turned these people over to us he said he had left the contracts on the train and would go back and get them. He went back to see if he could recover his little file of papers, but he never showed up again. He had our money and we had the people.

We undertook to reason with them and to have them see that they could not do business in that way. Finally they became rather obstreperous and were determined to quit. The clerk of the jefe politico up in the district in which we belonged happened to come through one Sunday afternoon and we explained the situation to him. He was then making his way to Vera Cruz but he stopped and went down to where these people were and spent the entire afternoon with them, reasoning with them and talking with them, and urging them to stay and fulfill the contract; that while they no doubt had been abused in the matter, that we had been abused also, and if they would go ahead and work their contract as we expected and had been promised, everything would be all right.

He came back after spending two or three hours with those people and had them pacified and good natured. I said, "What do we owe you?" "Oh, nothing at all, Senor; nothing." "Oh," I said, "That is not fair. You are down here on your own business and you have done us a very great service and I would be glad to pay you for it." But I could not get that man to take a cent for his trouble. Finally I said, "I want you to buy your wife a little present," and I put a $10 bill in his pocket.

That is the kind of graft we suffered from. A similar case in this country with a man of like authority, taking his life in his hands to go among people like that and persuade them to do something they did not want to do, would probably have cost us anywhere from $50 to $100 to fix the matter up with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was in the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are not familiar with conditions in regard to graft since the Carranzistas came into power?

Mr. EMERY. Only as I get correspondence from the people down there who are looking after our business. They deplore the situation. I noted in Miss Wetherell's report that in one letter the statement was made that if President Wilson had not interfered with Huerta, everything would have been all right. That is the opinion of people down there who really desire the good of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I care to ask, Mr. Emery. Is there anything further you desire to say?

Mr. EMERY. I do not think of anything further; no.

Mr. KEARFUL. Thank you very much, then; you are excused.

(Witness excused.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., April 10, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF LEROY H. AULT.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your full name?

Mr. AULT. LeRoy H. Ault.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live?

Mr. AULT. No. 1408 Oregon Avenue, Steubenville, Ohio.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you a native-born American citizen?

Mr. AULT. I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. From what State?

Mr. AULT. The State of Ohio.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long were you in Mexico?

Mr. AULT. From 1906 until 1914, with the exception of the year 1913, when I was detained at home on account of sickness in the family.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your business in Mexico?

Mr. AULT. First as a bookkeeper on a plantation of which I was subsequently the manager.

Mr. KEARFUL. What plantation?

Mr. AULT. La Esmeralda, located on the Tesechoacan River, above Perez Station, on the Vera Cruz & Isthmus Railroad.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what State?

Mr. AULT. In the State of Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the extent of this plantation and what was the purpose of it?

Mr. AULT. The property consisted of 3,614 acres and was originally purchased by an American company for the purpose of developing a rubber property.

Mr. KEARFUL. What improvements were placed on it?

Mr. AULT. The original company, comprised of Ohio people as stockholders largely, started into rubber raising, but realizing that it would be a number of years before they could receive a return upon which they might pay dividends, decided on the raising of short crops and the erection of a sugar and aguardiente mill. This company erected a sugar and aguardiente plant which cost about $44,000 American gold, erected a large dwelling house, store and office buildings, and various other buildings, but after a period of some three years became financially embarrassed and was forced into the hands of a receiver.

The proposition was taken over by the stockholders in 1906, at which time further developments were resumed. This company, being limited in capital, were closed out by the maturity of the preferred stock about 1910 and a new company was organized under the laws of Arizona and funds were furnished to continue the development.

Mr. KEARFUL. Approximately what amount of money was invested in this plantation?

Mr. AULT. The original company claimed to have expended about $185,000 American money; the second company some $10,000 or $15,000; and the company which now owns the property expended in the neighborhood of $20,000 American money.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of labor was employed?

Mr. AULT. Mexican labor exclusively.

Mr. KEARFUL. How many employees were there?

Mr. AULT. In the dull or rainy season the number on the pay roll would generally be reduced to 15 to 25, and in the busy season, from December until May or June, would run from 100 to 150 or 180.

Mr. KEARFUL. I judge from your statement that the operations of the plantation were never profitable?

Mr. AULT. Oh, yes; there were.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what point did they become profitable?

Mr. AULT. To the extent that after 1911 we were not only self-supporting—that is, we were able to carry our own overhead—but we were able to further our development work. When I first reached the property in 1906 the cleared area would not exceed 175 acres. When I left in 1914 we had approximately 1,100 acres cleared, 1,400 acres fenced on the boundary, with the necessary field fences between, had increased our main acreage by some 75 acres and replanted all of the original 105 acres.

We had an official survey made of our property, repaired all our own buildings, added additional buildings both of yellow pine and native lumbers, built concrete buildings and bridges, and increased our holdings of cattle from about 20 head to 150, of course taking care of repairs and improvements to our mill, with the addition of machinery and the natural increment that would be attendant upon such development work.

We also planted fruit trees, citrus trees, cedars, and were beginning a large planting of cacao or cocoa.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the plantation in 1914 fully equipped for thorough operation?

Mr. AULT. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the prospect for profits at that time?

Mr. AULT. By reason of the fact that we had some 500 acres of pasture upon which we could place the cattle, had the conditions warranted the expenditure, we would have been in a position to have paid a very considerable dividend within the next year or two.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any trouble at all during the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. AULT. Never.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have every protection and feel entirely secure?

Mr. AULT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was it during the time of Madero?

Mr. AULT. It was somewhat turbulent. We were visited by bandit groups on at least three occasions. At one of those times 60 alleged Maderistas dropped in upon us and spent three days as our guests, appropriated or enlisted a number of our contract laborers to their ranks, and requested donations of cash and merchandise and clothing and food to equip their men, but caused no other damage. The damage in that case amounted, as we subsequently figured, to close to 1,000 pesos.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was during the Madero revolution?

Mr. AULT. That was in the month of March or April of 1911.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before the accession of Madero to the presidency?

Mr. AULT. As a matter of fact, the Mexico City papers that were received on the evening of the second day after we had these distinguished visitors stated that Madero had signed an armistice and that all fighting would cease, but nevertheless this same group of bandits proceeded up the river and captured a couple of little towns up there almost without the exchange of a shot. They proceeded to possess themselves of such movable property in mercantile establishments as appealed to their desires. From there they proceeded to Cosamoloapam, the head of that canton, where they entered, as I recall, in the latter days of June of that year.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive protection during the presidency of De la Barra prior to the accession of Madero?

Mr. AULT. I could not say we received the protection, but we did not have any molestations during that period, as I believe it was rather short.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition of affairs after Madero became president until he fell, in February, 1913?

Mr. AULT. In the latter part of April, 1912, I was obliged to make two trips to Vera Cruz, the first extending over a period of 10 days and the second 16 days, in order to be absent from the property at the time of the expected and subsequently consummated visits of rebel groups that came from Oaxaca Mountains. They appropriated some animals and men, but did not do our property any damage.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the condition under Huerta from February, 1913, to July, 1914?

Mr. AULT. During the year 1913 I was not in Mexico, but after my return there the latter part of January, 1914, and until we were instructed by the American consul in April to leave, we had no visits from any disturbing elements.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive any notices from the American State Department, through the consul, in 1913, to get out of the country?

Mr. AULT. I presume that we did. I know that there were occasions when certain manifestoes went out that all Americans that considered that they were not in protected places or were in any immediate danger, should leave Mexico forthwith. As we did not consider that we were in a really turbulent region of the country, there was no occasion for us abandoning our properties and allowing everything to go to pot.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened when you were notified to get out in 1914?

Mr. AULT. Do you want the conditions attendant or how we came to be advised?

Mr. KEARFUL. Just tell the story in your own way.

Mr. AULT. On Saturday evening, the 18th of April, 1914, I believe, a neighbor from an American plantation farther up the river came in with another American and informed me of a cable that he had received from San Francisco that day, in which he was instructed to "ship cattle at once," which was a code that was prearranged with the people in the States, meaning to leave the country at once or "beat it."

We had noticed in the Mexican Herald of some two or three days previous, that the Ward Line steamer Esperanza had canceled her sailing of that week and had discharged all freight. So the following morning early I wrote a letter to the American consul, Canada, at Vera Cruz, and sent it in for the morning train, so it would reach Vera Cruz that evening; that is, the evening of the 19th.

Mr. KEARFUL. Let that letter go in the record.

Mr. AULT. I will read it:

LAS ESMERALDA, VERA CRUZ,
April 19, 1914.

W. W. CANADA, Esq.,
American Consul, Vera Cruz, Vera Cruz.

MY DEAR SIR: Mr. Charles McKim came in last night and advised that he had gotten a wire from his people in San Francisco to "ship the cattle at once," which was to mean "beat it." We saw in the Herald that the Esperanza sailing was canceled, and can not help but think there is something on foot, so am writing you to ask what you know about things.

I might remind you that your clerk arranged a code with me in case we should go, and we will gladly reimburse you for any expenses incurred in wiring us, only don't fail. Everything is quiet about here and we feel that there was some improvement of conditions, but these circumstances are disquieting, so please let me hear from you by return mail or wire if you consider it necessary.

Very sincerely, yours,

LEROY H. AULT.

Mr. KEARFUL. What answer did you receive from that letter?

Mr. AULT. On April 21, 1914, about 1 p. m., I received from a messenger of our own, that we had making morning and afternoon trips to the railroad station some 13 miles distant, a telegram as follows:

VERA CRUZ, April 20.

TO LEROY H. AULT,
Las Esmeralda.

Ship your cattle with McKim.

CANADA.

(Received in Cordoba at 7.45 a. m.)

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you understand to be the significance of that telegram?

Mr. AULT. That we should immediately take steps to reach Vera Cruz, that we might secure protection.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you then do?

Mr. AULT. I immediately sent messengers to advise all my American neighbors of its contents and advising them that I considered it advisable to take the morning train for Vera Cruz on the following day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please proceed and relate your experiences following that.

Mr. AULT. On the following morning five of us left our property on horseback, with a very limited amount of handgrips and proceeded to Perez Station to await the arrival of the train. There we were informed by the station agent, who was also the telegraph operator, that the Americans going north on the train the day before had been taken from the train at Tierra Blanca and thrown into jail, and it was reported that they had been ordered executed. We felt that we did not care to get on the train and ride into a proposition of that kind, and decided then that we would await such developments as the station agent, who was a good friend of ours and was of a great deal of assistance, as was subsequently proved, might inform us of the possibilities of taking the afternoon train in an endeavor to reach Puerto Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is a port south of Vera Cruz on another railroad?

Mr. AULT. On the Pan-American Railroad at its Gulf terminal. After the suggestion of the station agent, who informed us that a troop train was approaching, we rode back into the woods about a mile from the depot and stayed there until after the troop train had pulled up, taken water, and departed.

When the passenger train was due we also went back to the woods, as we had given up any idea of taking passage on it. After that we returned to the station and learned from the agent that the employees of a large sugar plantation on the river south had taken an engine and some cars and had set out on their own accord presumably to go to Santa Lucrecia and transfer to the Tehuantepec National and go to Puerto Mexico.

At about 11 o'clock we were informed by the operator that the telegraph line south had been cut and the dispatcher had been unable to get any advice of the whereabouts or probable whereabouts of this train of refugees from that sugar property. We then decided, as communications were cut south, there was nothing for us to do except to follow out the understanding that we had had for some two years previously with the American consul at Vera Cruz, that in the event of rail communication being cut, we would proceed down the river from that point to the coast at Alvarado, where we would await rescue from Vera Cruz which he might be able to instigate.

While we were discussing whether or not to follow that advice or go to the Oaxaca Mountains and secrete ourselves until we could determine whether or not this was the first step of American intervention in Mexico, dinner was ready at the hotel and we went in. As we were finishing the meal, one of my employees who was accompanying us came in and informed me that a former station agent at that place was attempting to enlist a number of the natives of the village to rob us and disarm us before we got out of town. I immediately gave orders that the horses be saddled and made hasty arrangements to proceed down the river to the municipal seat of that municipality of Tesechoacan, where we understood that we might secure a boat with a couple of native oarsmen to conduct us down the river to the coast.

I had taken the precaution to secure a number of letters of reference to merchants in Tlacotalpam, a town of considerable size, about 8 miles from the mouth of the river. I found that my finances were in such condition that it was necessary for me to effect a loan of 500 pesos to guarantee me sufficient funds to reach Vera Cruz. Similar financial assistance was secured by two other members of the party.

Mr. KEARFUL. They secured this assistance from Mexicans?

Mr. AULT. From Spanish merchants who operated mercantile business there. As soon as all arrangements were completed we left town very hurriedly, reaching Tesechoacan before 4 o'clock, where, through the good offices of a partner in the firm from whom we had received financial assistance at the railroad station, a boat and two Mexicans were secured for our passage down the river. Our horses were returned with our employees to our respective plantations.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mexican employees?

Mr. AULT. Yes, sir; we proceeded down the river, traveling all that night and the next day and toward evening approached the town of Tlacotalpam. Not knowing what developments or what action on the part of the American troops or American Government might have been carried on since we left the railroad the day previously, we deemed it advisable to write a note to one of the mercantile firms at Tlacotalpam to whom I had a letter of reference, stating that we were merely peaceful American planters who were attempting to reach safety at Vera Cruz, asking this firm that they advise us by the bearer, who was one of our boatmen, if it was safe for us to go to their town and if there was any possibility or probability of our being able to arrange for a fishing smack to conduct us to Vera Cruz.

After a wait of some two hours the messenger returned with a typewritten letter on plain paper, unsigned, stating that they would be very pleased to meet us and be of any assistance possible. They told the messenger by word of mouth that there was considerable feeling in the town by reason of the American occupation of Vera Cruz, and that no other armed action had been taken by the American Government, but advised us to call upon an American who lived a short distance below where we had tied up our boat to the bank awaiting the return of our messenger.

Two of us immediately proceeded to this American house, stated who we were and whence we came, and were very royally received by him and his family. He of course expressed his opinion as to the American interference in Vera Cruz, but stated that he felt there would be no personal danger attending our going to Tlacotalpam. As we had been subsisting during our trip on dry bread and chocolate, he insisted that we come in and partake of such food as they were able to furnish.

About 9 o'clock that night we left his place in our boat, armed with a letter from him to the hotel keeper in Tlacotalpam, ordering him to take us in and see that we were well taken care of.

We went to this town, two of the members of our party went to the hotel, where they were at first refused admission, being told that they had no room. They then showed the letter from this American, and he said that he would take care of us then. They returned to the boat, and we unloaded our few belongings, told our boatman that we had learned that it was a matter of life and death with them that if they were found in the vicinity and it was learned that they had assisted any Americans to escape it would mean serious trouble for them, and urged them to make all haste to get as far back up the river before daylight as their strength might allow. We proceeded to the hotel and were taken in, cautioned to be very quiet, assigned to rooms, and very soon were peacefully sleeping.

The next morning, as my room mate and I went out in the patio of the hotel, the hotel keeper asked if we had heard any disturbance during the night, to which we replied negatively, whereupon he stated that our entrance into the town had been noted, and that the story had gone out that a number of American soldiers, heavily armed, with large baskets of money, were stopping in the hotel. A small mob was formed and went to the hotel and demanded admittance. The hotel keeper refused, and they were on the point of making threats to break open the door and take us out and deal summarily with us, when the small police force of two or three men arrived, and were able to prevail upon them to wait until morning, until the mayor might investigate the matter. He said the mayor had sent up at daybreak that morning to inquire who we were and what he knew of us, and that he had sent word back inviting the mayor to come up and conduct an investigation for himself.

As we were finishing breakfast the mayor came in, and was introduced to us, and we made known to him who we were and what we were endeavoring to accomplish. It developed in this interview that he was a brother of a very particular Mexican friend of mine in Vera Cruz, one of whose boys was at that time in my employ, and another one had been previously for a number of years. As we concluded the meal we took him to our room and showed him through our baggage, and convinced him from letters that our statements were true, showing him at the same time a number of letters that I had received from his brother at Vera Cruz, which seemed to satisfy him as to our good intentions.

He stated to us that as the Mexican gun boat Progreso upon its return to Vera Cruz from a trip down the coast after the American invasion had been refused anchorage at Vera Cruz, they had come down the coast, and anchored at the mouth of the Papaloapam River, and the commander had issued orders that no boats carrying passengers or foodstuffs would be permitted to go to sea bound for Vera Cruz; therefore, that until that order could be lifted it would be impossible for us to go out by water.

We then asked him if he knew of any reason why we might not stay at the hotel until such arrangement could be perfected, and he said he did not, but that he would have to order us, in view of the feeling of the populace toward all Americans, not to go out on the street or be seen in front of the hotel, and that in order to enable him to assure the people of the town that we were not American soldiers heavily armed, as it had been reported, that we turn over to him our pistols and ammunition for safe-keeping, so that he might tell them all that we were defenseless, promising that when arrangements were made for our leaving there that our pistols and ammunition would be returned to us.

While he was still with us, chatting very sociably, the American at whose place we had stopped the night before came in and asked me for a letter of reference to another business man in town, that he might go and see this wealthy merchant, who was very influential, and a large property owner in town, and who he felt sure would be able to make the arrangements for us to get to Vera Cruz without any delay. He returned shortly with this gentleman and while we were discussing the possibilities of making arrangements for our leaving, the mayor excused himself—that is, the Alcalde—saying that it was time to hold court.

We were chatting very congenially with the Mexican and American gentlemen when of a sudden the mayor reappeared, somewhat pale, very much excited, and asked, "What are you going to do?" I replied, "We are going to stay right here." He said, "Oh, my God, you can not do that." I asked him why and he said he had been waited on by a delegation of citizens when he returned to his office and had been informed that it had always been a peaceful community and no foreigners had ever been mistreated there, but that things had come to such a pass and the populace was so incited that they were certain that it would be almost suicide for us to consider remaining there and that we would have to take steps to leave immediately.

I stated to him that we had sent our boats back by the river the night before and had no means of exit other than by foot. Not knowing the country and it being quite densely populated for a rural district, we felt that nothing more could happen to us in the town than would on the road, and therefore we felt it was up to him to afford us some protection. I suggested to him that he might put us in jail for safe-keeping, to which he promptly replied that he could not do that because they might tear the jail down.

He then requested the Mexican gentleman present to offer a solution for the situation. The gentleman replied that he would attempt to secure a boat and a couple of oarsmen to take us back up the river as far as we might want to go and, if we deemed necessary, to return us to the railroad station from which we had set out three days before.

We suggested to the mayor that it would be necessary, in view of the feeling of the populace to afford us a safe conduct to the river where we might embark in the boat—in other words, to see us safely off. He became very much annoyed and stated that that was his busy day and that he would like to help us, but he was so situated that he could not devote the time to it, but said "This gentleman here has been a life-long resident and is the most respected man in the town, and no better conduct could be afforded you than to have him accompany you personally." The gentleman agreed that after making arrangements for the boat he would return to the hotel and conduct us to the river, but that we might remain until after the noon day meal.

Both the mayor and the Mexican gentleman referred to left at once, and within a very short period the actual lessee, whose brother had been in charge of the hotel during his absence to Vera Cruz where he had gone to bring back a daughter that was in school there, came in and manifested consternation to find that he had five Americans in his hotel. He immediately informed us that we would have to leave at once.

We stated that arrangements were being made to secure a boat and that the gentleman would return to take us out to the boat after lunch. He stated that we could not wait that long, that we would have to leave at once. We told him that he need not have any fear on that score, that we were not going to do him any harm. He said he did not fear from us but from the people of the town, stating that the building was merely leased or rented by him, and that should the property be damaged in any way it might take him the remainder of his life to earn enough to reimburse the owner, and that he felt in view of the situation that we would excuse his urgency in the matter.

We asked him for time to get some of our effects together to make an endeavor to secure our arms. He said that our arms were still in the building and that he would certainly guarantee that they would be turned over to us as soon as we were ready to leave town, adding that he would personally conduct us to the river and there await the arrival of the boat to take us out.

As soon as he could make the necessary arrangements, we were conducted out the back door into the alley, through the back streets and avenues, headed for a point at the very outside of the village. A crowd of men and the usual complement of dogs soon formed and followed in our wake, hooting and jeering at us. However, we reached the river front without mishap, and there we were enclosed in a salt warehouse to await the arrival of the promised transportation.

Within a few minutes the gentleman who had gone out in search of a boat and oarsmen came in very much out of breath, pulled off his hat, mopped his brow and exclaimed, "Thank God you are here." He said, "I heard you had been taken out of the hotel, but I did not know whether by friends or foes." He stated that he had been able to secure but one man, but he felt we would be safe there and that the people who were outside, that he talked to before he came in, would not harm us, and that he would make another attempt to secure another man. The one he had arranged for accompanied him into the building, but within a few minutes after the departure of this gentleman in search of a companion for the one who was there, this latter man stepped outside for a few moments, after which he returned and informed us that his neighbors outside had informed him that if he took a hand in assisting us to leave the town, that they would make things very uncomfortable for him upon his return, and therefore that he found himself obliged to withdraw from the undertaking.

About a half hour afterwards the Mexican gentleman returned with the unwelcome news that he had not been able to secure another boatman or launch either, and that he did not know what we could do. As all of us had had some experience in handling boats, we stated to him that if he would furnish us a boat and one large paddle and enough small paddles for the other four to operate, that we would undertake to effect our own escape. He said we might take any of the boats in front of the building, as he was the owner of the building and the boats as well, and take them and make such use of them as necessary, and when we were through with them to turn them loose and sometime they would come back to him.

The necessary oar was secured and pieces of board and clothes props, and we made ready to leave. All this time the crowd had remained outside, hooting and jeering and making threats, and we felt that there were possibilities of some untimely action on their part, but our guns had then been turned over to us and we arranged our party so that each knew his place in the boat, and at a given signal we all made a rush, got in, and started out. It is needless to say that we put every ounce of energy behind those paddles. A number of stones and other missiles were thrown at us and jeers and promises that we would be followed up came floating to us, but no harm developed.

We crossed the river, undecided where to go, the river at that point being very wide and having the tide backing up in it and making the water brackish and unfit to drink, but we finally decided to return to this American's place and make a request for fresh water and such food as they might have at hand to carry us through that afternoon and night. The wife came to the boat landing and we told her our tale in a very few words, but she said that she would not furnish us with any food until she had talked the matter over with her husband and she felt that there was no occasion for us to go back up the river; that we would be perfectly safe to stay there with them, reminding us, as we had been informed the day before, that she was a native-born Mexican, speaking excellent English, having been educated at a Methodist mission in Puebla and being one of the aristocratic families of the city of Puebla, and that she felt that we would be perfectly safe there.

She went and called her husband from the field and he came down and she outlined the situation. He reached in the boat and took the chain out and said, "Men, you are going to settle right here." We said, "No; we do not want to imperil the safety and possibly the lives of you and your wife and two young children, and aged mother who is visiting here," but he said he had no fear of any such consequences; that he had lived there for 14 years and was very eminently respected and could assure us that we would be in perfect safety and arrangements could be perfected whereby we could be fairly well taken care of until such time as arrangements might be made to get us transported by water to Vera Cruz. This being the course of least resistance, was very readily accepted.

That evening about dark a Mexican came in, stating that he was a fisherman, the owner of a fishing smack, and that he had been called in by this Mexican gentleman who had assisted us to leave town that morning and was told that we would probably be at this American's place, and that conditions had developed in the town during the day that made him feel that it would not be safe for us to stay in that community, and that if he was willing to accept a risky undertaking, that he felt that arrangements could be made with us whereby we would be willing to pay him quite liberally to undertake to smuggle us down the river and out past the Mexican gunboat in the mouth of the river that night, it being the dark of the moon, and put us on board an American gunboat that was reported to be lying off the bar, but in the event that it might have departed prior to our arrival, that he would undertake to take us up the coast to Vera Cruz; that he had three brothers and a nephew who were willing to undertake the trip if it was made worth their while.

He stated that this Mexican gentleman had informed him that the populace had made its demands on the authorities of the town that day for arms and ammunition to set out to hunt us, and the authorities had agreed that at midnight they would furnish them with a certain amount of arms, thinking by the delay to give us time to get sufficiently far away that they would not be able to overtake us.

The story sounded very nice. We, of course, commenced to be fearful of what might transpire. We asked this fisherman what his price was. He said 2,000 pesos. We discussed the matter amongst ourselves in English and decided that it was better, if there was a chance of getting out that way, to pay these men their price and take the chance of getting into Vera Cruz and not await rescue from the American Government through what we then supposed the good offices of the consular service, than to take a risk of what might happen to us were we to remain in that locality. So we agreed.

After arrangements were all made and the hour set for his arrival, he asked if we were armed. We grew suspicious and asked him why. We said that we were and asked why. He said, "I merely asked that because we have no arms whatever. As you know, the Government has taken all arms from individuals, and just against the possibility that somebody might attempt from the river bank to stop our exit." We told him he need not fear from that score, that we felt able to protect the party.

The Mexican at whose house we were staying, being better acquainted with the Mexican fishermen than we from the interior, followed the man out into the yard and stated to him that he was not acquainted with him, that he did not know whether he had brought the correct information or not or whether his intentions were good, and stated to him that he wanted to make a remark to him to the effect that he knew the American spirit and temperament well enough that if he was going into this expedition with good intentions, he knew every promise of ours would be faithfully carried out; but, on the other hand if he was attempting to frame us an ambushade that he would not see the sun come up the following morning, it having been previously agreed amongst ourselves that there being five boatmen and five of us, that the first man that entered the boat would be a Mexican, followed by an American with drawn gun, and so on down the line, and that would keep each one of those men covered until we reached his place of safety, so that in the event they undertook any uprising, they would be dead before they knew it, or at least hors de combat. He assured the American that his intentions were of the best, as the sum of money which was promised to them was a fortune, and they were willing to take the risk. So he told them well and good.

Not being satisfied with this he sent one of his own employees, a trusted man down to the town to make inquiries of this Mexican gentleman if such a feeling was existent among the people and if a demand had been made on the authorities and if any promise had been made by the authorities. In due time his man returned with the verbal information that while there was considerable feeling and talk, that the gentleman did not know of any demand having been made on the authorities of or any promise of arms or offer of arms having been made by the authorities, but suggested that we sleep in the woods. We then decided that some of us would have to get sick in order to furnish a plausible alibi in the event that this fisherman showed up at the hour recommended. But he did not arrive, so we went to the woods and spent the night. The next morning we were joined at this place by four other Americans from a point farther up the river than any of us, to whom the word of the occupation of Vera Cruz had not come as soon as it had to us, but having met our boatmen returning up the river, they were advised by them to stop at this American's place and that they could probably be informed of our whereabouts. This increased the number of our party to nine.

We felt that we should not stay and impose on the good offices of this American and his family, who insisted that we would be just as safe, and if we could put up with the food they could supply us there and with the sleeping arrangements, as we probably would not want a building to sleep in, that we had better stay there. We stayed there for several days, hoping against hope as afterwards developed when we saw naval launches of the British fleet, one launch carrying the Swiss flag, we took it to be, passing up the river to points on the next river north of ours, the two rivers meeting above the town of Cosamoloapam, going into the State of Oaxaca, in the neighborhood of Tuxtepec, in care of a squad of certain foreigners, as we presumed, that remained in that territory, but none called for us. We made a standing offer of 50 pesos to any one who would carry a letter to the Vera Cruz Railroad, communication over the Alvarado Railroad having been cut off at the Mexican outpost, but no one would carry a letter to the American consul in Vera Cruz or to any reputable business house and bring back a signed receipt stating that the letter had been received, so that thereby our whereabouts might be learned. We had no takers.

We tried to figure out some way that we might get into Vera Cruz. We learned by reason of the salt marshes going back from the coast that it would be impossible for us to undertake to go overland from there and the only way would be to go clear back almost to the railroad. But by sleeping in the woods and sleeping around in the boat on the river at night when traffic along the road was frequent, we passed 11 days and nights before arrangements were finally made by the manager of a large American sugar plantation farther up the river, through a Mexican major of rurales in charge of a detachment located on his property, to smuggle us out to Vera Cruz in a small fishing boat as employees of his company. In that manner we reached Vera Cruz on the 6th of May.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of your plantation when you left it?

Mr. AULT. I had no communication or any word from our plantation for some three weeks afterwards, although I mailed letters and sent letters back part way by messengers to be mailed at interior points, but did not learn until some two months afterwards of the happenings on the property subsequent to my leaving.

Mr. KEARFUL. When you got to Vera Cruz did you go on to the States?

Mr. AULT. No, sir. We found that all Americans were being deported as fast as boats could be secured, but as our property was still in operation I felt that I did not want to be taken so far away where I would be out of touch with it, and found that it would be possible, could I secure employment with the Government, to remain in Vera Cruz. Having had some postal experience in the States, I was moved to apply to the postal agent at the Vera Cruz post office for employment, which I secured.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long did you remain in Vera Cruz?

Mr. AULT. Until the 23d day of November when the American troops were withdrawn, returning to the States on a transport with marines to Philadelphia.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you able to get back to the plantation?

Mr. AULT. I was, in October.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what condition did you find it then?

Mr. AULT. Very desolate. A number of our cattle had been stolen, all the merchandise in the store had been appropriated, and clothing, furniture and household effects had to a great extent, in fact entirely, been removed with the exception of some pieces of furniture. Beds had been taken, oxen, carts, farming utensils and things of that kind were all gone.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you able to operate your property after that?

Mr. AULT. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what reason?

Mr. AULT. By reason of not feeling that it was safe to be there and for the reason, as we learned there, that the Mexican civil authorities had intervened after the military authorities had first intervened, and assumed full charge of the property, and it was during their stay and their holding the possession that this property was destroyed or carried away.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they make any effort to reimburse you for it or return the property in any way?

Mr. AULT. The Mexican caretaker went to the alcalde and wanted to turn the property over, said he had grown tired of it and was not receiving any emolument, and that his private interests required his attention in other lines, and that he did not feel able to continue. That is the statement that was made to me by the alcalde. I told him I had no instructions from our people to receive the property and in the condition that I found it I was not willing to do so. I spoke to him about certain articles and things that had disappeared, which he said were in that condition when he took charge on the 4th of 5th day of May, but I learned from other people there that the military authorities had come in on the 27th of April and had dismissed the employees whom I had authorized by legal documents appropriately stamped—powers of attorney, you might say—to remain there. They had been removed by the military authorities, and a local civil authority placed in charge with orders to report to the commander of the military down at Tierra Blanca, and about five days subsequently the civil authorities came in and ordered the military authority representatives to turn the property and keys over to them, at which time they annulled the document which had been made out by the man in charge of the rurales, placing their stamp and seal on the back of it. Photographic copies of the original document are in our possession and can be furnished if occasion requires.

Then the civil authorities remained at the property for some two days, during which time they busied themselves in ransacking the premises and removing such articles as I presume they desired to remove for their own homes, as they employed men to take them to the river and take them down to down-river points.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the property in such condition that you could continue its operation?

Mr. AULT. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make the effort to regain possession of the things that had been taken away?

Mr. AULT. We asked him if he knew the whereabouts of any of them and he said with the exception of a couple of yokes of oxen and carts that he had loaned to friends of his, and one of our boats that was being used by employees of his, and some farming implements that had also been loaned to other friends, and a typewriter that he had allowed to go out of his custody to a friend of his, that things were just the same as when he had received the place.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get back these articles that he mentioned?

Mr. AULT. No, sir. My stay at the property at that time was only about two days.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the property then? What did you do with it?

Mr. AULT. I just left it in his charge. I made no attempt to take it away. I took the proposition up with the American consul at Vera Cruz and asked his advice in the matter, and he agreed that there was not any occasion for us to try to reoccupy it, that he felt there was not anything to do to protect our interests any more than had been done in the past.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to the property after that?

Mr. AULT. I received a letter from a friend of mine in that locality, dated October 19, 1919, in which he informed me that immediate locality has been the hangout for a band of bandits for the last three years continuously, and previous to that it was not safe for anybody outside of the natives living there to pass through that locality; that the floors, doors, windows, and roofs of our buildings had been removed; that all the copper in the tanks and about the mill, the brass in the machinery, and that the agricultural implements and the cattle and the wire from the fences and everything that any Mexican might hope to possess, had long since been removed; that the pastures were grown up, that some cattle were running on it of the natives, but he understood there were none of our cattle remaining; that the cane fields were entirely lost and the place was being overrun in all directions by anybody or anything that happened to pass that way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any appeal to the American Government for redress for these injuries?

Mr. AULT. We made a claim, I believe, about 1916 and filed it with the State Department. We found in the fall of 1919 that it would be necessary to make out a more full and a more complete statement or claim.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean that after three years you were notified that you would have to make a further showing?

Mr. AULT. Yes, sir. We then prepared a complete amended claim, which we empowered attorneys in Washington to prosecute for us.

Mr. KEARFUL. What satisfaction have you ever received in regard to the prosecution of your claim?

Mr. AULT. None whatsoever. Our attorneys informed us that they have hopes that there may be a settlement within the course of the next few months. They first said they understood that steps were being taken by Congress to make an appropriation to partially reimburse Mexican claimants in order that they might be allowed to go back and operate their properties as soon as it was safe for them to do so.

Mr. KEARFUL. The American Congress or the Mexican Congress?

Mr. AULT. The American Congress, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any such bill ever having been introduced in Congress?

Mr. AULT. I took up the matter with our Congressman and he said it was news to him. He did not even know of any such matter being under consideration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any inquiries as to the prospect of such a bill being passed?

Mr. AULT. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you learn?

Mr. AULT. He said he did not think there was any hope until the Mexican question was finally settled.

Mr. KEARFUL. What hopes did he hold out to you about the prospects of the Mexican question being finally settled?

Mr. AULT. I do not recall that he stated in any particular. My recollection is that he agreed that the proper manner to handle it would be to have a board appointed to go over the claims and decide on a just amount, and that some arrangement, either international or otherwise, be made whereby the claimants could be paid such damages as were decided to be fair and equitable, in order that they might return to the country and with their money bring about a new era of prosperity, once safety of life and property was guaranteed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it the idea that some arrangement would be made for the investigation of claims and payment of those claims by the Mexican Government or by this Government?

Mr. AULT. By this Government; that there was not any hope of the Mexican Government ever taking any step along that line, as it has long since acknowledged to be bankrupt.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the proposition that you would have to wait for adjustment of your claim until the whole Mexican problem should be settled in some way?

Mr. AULT. Yes, sir. He felt that there was no hope in the present American administration taking any action whatsoever looking to a settlement of the Mexican condition.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any inquiry to ascertain whether or not that is the general feeling among American Congressmen?

Mr. AULT. No, sir; I have not any acquaintance with any others than our own representatives.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he undertake to state the feeling among Congressmen as to what the sentiment was?

Mr. AULT. No, sir; I can not recall that he made any statement along that line.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have lived in Mexico a long time and have substantial interests there. What do you understand to be the trouble with Mexico?

Mr. AULT. I consider that the basic trouble with Mexico was brought about by American interference.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what interference do you refer?

Mr. AULT. The policy of dictating to the Mexican Government what they should and should not do, beginning at the close of the Taft administration and very considerably enlarged upon by the Wilson administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what do you refer when you say "telling the Mexicans what they should and should not do"?

Mr. AULT. By the frequent exchange—no, I will not say exchange of notes, because many times the Mexicans did not reply to notes that were addressed to them from the White House in Washington. I say the White House. I have reason to believe that the State Department had very little to do with it, the matter having been largely taken over by the Chief Executive himself, in that he opposed the candidacy of certain persons; in the case of Mr. Huerta that he seemed to be very bitterly opposed to him being the representative official of the Mexican Government.

I have talked with many Mexicans on the subject during the time Huerta was in power, and I feel that it was generally believed that had Huerta even been allowed to carry out his own policy unhampered by the limitations that were placed upon him by the American Government, and had received no encouragement from the United States, that he would have been able to pacify Mexico; but when the attitude of the American Government was not neutral, but aggressively for his removal, they were in a position to and did bring about conditions that no man could have combated and put down the civil strife and banditry that was rapidly enveloping the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what aggressive action do you refer for the removal of Huerta?

Mr. AULT. Their embarrassing him by refusing him the privilege of purchasing arms and ammunition in the United States for his forces, and then by what I consider the Tampico frame-up of the early days of April, 1914, and their intervention at Vera Cruz with some one of three or four excuses that were given to the public at various times.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think was the real reason for seizing Vera Cruz?

Mr. AULT. I never could conceive that there was any.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was motive for it. What do you conceive to have been the motive for seizing Vera Cruz—the real motive?

Mr. AULT. I have understood that the real motive was to prevent the shipment of arms on the German steamer Ypiranga from being unloaded in Vera Cruz and transported to Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. I think the motive may be judged from the result. What was the main effect of the seizure of Vera Cruz upon Huerta's administration?

Mr. AULT. Handicapping it from a military standpoint, cutting off the revenues from that port which was the principal port of entry in Mexico; to belittle his administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Huerta was soon after that forced out, was he not?

Mr. AULT. I believe in July of that year. He was, I think, induced to resign on the purported pledge of the American Government that a neutral successor would be appointed or chosen that would receive the support of the American Government, but which subsequently was not done.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are referring now to what happened at the Niagara conference?

Mr. AULT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your idea is that having been induced to resign on that pledge, that he then lost prestige with his own people?

Mr. AULT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And it was necessary then for him to go?

Mr. AULT. He had no chance to recover the respect of the Mexican people, because they considered that he had probably very good and just reasons for wishing for the welfare of Mexico through a neutral representative.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you mean by a neutral representative?

Mr. AULT. One that had not taken part in the administration under Diaz or under Madero and had not been a participant in either the Carranza or Villa factions or Zapata, which were then the dominant revolutionary factions of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What conditions do you understand to exist under the rule of Carranza that are necessary to be removed in order to stabilize Mexico?

Mr. AULT. I feel that the Carranza government has very conclusively proven that they were unable to pacify the country when they have declared a suspension of guaranties and placed the country under military law; when they made the state government and laws subordinate to executive orders of the president himself; when all public utilities are under government control; when the moratorium law is in effect and the federal constitution only partially operative; when the customs and internal revenue and a number of tax laws have been arbitrarily fixed to furnish funds to carry on the alleged government; when they have defaulted in the payment of interest and meeting the maturity of their internal and foreign indebtedness; when they have absolute control of the banks, finance, exchange, coinage, and issues of paper money, and when these conditions have brought about the stoppage or natural influx of foreign capital and credit, as well as support, by reason of the nationalization of oil wells, and laws prohibiting the purchase of property by any but actual citizens, and the protection of those who did have property in the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you mean by moratorium law?

Mr. AULT. That is a law making it impossible for obligations to be pushed to a forced closure, such as mortgages and other obligations of individuals or firms.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say the government has control of the banks. What, if you know, has happened to the banks under that control?

Mr. AULT. They were just ordered to turn everything over to the federal government and were put out of business and banking institutions.

Mr. KEARFUL. The metallic reserves were taken over, were they not, and appropriated?

Mr. AULT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you an opinion that you would care to express as to what ought to be done to put Mexico right?

Mr. AULT. I feel that if the present American administration has really the interests of Mexico at heart and are still determined in upholding Carranza as the head of that country, that they would compel him or oblige him to reinstate the constitution of a decade ago, repeal the consistory laws, guarantee the safety of life and property and the payment of indebtedness and indemnities. They would also have to make overtures for foreign capital and others, and assist to teach the people to direct their energies along right lines toward the uplift and advancement of the masses rather than the classes; that they would have to eliminate special privileges and the rule of might making right. They must equalize taxes to encourage development and realize the necessity of the people migrating to foreign lands to earn a livelihood, and if it is not their intention to give the present Mexican administration their support, I do not see that there is any hope of being able to establish in Mexico by Mexicans a government that would be capable of bringing about the peace conditions that existed for some 30 years prior to 1910.

Mr. KEARFUL. Suppose that this Government makes Carranza the proposition that you have outlined and he should be willing to undertake it, do you think it would be possible for him to carry it out?

Mr. AULT. For Carranza to carry it out?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. AULT. No, I do not think so. I do not have sufficient confidence in his ability as a statesman and a man of such resources.

Mr. KEARFUL. Suppose that he should be either unable or unwilling to carry out such a proposition, what then would you advise should be done?

Mr. AULT. I feel that in view of the policy of the Mexican Government to pacify the country and protect the people and their interests, that the United States should enforce and make operative for the protection of the universally recognized Monroe doctrine to prevent the intervention in Mexican affairs of foreign powers, whom I have every reason to believe will insist that the interests of their people in Mexico be guaranteed, protected, safeguarded, and claims settled; and if the United States is to keep them from doing it, that they must take some definite action and assume absolute control of the Mexican Government, either peaceably through a protectorate for a period of years, or by armed aggression if necessary, with the penalty previously stated to the Mexicans that it would be under the penalty of the loss of their national entity; that they should establish peace and safety, assume all self-indebtedness, investigate and allow and pay all bona fide damages and claims arising from the revolutionary period, and issue 30 to 50 year bonds to make immediate settlement therefor, thereby enabling claimants to resume their operations forthwith, and this at the same time would guarantee the prosperity and development of the country and the peace and contentment of its inhabitants, and that they should effect the passage and enforcement of the basic and modern laws of all civilized nations which would guarantee the enjoyment by all of peace, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that the sort of solution your Congressman referred to when he expressed the belief that there could be no settlement of your claim until the Mexican problem was settled?

Mr. AULT. I think what he probably referred to was that with the present American administration there was no hope of them ever taking any step or any stand on the Mexican situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he anticipate that there would be a change shortly in the American Government that would be an improvement?

Mr. AULT. I do not think he made any statement to that effect.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further that you desire to state to the committee in this connection?

Mr. AULT. I would like to state that I differ with a great many with reference to the opposition that might be expected from the Mexican populace in the event that the "Colossus of the North" (the editorially popular term applied to the United States) should at some time decide to energetically suppress the Mexican disorders by armed intervention. My opinion is that while there would be stern opposition on the part of the Government and certain foreign factions, it would be carried out as a guerrilla warfare and with the methods employed in the Philippines; but that the masses termed by President Wilson as the "submerged 80 per cent," would scarcely take any part except as they might be compelled to by the authorities. For despite whatever feeling they might have toward the American Government for its bunglesome interference in their internal affairs, the greater portion with the exception of the mass of mountain Indians have had ample opportunity to satisfy themselves that the American people individually and collectively are worthy of their continued respect and admiration, as it was largely due to the American industry, development, and standards that they have seen their country rise to a point of prominence in world affairs, while they themselves have directly or indirectly profited in prosperity, usefulness and ambition, and that "mañana" is not the day to hope to do what through indolence is not done to-day. But rather that "mañana" is another day for other things. I am sure they have the kindest of feeling for us, and will welcome the day when they can see peace and quiet for the everlasting future, and say "mañana" is a new day, with new conditions, new hopes and guarantees. And I am certain that a war would be of but short duration. I am not a militarist, but I believe the cancerous sore needs a sharp knife in a steady, kindly hand.

Mr. KEARFUL. If that is all, the committee are very much obliged to you.

(Witness excused.)

(Thereupon, at 11.50 o'clock a. m., the hearing was closed.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

FRIDAY, APRIL 16, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., April 16, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF HENRY LANE WILSON.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name?

Mr. WILSON. Henry Lane Wilson.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present post-office address?

Mr. WILSON. 2712 North Meridian Street, Indianapolis, Ind.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. WILSON. Lawyer, I suppose, although I do not practice.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have been in the Diplomatic Service?

Mr. WILSON. Seventeen years.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has been your experience in the diplomatic service?

Mr. WILSON. I was appointed minister to Chile in 1897 by President McKinley; minister to Greece and Belgium in 1905 by President Roosevelt; and ambassador to Turkey and Mexico in 1909 by President Taft.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has your diplomatic service been continuous from the time of your appointment as minister to Chile in 1897?

Mr. WILSON. Until December, 1913, under President Wilson.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the period of your service as ambassador to Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. I was appointed in November, 1909, and my term extended from that time until November, 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long were you minister to Chile?

Mr. WILSON. Eight years; five in Belgium and four in Mexico. My diplomatic service, I believe, is the longest continuous service as chief of a mission in the history of this Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was it that President Diaz abdicated and left Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. In June, 1911, as I remember.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had then been ambassador to Mexico for about a year and a half? Is that correct?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please describe for the benefit of the committee the conditions of business and the situation as to law and order under President Diaz?

Mr. WILSON. When I arrived in Mexico, and for probably a year thereafter, the government was in full control of the situation in Mexico in the remotest parts, and life was as safe upon a Mexican highway as upon one of the great thoroughfares of New York City. The Government's finances were in a highly flourishing condition, with one hundred millions in the treasury. Immigration was increasing rapidly, especially from the United States, and American capital during that year was seeking investment in Mexico to a greater extent than ever before. Everything indicated a highly prosperous future for Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the inducements for the investment of capital in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. American capital as it went with Mexico took the form of investment in mines, in farms, in public utilities, and in oil.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, special inducements were offered by the Government for the investment of capital?

Mr. WILSON. Land was purchased at extremely low valuations, a policy that was encouraged by the Government for the purpose of enlarging the taxable resources of the country. The Government pursued the same policy with reference to investments in the oil country and in mines and public utilities, it being the well settled principle of the Diaz Government that the investment of foreign capital in Mexico led constantly to the creation of taxable resources.

Mr. KEARFUL. And how was that policy realized?

Mr. WILSON. It was realized very successfully.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke of land being sold at low valuation. Was that exclusively to Americans, or was it open to anyone who wanted to purchase?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, it was open to all the world.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under general law?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you observed to be the effect upon the development of Mexico of the operation of American capital there?

Mr. WILSON. Practically all of the material development of Mexico is due to American enterprise, initiative, and capital. I perhaps put that a little strongly. I perhaps should say the preponderating development, because it is always necessary to take into consideration the British, French, and Spanish investments.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that the development of Mexico up to the time of the downfall of Porfirio Diaz was due to foreign capital and enterprise, of which the American preponderated?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you believe would have been the condition of Mexico without the operation of foreign capital and enterprise?

Mr. WILSON. She would have remained practically an uncivilized State, as she was during the period extending from the revolution against Spain down to the advent of Porfirio Diaz.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time of the downfall of Porfirio Diaz, how many Americans, if you know, were operating in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Seventy-five thousand. This figure I reached by careful estimate by the embassy and after correspondence with all the consulates.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your capacity as ambassador, did you come into close contact with many of these Americans?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; a very considerable number. The American Embassy in Mexico City was really a workshop. The demands for advice and assistance were constant, beginning at 9 o'clock in the morning and extending very frequently if not generally until 1 or 2 o'clock at night. During the troubled period—which describes pretty nearly the entire period of my service in Mexico—we did in the embassy 33 per cent of the correspondence of the Department of State here in Washington. This, added to the circumstance that there were always anywhere from 50 to a half dozen people in the embassy asking for interviews, made the business of the embassy tremendously large.

Mr. KEARFUL. What can you say in reference to the charge that has been circulated industriously in this country that the Americans operating in Mexico were a class of speculators engaged in plundering the Mexican people?

Mr. WILSON. I regard it as a very malicious and wicked falsehood.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the character of the Americans generally operating there?

Mr. WILSON. Very high. I have had occasion to come in contact with them as much perhaps as anyone, perhaps more than anyone, and I regard the standard of Americanism in Mexico as very high. I have never known, in any part of the world, such conspicuous examples of real Americanism and courage, and the exercise of all those qualities that we call peculiarly American, as I found among the 75,000 people of American origin in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people were they, in reference to their occupations?

Mr. WILSON. They were in all occupations. There were about 2,000 in the railways; there were probably 5,000 farmers; there were probably 5,000 engaged in mining; and probably as many as 8,000 engaged in educational work and residing in the country for reasons of health, diversion, or investigation.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were the professions represented by Americans?

Mr. WILSON. There were very many American doctors in the country, a great many American teachers, a reasonable number of lawyers—

Mr. KEARFUL. Engineers?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; a very large number of engineers, a great many dentists, some very excellent ministers and pastors.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any large number of the class that is found in the large cities of this country belonging to the lower order of society?

Mr. WILSON. None. This element was almost nonexistent.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has also been charged against Americans operating in Mexico that through fraud and bribery they obtained special concessions from the Mexican authorities which enabled them to exploit the country to their own advantage over the Mexican people. Is there any truth in that?

Mr. WILSON. No. No case of that kind ever came under my observation while I was in charge of the embassy.

Mr. KEARFUL. What can you say as to the nature of the concessions, if any, for the development of new enterprises?

Mr. WILSON. All that I am familiar with were granted for fair consideration and obtained honestly. During the entire four years

I was in charge of the American Embassy in Mexico City no American representing vested interests in Mexico ever asked any aid from the embassy except in the matter of physical protection. There were instances, of course, where I was called upon to represent some important interests before the Mexican Government, but that was almost without exception under instructions from the Department of State.

Mr. KEARFUL. The concessions that were granted were by a department of the Government under a general law, were they not?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the terms of the concession required the concessionnaire to expend certain sums of money toward development?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And for the performance of which he was required to give bond?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And as an inducement, he was allowed to import the materials necessary for his operations free of duty?

Mr. WILSON. Free of duty; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And in some cases for a limited period the products would be exempt from taxation?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; that is a correct statement of the general Mexican policy with reference to concessions. It was a very excellent policy in Mexico. It could not be applied with equal benefit in this country, but in Mexico it worked very admirably.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are acquainted with the policy in this country of municipalities granting street railroad and gas and power franchises?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And exempting the grantees from taxation and giving them special privileges for the purpose of inducing them to invest their capital?

Mr. WILSON. It is the same thing, only we call them privileges and in Mexico they call them concessions.

Mr. KEARFUL. We call them franchises here. You are also familiar with the policy of the American Congress in making large land grants for the construction of railroads, and guaranteeing the indebtedness of certain of the railroads?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. The difference is that the Mexican concessions are usually granted to foreigners. Our concessions, so called, if you can call them that, are never granted to foreigners.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was necessary to grant them to foreigners in Mexico because they furnished the only available capital?

Mr. WILSON. It was necessary in the case of Mexico, because not only was the foreigner the only source from which the capital could be procured, but the Mexican who had wealth would not invest his money in that way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give an estimate of the amount of American money that was invested in Mexico at the close of the rule of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. WILSON. My estimate while in charge of the embassy was that there was a billion two hundred million dollars of American capital invested in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give an estimate of the amount of other foreign capital invested in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. My estimate of the combined investments of all the other countries amounted to about the same as the American investment. In other words, the American investment was equal to that of all other countries combined.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give a statement of the other foreign populations in Mexico? You stated that there were about 75,000 Americans.

Mr. WILSON. The next in order numerically were the Spanish. I believe the Spanish population of Mexico was nearly as large as the American.

Mr. KEARFUL. How about the other nationalities?

Mr. WILSON. The French population was very considerable, the German population was very large, and the Italian population was considerable.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the British?

Mr. WILSON. My impression is that there were about 8,000 British in Mexico, nearly all of whom were in Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the American population of Mexico City at that time?

Mr. WILSON. About 10,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. How were the railways of Mexico owned and managed at that time?

Mr. WILSON. I think perhaps it would be better to state the thing in a different way.

Mr. KEARFUL. State it in your own way.

Mr. WILSON. Originally, the railways of Mexico were owned entirely by foreign investors, made up from American and European sources. Under Mr. Limantour, when he was minister of finance, the Mexican Government adopted a policy of securing control of these different systems. This policy finally resulted in the union of the Mexican Central with the Mexican National Railways, which union carried with it all the branch lines and dependencies, concentrating practically everything under government control except the line from Mexico City to Vera Cruz, which remained the property of British investors, and independent. This consolidation of the railway system was brought about by the very simple process of a continuous guarantee of the interest on the bonds of the railways by the Mexican Government. The Mexican Government guaranteed a rate of interest of 4 per cent to the bondholders in return for the privilege of voting their stock, but the Mexican Government put practically no money into the railways of Mexico. The money came from the United States and Europe. I do not know whether I have made that clear or not.

Mr. KEARFUL. I think so. I understand that the Government control of the railways was effected by means of the guarantee by the Government of the railroad bonds at a certain rate of interest, in consideration of which the control of the stock was turned over to the Mexican Government.

Mr. WILSON. Yes. It is a very great mistake to suppose that the Mexican Government ever owned any part of the railways of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people managed the railways of Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. The general management was in the hands of Americans, and in addition to this general management there were about 2,000 American employees in active railway service. There was considerable hostility against these American railway employees, which usually cropped out in some drastic regulations by the Government which affected American employees only. During the time of Mr. Madero there was a very concerted effort made to dislodge the American employees, and I remonstrated with the president, and he promised that the regulations would not be put into effect; but they were put into effect, and this apparent act of bad faith led to some very unpleasant passages between the president and myself. I made an effort to protect these men, most of whom had lived in Mexico for a great many years and raised their families there. They were finally all driven off the railways and not even furnished railway transportation to the United States. President Taft interested himself in their behalf, and obtained employment for a large number of them on the American railways.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you prepared to state the causes of the downfall of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; I think so.

Diaz had two great domestic policies. The first was the development of the material resources of the country. That part of his policy he carried out with marvelous success. He invited foreign capital into Mexico, and along with the investment of capital came large foreign immigration, usually of younger men full of enthusiasm, initiative, and organizing genius. With the aid of these foreign elements which he invited into Mexico, and with the aid of the capital which they represented, Diaz developed Mexico in material ways. He covered the country with a network of railways, developed her agricultural, mining, and commercial resources, and over all of his work of his creation he maintained a system of law and order unsurpassed in any country in the world.

The second branch of his policy was the awakening of the national consciousness and morale. This policy he did not successfully carry out because of the undermining influences of advancing years. He said to me upon one occasion: "I hoped during my time to develop Mexico materially and spiritually. I have developed her materially, but I must leave the task of her spiritual development by evolution to my successors."

During the last 10 years of the Diaz régime the Government was maintained by the legend which Diaz had created, but had fallen off materially in vigor and efficiency. During the last 10 years the cabinet was made up very largely of extremely old men, some of them over 80 and none of them younger than 60. These men naturally had passed their years of active usefulness, and they were, moreover, totally out of touch with such currents of public opinion as existed in Mexico. During these last 10 years Diaz grew infirm and lost some of the quick penetration of public men and watchful care over public interests, and the evils resulting from the President's notable decline especially in the last five years, were accentuated by the circumstance that nearly all of his advisers were in the same class with him. These conditions led to the causes which brought on the revolution.

The actual causes were, first, the government of the country by a close circle of so-called Científicos, together with the probability that this type of government would be continued under the generally accepted and selected successor of Diaz, Ramon Corral. The Cientificos were really a very excellent body of men in so far as they had any real corporate existence, and if their subordinates had exercised equal intelligence and probity in the management of public affairs the consequences which followed might have been avoided. Ramon Corral, Limantour, and Oligario Molino directed the affairs of the country. I believe all of them were honest men, but there were a large number of men serving under them who were not honest.

That is the first cause. Second was the race question. Every Indian in Mexico who is in touch with the traditions of his race believes and hopes that eventually the white race will be expelled from Mexico and a new empire of the Montezumas set up in the palace of Chapultepec. He carries this belief into all his transactions. To it may be attributed in a very large measure the excessive barbarities which have been committed by the Indian races during this revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that your conception of the present Carranza doctrine of "Mexico for the Mexicans"?

Mr. WILSON. That is what it amounts to, although Carranza himself is a white man. "Mexico for the Mexicans" under the rule of democratic institutions means Mexico for the Indians, because if the majority rules the Indian will rule in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. And "the property of the foreigner for the natives"?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; and, of course, you understand that that means not only an Indian rule in Mexico, but it means the rule of a population 80 per cent of which is unable to read or write.

The third cause was hatred of the foreigner. You must distinguish between the race hatred and hatred of the foreigner, because hatred of the foreigner was shared equally by the whites and the Indians, and the word "foreigner" there applies to the newcomers. From the race standpoint it applies equally to the Spaniards who came in with Hernando Cortez.

The invitation of the Diaz government brought into Mexico a vast army of foreigners, most of them from the United States. These foreigners converted Mexico from a desert into a paradise. They reaped generous profits from the situation. They were a thrifty lot. They accumulated fortunes as a result of industry and perseverance and ingenuity, and they immediately became the objects of envy and suspicion and dislike on the part of the Mexicans who had not availed themselves of the opportunities that lay all about them and were quite content to let the riches of the soil slumber on without interruption. Practically all of the railways belonged to foreigners; practically all the mines. Practically all of the banks and all of the factories were owned by the French. A very considerable part of the soil of Mexico, probably over a third, was in the hands of foreign-born elements, and practically all the public utilities were in the hands of Americans or British. Naturally, this foreign ownership excited hostility, which was not lessened by the circumstance that these interests, or whatever they may have been, had been honestly acquired.

The foregoing constitute the causes of the revolution against Diaz. They would not ordinarily constitute cause for revolution. We have endured much more in this country, for instance; but they did constitute the causes for the revolution in this instance, and no other causes can be shown by anyone competent to discuss the history of the revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are, of course, acquainted with the principal business street of Mexico City, Avenida San Francisco?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you observed the nature of the businesses along that avenue, as to whether they were in the hands of foreigners or Mexicans?

Mr. WILSON. They were almost wholly foreign owned. The merchandizing business of Mexico City is almost wholly foreign. I do not suppose it is necessary to indicate the branches in which they are engaged. It is of no importance, I imagine, here; but the most interesting and best improved part of Mexico City is what they call the Colonias, which have been built very largely by the foreigners.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed to describe the beginning and the progress of the Madero revolution which resulted in the downfall of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. When Madero first attracted my attention he was engaged in the business of making incendiary speeches, usually of very little intellectual merit, before audiences in remote parts of Mexico. These meetings were usually interrupted by the soldiers, and generally Madero was put in jail, his release following some days afterwards. He never appealed to popular sympathy in Mexico. He was a practically unknown person in public affairs who appeared at the psychological moment.

He was regarded by those who knew him, and especially by his own family, as a man of unsound mind and of dangerous tendencies. He was insignificant in appearance, halting and spasmodic in physical characteristics, stammering in speech, and unable to state any circumstance or opinion lucidly and clearly.

He was a man of absolute personal honesty, of excellent morals, and I believe of sincere patriotism, but easily misled and easily made the victim of more audacious and clever intelligences.

Madero in no sense overthrew the government of Diaz. The government of Diaz collapsed by reason of the desertion of friends, and a tide of anarchy which broke out and surged all about the capital city. Madero rode into power over the ruins of the Diaz government.

In the month of June Madero entered Mexico City as a private citizen, after Diaz had resigned the presidency and left the country.

I do not know, but I think if you are afforded an opportunity to consult the records which we have here, but which I prefer to not place in the hands of the committee unless they are demanded, you will find that on the very day of his entrance into Mexico City I sent a dispatch to our Department of State predicting the continuance of the revolution and the probable final overthrow of Madero.

My reasons for making this prediction were, first, the natural tendency of the Mexican people to anarchy and revolution, a tendency now given full range; second, the utter inadequacy of the announced Madero platform, policy, and personnel in dealing with the situation thus created.

This prediction was amply fulfilled, because the revolution never ✓ ceased. The revolution begun against Diaz continued without any interruption whatever through the time of Madero, and in the midst of all the terrors of this revolution, which swept from all over Mexico right up to the gates of the capital city, Madero was elected to the presidency by a total vote of 19,989 in a population of 15,000,000; Reyes, the only other candidate for the presidency, being prevented by violence from prosecuting his campaign, the violence being organized and directed by Gustavo Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. The brother of the President?

Mr. WILSON. The brother of the president. The Reyes meetings were interrupted and dispersed. His meetings were interrupted and he was driven from the platform and organized crowds of lower classes assaulted him with rocks, etc. The same methods are being employed in Mexico City to-day by Carranza against Obregon. This is not relevant to this part of the testimony, but it is a circumstance that it might be well to note.

Madero entered into the government undoubtedly with patriotic resolutions and with good intentions, but his cabinet was composed of radicals on the one hand and conservatives on the other, and the resolution of one day was revoked upon the next. Whatever resolution was taken was hysterical and spasmodic, advancing and retreating in accordance with the preponderance of this or that element in the cabinet.

All of this was due to the character of the president, who was one day the friend of the rich and the next day the friend of the poor, and he vacillated between the rich and the poor until there were neither rich nor poor for him. He was finally left absolutely alone, with no support except the public office holders and his family, 100 of whom were stated to be holding public office.

During this period the anti-Americanism in Mexico first became general. It had existed hitherto under all governments to a certain extent. It was noticeable in the last stages of the Diaz régime, when Rodriguez, a Mexican, was hung, or boiled or something, by a mob in Texas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Lynched.

Mr. WILSON. There are lots of ways of lynching. I think he was boiled. It resulted in a widespread protest in Mexico. In the City of Mexico mobs invaded the streets and burned the American flag, assaulting Americans everywhere, and in a number of cities of the Mexican Republic Americans were obliged to defend themselves in their homes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there exaggerated accounts of this treatment of Rodriguez by way of pretext for the outbreak of anti-American expressions?

Mr. WILSON. My opinion was at the time that these anti-American outbreaks had been encouraged secretly by the Diaz people for the purpose of distracting public attention from the revolutionary tendencies which existed at that time in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was an effort to unite the Mexican natives through their sentiment against the "Colossus of the North"?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. That was my theory about it, borne out by some evidence which I had, although it must always be remembered that Diaz and his government were not anti-American, but, on the contrary, very pro-American.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke of Madero having been considered as of unsound mind. Did you personally see any evidences of that?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please state them?

Mr. WILSON. I have known such qualities to be possessed by other men who have escaped the charge of insanity, but in my own estimate the existence of these qualities indicates at least incipient lunacy.

✓ Madero was incoherent and illogical in speech, physically in a state of continual contortion, unable to elucidate clearly any opinion which he entertained, easily impressed by fakers and international confidence men. In the beginning he believed that the Mexican people should be governed by kindness and love, which, in my judgment, showed a deficient mental grasp of the situation. He believed in the spectral appearance of the spirits of deceased people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any personal manifestations of this tendency to consult the spirits and to see visions?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. Upon one occasion he said to me, "George Washington is sitting right there beside you, listening to every word that you say." That is one personal experience, but there were innumerable others with other people.

It has been shown also that in public affairs he instructed his ambassador in Washington to deliberately misrepresent the situation which existed in Mexico, and also that he endeavored at the same time to discredit me with my own government for reporting to Washington the facts as I found them in Mexico. I regard this as evidence that his mind was rapidly yielding to the strain of executive responsibility.

In actual conclusions Ambassador Calero in Washington was in full accord with me in Mexico as to what was happening in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What evidence have you that Ambassador Claero was instructed to misrepresent the conditions in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. He quoted his instructions in the Mexican Senate, and stated at the same time that he had resigned because he could not take the position of further misrepresenting the actual situation to the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What if any changes occurred with respect to conditions of security of life and property and the transaction of business, with the advent of Madero?

Mr. WILSON. During the entire period of Madero's administration the disorders and anarchy increased both in number and in extent, and during the entire time these disorders and this anarchy were accompanied by a steadily falling barometer of public opinion.

The character of the war, of the disorders, was barbarous in the extreme. Whole cities were destroyed, and their populations, men, women and children put to the sword. Trains were derailed and their passengers massacred to a man. Men were mutilated and women were violated under circumstances and in ways for which there is no adequate description in the English language.

These disorders extended all the way from Guatemala to the Rio Grande, and camp fires of the revolutionists could always be seen at night from the front veranda of the embassy in Mexico City.

Naturally there were at certain periods crises, or attempts to overthrow the government, always growing more marked in force, and indicating also the increasing weakness of the government in dealing with them.

There was hardly a week passed that did not witness a turmoil or panic in Mexico City, and as for the interior, the disorder was universal.

My telegrams to the Department of State at that time indicate a general anarchy throughout Mexico during the entire time of Madero's administration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Toward the close of the Madero administration what was the sentiment among the thinking people of Mexico, both Mexicans and foreigners, with reference to whether Madero was a success or not?

Mr. WILSON. Of course the sentiment of the foreigners and what you might call the intellectual class of Mexico was that the government of Madero could not endure, because Madero possessed complete lack of knowledge of the character of the people he was attempting to govern. He did not understand their psychology any more than President Wilson understood their psychology, and he endeavored in the first days of his administration to govern according to the precepts of the Gospel; but before he had been in power very long he found out that these Christian methods, while excellent in principle, could not be put into practice in Mexico. He wasted one-half of the time he was in power in finding this out, and the remaining half represented his reversal to the Diaz type of government. During this period the government of Madero was an exact reproduction of the government of Diaz, with this modification, that it lacked the courage and practical common sense and the logical procedure which characterized the government of Diaz.

During the last days of the Madero régime his government was more despotic than the government of Diaz had ever been. In other words, it became the despotism of a weak man, whereas the despotism of Diaz, if it can be called a despotism, was that of a strong man.

In the end, the government of Madero was absolutely unable to carry out its program. It failed in every particular of its political platform.

The prominent features of Madero's political platform were free education, free lands, free elections, free press, and free speech.

Not a dollar was voted by the Mexican congress for additional educational purposes. Not an acre of land was distributed to the Mexican peon. The Government interfered in every election from the Rio Grande to Guatemala.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about the freedom of the press?

Mr. WILSON. In the metropolitan city of Mexico the Government purchased two of the great newspapers, suppressed two, and the editors of three were in jail at the time Madero was overthrown.

In the matter of free speech, no man's house was his castle, and through the activities of the secret society organized by Gustavo Madero called the "Porra," an atmosphere of suspicion and dread was created which rested over the entire country.

Then came the revolution against Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the Porra and what were its operations?

Mr. WILSON. What its principles were I never was able to discover, but its active practice was to discourage any anti-Madero expressions by physical repression. In other words, they would attack a man not in favor on the street with a club and pound his head off, and then disappear, having left a note of warning.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the Porra composed of the rabble of the community?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; it was composed of hired bullies and cut-throats, hired especially for that purpose, who created an absolute reign of terror in Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you proceed now to describe the revolution against Madero, and his overthrow?

Mr. WILSON. How much detail do you want me to use in describing that?

Mr. KEARFUL. Just as much as you think is necessary to give a picture of the situation.

Mr. WILSON. I have the story here in every detail, but it would be a tremendous task to repeat all of that story at this time, and I doubt whether it would be of any great benefit. I think perhaps I may be able to outline it in such a way as may make it possible to handle it within reasonable limits.

Mr. KEARFUL. If you will proceed to state the outstanding facts, any additional points which may be thought desirable can be brought out.

Mr. WILSON. On the night of the 8th of February Felix Diaz and Gen. Reyes, who were under arrest, imprisoned in the military penitentiary in Mexico City, were released by revolting soldiers of one of the crack regiments of the Mexican army. At the same time the cadets stationed at Tlalpam rose in rebellion and marched to the city, where they joined forces with the revolting regulars.

This force was then divided into two divisions, one under Gen. Reyes and one under Gen. Felix Diaz. The force under Gen. Reyes was ordered to attack the Government palace, and in the engagement which followed Gen. Reyes was killed and the attacking forces were beaten off.

The force led by Felix Diaz was successful, and after about an hour of bombardment they captured the Ciudadela, which is situated almost in the center of the city, and which contained at that time all the Government arms and ammunition, or practically all.

From this point Diaz steadily advanced his lines, gaining every day upon the Madero forces.

In the struggle which followed about a third of the city was badly disfigured and 8,000 people were killed.

Without going into unnecessary details I may say that by virtue of the situation which was created by the revolutionary outbreaks the American Embassy became the center of all the noncombatant activities during the Decena Tragica—the Tragic Ten Days.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the nature of the responsibilities that were put upon you?

Mr. WILSON. Most of the diplomatic establishments were in the line of fire. The American Embassy was just on the edge of the firing line.

During the bombardment which ensued the Cuban minister was driven out of his legation, and our embassy automobiles rescued the Portuguese minister from his legation. The American consulate was shot to pieces. The French chargé d'affaires and the British minister were so surrounded that they could not escape, except at certain intervals, from their houses.

Immediately with the breaking out of hostilities we organized in the embassy an automobile service. With this automobile service we brought 2,600 Americans from the firing line, and we housed and fed them in the vicinity of the embassy for ten days.

We also maintained telegraph communication, a bank, post office and a newspaper, all of which things were at that time nonexistent elsewhere in Mexico City.

Naturally, with these instrumentalities for service, the embassy became a center of all the activities, and the entire diplomatic corps remained there for the purposes of guidance and advice. I am telling this story in order that what follows later may be understood.

To pass over the details about the procurement of an armistice and the procurement of a general agreement to distribute bread and milk to the poorer classes who were starving, and many other matters of that kind, which resulted from the work of the embassy, I come to the seventh day when, as a result of a discussion in the embassy, the diplomatic corps decided that the representatives of the four nations having the great colonies, the United States, Great Britain, France and Spain, should go to President Madero and endeavor to exert their influence for the procurement of some change in the abominable situation which existed.

We carried out the resolution of the diplomatic corps under circumstances of a good deal of danger, but finally reached the president, and he informed us, during the interview, at which Gen. Huerta was present, that on the following day he expected Gen. Blanquet to arrive, and that with his arrival he expected to put down the revolution.

We were skeptical both as to Blanquet's attitude and the suppression of the revolution, but as no other course was available we accepted his explanations.

MR. KEARFUL. You mentioned Gen. Huerta. What was his position?

MR. WILSON. He was general in chief of Madero's army.

MR. KEARFUL. What was the opinion of the members of the diplomatic corps as to the prospect of a successful suppression of the revolution at that time?

MR. WILSON. I will come to that just a little bit later.

MR. KEARFUL. Very well.

MR. WILSON. On the next day Gen. Blanquet arrived on the outskirts of the city, but halted his troops for a considerable period; then dispatched a detachment to the palace, replacing the guard in charge of the palace with the new soldiers of his own command, thus overthrowing the government of Madero. Immediately after this occurred, the guns of Blanquet were turned toward the palace at Chapultepec, indicating that he was in sympathy with Felix Diaz and not with Madero. Gen. Blanquet, therefore, was the actual overthrower of Madero, not Huerta. Huerta accepted the situation created by Blanquet and took advantage of it.

Immediately after ascertaining this attitude of Blanquet I called the diplomatic corps together for consultation with reference to the situation.

At that time the military attaché of the American Embassy, then captain, now Col. Burnside, stationed in this city, reported to me that the revolution could not be suppressed, and that any further fighting would simply involve the sacrifice of human life without accomplishing any good. I should like to have that report incorporated as an exhibit.

(The document referred to is as follows:)

AMERICAN EMBASSY,
OFFICE OF THE MILITARY ATTACHÉ,
Mexico, June 5, 1913.

HON. HENRY LANE WILSON,
American Ambassador, American Embassy, Mexico, D. F.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: Replying to your letter of June 2, 1913, the following is submitted:

Some months previous to the outbreak of revolutionary troubles in Mexico City, I had formed the opinion, and so reported in official dispatches, that it was only a question of time as to how long the Federal army would as a whole remain loyal to the administration of President Madero. Through the promotion of revolutionary leaders of the Madero revolution over the officers of the regular army, a resentful feeling had been created in the minds of many officers of the regular forces through the belief that the army was being needlessly sacrificed for the support of visionary and impracticable ideas, and that there was little chance for appreciation or reward of faithful service under the existing administration. However, signs of the discipline that had been developed in the regular army during the administration of President Porfirio Diaz continued to prevail, but in view of the repeated circumstances which tended to discredit the regular army, it was my belief that it was only a question of time when patience would be exhausted and the regular force would give its support to a change of administration, believing, outside of possible personal advantage, this to be the only means of avoiding the complete demoralization of Mexico.

I was absent from the City of Mexico when the outbreak of February 9 occurred, but upon returning at 10 a. m. on the morning of February 11 it was learned that previous opinions as to the doubtful loyalty of the regular army had been confirmed by the fact that numerous organizations in the Federal District had already revolted and joined the revolutionists. During the remainder of this day, and until about noon of February 12, I spent most of the time in the vicinity of the Alameda. I arrived at this location about the time that the loyal troops made their first effort to advance on the Ciudadela. The Alameda and the side streets in its vicinity were used as a base of operations, and while here I had an opportunity to observe the manner in which the first attempts were being made to advance on the Ciudadela. This consisted in sending comparatively small detachments up the streets leading from the Alameda and its vicinity toward the Ciudadela. These detachments attempted to advance without concerted action, and in every case they were met by a fairly well regulated machine-gun and artillery fire from the vicinity of the Ciudadela and driven back demoralized.

On subsequent days similar advances were attempted on the Ciudadela from other directions, and again simultaneous advances were attempted from several directions at the same time. Fresh troops arrived in Mexico City from the country. The field artillery arriving took up positions from which it could be expected to do little damage to the Ciudadela on account of the high buildings surrounding this place. In addition, this field artillery had only such ammunition as had been brought with it—shrapnel—and which was suitable only for use against troops in extended order. The supply of ammunition in the hands of the loyal troops was very limited and no more available, since the reserve supply of Mexico was in possession of the rebels in the Ciudadela.

All of the attempts to advance on the Ciudadela from February 11 to February 16 resulted unfavorably for the Federals, and generally resulted in their falling back to positions more distant from the Ciudadela. The revolutionists became more certain of their strength and occasionally sent out exploring parties to some distance from the Ciudadela. These exploring parties were generally successful in obtaining the information they desired, but afterwards withdrew to their former posts in the vicinity of the Ciudadela, as the plans of the revolutionists were apparently to keep their men together and under the immediate control of the leaders.

On February 16 I visited the Ciudadela and found the revolutionists well supplied with food, arms and ammunition, and feeling confident of success. On the same date General Huerta personally stated to me that in case the Ciudadela was ever captured, the fighting which had previously taken place would be as nothing compared to that which would accompany the fall of the Ciudadela.

I do not now recall the exact date on which I stated to you that the Government would be unable to take the Ciudadela, but such was my opinion at all times after the evening of February 13. Subsequent events only strengthened this opinion and made me feel more certain that it was correct.

Sincerely,

W. W. BURNSIDE,
Captain United States Infantry, Military Attache.

Mr. WILSON. The Diplomatic Corps agreed that Blanquet had come to the assistance of Felix Diaz and not Madero; that the chiefs of the Mexican Army were deserting Madero and that the revolution could not be put down. So we then determined to advise Madero, not officially but unofficially, that the wise course for him was to resign and turn his powers over to the Congress.

In order to make the procedure unofficial we selected the Spanish minister, Mr. Cologan, for the mission, and the next day he went to see the president and to convey our unofficial opinion.

On entering the palace he was met by the Mexican Senate, who had been to Madero for the purpose of giving him precisely the same advice which we were giving him, but having knowledge of what their intention was Madero refused to see them, and they departed without accomplishing their purpose. Madero saw Mr. Cologan, but assumed a hostile attitude toward our envoy and toward our advice, and immediately sent a telegram to Washington instructing the Mexican Embassy to say to our Government that I was controlling and directing the attitude of the Diplomatic Corps, and that I would probably try to land troops at Vera Cruz. This telegram he afterward withdrew with an apology to me and with an expression—of doubtful sincerity—of admiration and respect.

The next day—I do not want to take the responsibility of saying precisely the day or hour, but as nearly as I can remember, the next day—the Mexican supreme court went to Madero to make a similar request, and they were very badly received. On the same day—I am not sure of the chronology; it is all in the dispatches, however—the army sent two colonels, Col. Riverol and Col. Izquierdo, with four privates to Madero, stating that this revolution had now gone on for 10 days, and that 8,000 of their brethren had been slain without accomplishing any good, and that they besought him to make peace and turn his powers over to the Congress. His reply to this was to take a revolver from his pocket and shoot both of these colonels and two, if not three, of the privates in rapid succession. He then escaped from the audience chamber where this occurred, and in the corridors of the palace was captured by Gen. Blanquet and placed in the palace prison.

Six hours after the overthrow of Madero, and after he had been incarcerated in jail, I determined that a very great responsibility rested upon my shoulders. The diplomatic corps had accepted my leadership, not only in a titular way but actually, and the foreign colonies, as you perhaps remember, were practically doing the same thing. This bombardment had continued for eight days. Eight thousand soldiers and noncombatants lay dead in the streets, spreading pestilence everywhere. Thousands of people were hemmed up in houses, from which they could not escape, starving. Little children were dying for want of milk. I had 2,600 people dependent upon me for their daily bread and their protection. The bombardment had continued already for eight days, and there was a prospect of its continuing indefinitely. Our lights had been cut off, our water had been cut off, one end of the embassy had been badly shot in. With this dreadful situation confronting me, there was the further one that the Government was in jail.

I therefore determined on my own responsibility to take the step which I subsequently took. I sent for these rival generals—Diaz, Blanquet, and Huerta—to come to the American embassy six hours after the overthrow of Madero, under the protection of the American flag, to discuss methods for bringing about peace. These generals came to the embassy one hour after the receipt of the request. They remained in the embassy four hours, during which time a vast crowd surrounded the building, anxiously waiting for the decision. There were three actual breaks, but by persuasion and by threat they were finally brought to agree, and they signed an agreement and a proclamation turning over their powers to Congress. This was deposited in the embassy safe; the news was given out from the embassy veranda to the assembled crowds; and that night a crowd estimated to have been over 50,000 filled the streets of Mexico, giving thanks to the American Government for having made peace in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you act with the advice and cooperation of the other members of the diplomatic corps?

Mr. WILSON. No; but they approved of it very heartily afterwards. There was no time for consultation. One could not get them out of their houses at times, you know. There were times when you could get them easily, and other times when they could not be gotten at all. This was a situation that required immediate action, and I realized that the entire responsibility would ultimately rest upon me anyhow, and so I just acted.

Mr. KEARFUL. What reason have you to believe that your action was approved by the members of the diplomatic corps?

Mr. WILSON. They all called at the embassy afterwards to express their approval of what had been done. My four chief colleagues, those who represented the Governments having large colonies in Mexico City, sent letters to me, which I should like to have inserted in the record.

Mr. KEARFUL. They will be inserted at this point.

(The letters referred too are as follows:)

BRITISH LEGATION,
Mexico, February 22, 1913.

MY DEAR MR. WILSON: I wish to express to you my most cordial thanks for the aid rendered to British subjects during the recent disturbances by your excellency, as well as by the members of your embassy and their gallant assistants of the American colony.

The British legation was difficult of access owing to its exposed position and its remoteness from the principal residential quarter, and the help afforded by the United States embassy and those who worked with it was therefore of special value.

I remain, dear Mr. Wilson,

Yours, very sincerely,

FRANCIS STRONGE.

KAISERLICH DEUTSCHE GESANDTSCHAFT,
Mexico, March 8, 1913.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: It is with profound satisfaction that I read in this morning's paper the praises duly bestowed on you by the State Department. As an eyewitness of last February's events, I wish to congratulate you upon the official recognition of your merits. May I add a word for my part? That is to say that I want to thank you most heartily for your excellent advice and practical help proffered this legation through your kindness and readiness during a rather trying situation. I was so delighted when reading the morning paper that I wanted to get up to congratulate you in person, but the doctor won't have it as this intestinal hemorrhage has repeated itself last Wednesday.

Believe me, dear Mr. Ambassador,

Yours very sincerely and devotedly,

VON HINTZE.

LEGATION OF FRANCE,
Mexico, March 11, 1913.

MR. AMBASSADOR: At the moment of terminating my duties as chargé d'affaires, following the return to Mexico of the minister of France, I make it my duty to express to your excellency the profound gratitude for the very cordial consideration you have been pleased to extend to me, in the course of the two months I have had charge of the legation of France and notably during the tragic days of the revolution of last February.

I shall always remember all the personal attentions you have been pleased to show me and I congratulate myself that my duties, at that difficult time, brought me into intimate relations with the very eminent dean of the diplomatic corps.

Be pleased to accept, Mr. Ambassador, the assurances of my very high consideration and devoted sentiments.

VTOR. AYGUESPARSU.

His Excellency, Mr. LANE WILSON,
Ambassador of the United States of America.

LEGATION OF SPAIN,
Mexico, March 12, 1913.

His Excellency Mr. HENRY LANE WILSON,
Ambassador of the United States.

MY DEAR AMBASSADOR: Because of my interminable occupations I have not complied with my duty to give you my most sincere thanks for the visit which, in your name, Mr. O'Shaughnessy made me, to show me the telegram which you sent to the Secretary of State and his favorable reply, apropos of the one I received from the Spaniards residing in Piedras Negras, informing me they had asked protection of the American consul in the distressing circumstances occasioned by the threats and demands of the rebels.

I avail myself of this occasion to say to you I can never forget the daily and constant communication maintained during the tragic days, gratefully remembering the always efficacious assistance and cooperation which I found in you, and being at the same time an intimate witness of your valuable efforts to meet the problems and responsibilities of those distressful moments, and at the same time promote the pacification of this country, which was of so much interest to us mutually for every reason, and because of the preeminent importance of our respective colonies.

With all consideration, I repeat myself, your very attentive, obedient servant and friend,

B. J. DE CÓLOGAN.

PORTUGUESE LEGATION,
Mexico, May 16, 1913.

EXCELLENCY: His excellency the minister for foreign affairs, Dr. Antonio Macieira, to whom I communicated the help and good offices tendered by your excellency to the Portuguese Legation on the 15th of February, during the bombardment within the City of Mexico, in putting at my disposition the means to depart with Madame d'Arenas de Lima from such a dangerous position as that occupied by the Legation of Portugal on that horrible occasion, has instructed me to give myself the honor of thanking your excellency in the name of the Government of Portugal for the very obliging and delicate action of your excellency as well as to Mr. Montgomery Schuyler, at that time first secretary of the embassy, who in a very amiable and careful manner contributed to the prompt carrying out of the action ordered by your excellency, when our remaining at the Portuguese Legation had become absolutely insupportable because of the lack of food during several days, and because bullets broke all the windows, disfiguring the escutcheon of the Arms of Portugal. A grenade of shrapnel even exploded in the interior of my apartments at the time when Gen. Angeles ordered the shooting of inoffensive passers-by against the wall of the Hotel Imperial vis-a-vis the Portuguese Legation.

It is with the greatest satisfaction, Mr. Ambassador, that I carry out the orders of his excellency, the minister for foreign affairs, to thank your excellency, begging to be permitted at the same time to add to the thanks of the Government of the Republic also the expressions of my most sincere personal attachment, and to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most high consideration.

L. D'ARENAS DE LIMA.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling of the American colony in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Immediately after the peace was made the American colony met in public meeting and passed resolutions of a very complimentary character approving my course, and also deciding to send a committee to Washington to have the true facts put before the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you a copy of those resolutions?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. I should like to have them inserted in the record.

Mr. KEARFUL. They will be inserted at this point.

Mr. WILSON. I will insert the telegrams and the resolutions and the memorial to the President.

(The matter above referred to is as follows:)

RESOLUTIONS OF MASS MEETING OF AMERICAN COLONY PASSED ON FEBRUARY 28, 1913.

Whereas during the 10 days from February 9 to 18 this city was the theater of a bitter strife between contending forces, the lives and property of Americans and other foreigners, as well as of Mexican residents, were gravely imperiled by shot and shell, several Americans being killed and wounded. Under the existing conditions Americans naturally looked to their national representative for aid and protection, and they were not disappointed. Our ambassador, the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, caused headquarters for the colony to be established at the American Embassy, and in concert with his staff of faithful assistants was untiring in his devotion to the best interests of not only his own countrymen but of the many foreigners of other nations who came to the embassy for aid and comfort. In recognition of those efforts, which undoubtedly saved the lives of many defenseless Americans: Be it

Resolved, That the American Colony recognizes the fact that to the American ambassador, Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, it owes a debt of gratitude, the magnitude of which can not be expressed in words, but which will be retained as a cherished memory of the noble and patriotic services rendered under most trying conditions, which stamp him as an American of whom his countrymen may well feel proud, and to whom the American colony extends this humble token of its appreciation; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be engrossed and presented to Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, ambassador of the United States, and that a copy also be sent to the State Department at Washington.

[Telegram.]

MEXICO, March 4, 1913.

The PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned committee representing the American Colony of the City of Mexico and virtually all Americans throughout this Republic urgently request Your Excellency to retain the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson in his present post as ambassador to Mexico for the following reasons:

The situation here resulting from the sudden and violent overthrow of the Madero government continues to be exceedingly critical. The invaluable services rendered by Ambassador Wilson to all foreigners during the recent crisis by aiding them in the preservation of their lives and properties and the important personal service which he rendered Gens. Huerta and Diaz after the fall of Madero, place him in a position to contribute powerfully to the prompt and proper working out of the present situation in a manner satisfactory to all interests and especially useful to the present needs and to the future welfare of American interests in this country. It is a matter of common knowledge that after Madero's fall Huerta and Diaz were not in accord and a conflict between them threatened, which, had it occurred, would have been most disastrous. It was through the personal mediation of Ambassador Wilson that their differences were adjusted and harmony between them established. In consequence of this service he gained and continues to have the implicit confidence of both parties and is daily, at their solicitation, rendering them useful aid looking to the immediate pacification of the country and the prompt reestablishment of a permanent Government.

Ambassador Wilson has been in Mexico since before the inception of the Madero revolution of 1910 and has served our nation and our nationals here with ability and success. In view of the foregoing facts we unhesitatingly but respectfully submit the opinion that Ambassador Wilson is in a position to render a service to Mexico and all foreign interests which a new man, however competent, could hardly be expected to accomplish.

The gravity of the present situation from the standpoint of the future of American interests in Mexico can not be overstated. It is not too much to say that under the complicated and delicate conditions which obtain here, the announcement of a change in our diplomatic representation would be viewed by all elements of this community, both Mexican and foreign, with serious apprehension and alarm.

A committee representing this colony desires to call on you at an early date and with your permission will lay before you at greater length the facts in connection with this situation and our reasons for making this request.

O. H. M. y Agramonte, president American Colony; G. W. Cook, chairman committee; E. N. Brown, George J. McCarty, W. F. Layer, J. N. Galbraith, C. F. de Ganahl, Burton W. Wilson, J. E. Long, T. J. Ryder, H. Walker, L. R. Wilfley, Paul Hudson, Fred Tackaberry.

CASE SUBMITTED.

MEXICO, D. F., April 30, 1913.

HON. HENRY LANE WILSON,

American Ambassador, Mexico, D. F.

DEAR SIR: At a recent meeting of the executive committee of the Society of the American Colony of Mexico City, I was directed to inform your excellency of certain steps which have been taken by the Americans residing in this city and throughout the Republic, looking to your retention at your present post of ambassador to Mexico.

Prior to the presidential election in the United States, the Americans domiciled in Mexico generally entertained the hope that your excellency might be retained in your present position, even though the political complexion of the administration in Washington should be changed.

After the revolt which resulted in the overthrow of the Madero government, our nationals here became convinced that it was not only desirable but essential, to the interests of our Nation and our people in Mexico, and to the conservation of existing cordial international relations, that no change be made in the diplomatic representation of our government to this country.

Acting upon this conviction the American citizens here resolved to take action with view to the accomplishment of this end.

The first step taken was to send a cablegram to President Wilson, on the 5th of March, apprising him of the conditions obtaining here, with the suggestion that your excellency be retained here, together with our reasons therefor. This cable was signed by a committee of the leading American citizens in this city, as will be shown by the copy which is transmitted herewith.

Thereafter it was deemed advisable that a committee be sent to Washington to call upon the President and the Secretary of State with view to laying before them more fully than could be done by cable, the facts in regard to this situation. This committee proceeded to Washington, called upon the President and the Secretary of State, and explained to them fully the conditions prevailing in this country at the present time, and suggested that in view of your excellency's long experience in the diplomatic service, your ample knowledge of the Mexican situation as a result of your three years' service in this country, and especially in view of your knowledge of the conditions arising out of the overthrow of the Madero government, no change be made at this post at the present time.

At the request of the President and of the Secretary of State, the committee filed a memorandum with these gentlemen covering the salient points brought out in the interviews of the committee with them, a copy of which is transmitted herewith.

Trusting that the action taken by your nationals in the Republic will meet with your approval and assuring your excellency of my high respect and esteem, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

GEORGE W. COOK,
Chairman of the Executive Committee.

MEMORANDUM OF ARGUMENT.

Before the Hon. William J. Bryan, Secretary of State, presented April 2, 1913, by a delegation sent by the American citizens of the city of Mexico to request of the Washington Government the retention of the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, as American ambassador to Mexico. This memorandum was afterward left with the President. The chairman of the delegation addressed Mr. Secretary Bryan, as follows:

"Mr. Secretary, the delegation which has the honor to address you for the purpose of requesting the retention of the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson in the post which he now occupies as American ambassador to Mexico, is composed of professional and business men who have been sent here for this specific purpose by the American citizens of the City of Mexico, as per our credentials which have already been laid before you. The mere fact that these gentlemen have been willing to undertake a journey of over 3,000 miles, occupying seven days and seven nights, and have sacrificed their business interests and time to undertake this mission, is a substantial evidence of the sincerity of purpose and depth of conviction which has induced them to come on this errand.

"If we request at your hands the retention of Ambassador Wilson, notwithstanding the recent change in the political administration at Washington, we realize that we must present to you sufficient and convincing reasons for our request, and must explain to you why we believe that no other American, be he ever so able and patriotic, can hope to exercise the same beneficent influence in connection with the existing critical state of affairs in Mexico, as can our present ambassador, Mr. Wilson. That sufficient and convincing reasons exist, no American citizen who passed through the horrors of the recent bombardment and who was cognizant of the events which were transpiring and the frightful possibilities of their tragic issue, will deny.

"For the nine days prior to the last day of the bombardment the ambassador dedicated and limited his activities to efforts to ameliorate the horrible conditions prevailing in the Mexican capital; to rescuing Americans and other foreigners whose homes were within the zone of the heaviest firing; to providing succor and refuge for such American citizens as found themselves in want of food or shelter, owing to the sudden and unexpected outbreak of hostilities; to organizing a guard to patrol the district inhabited by Americans, and to be ready to offer assistance and protection in case of attack; to providing a suitable hospital with the requisite medical and nursing facilities for any who might be wounded; to establishing banking facilities in the embassy for such Americans as might find themselves in need of funds; to organizing a corps of intrepid messengers for the carrying of cablegrams and letters from the embassy to the cable and post-offices in the heart of the city, which service was open to all Americans and foreigners; and for the transmission of messages from the diplomatic corps to the Mexican Government authorities and the leaders of the two hostile camps; to allaying the fears and anxieties of his countrymen and giving them wise counsel as they gathered in large numbers day after day at the embassy; and the keeping in constant touch and communication with the other members of the diplomatic corps in the Mexican capital, who naturally looked to him as their dean for leadership.

"The last day of the 'bloody 10 days,' as the period of the bombardment is now designated by the Mexicans, was the critical day which saw the arrest and imprisonment of President Madero and his cabinet, an event which created a situation giving rise to intense anxiety and well grounded fear for its results. The Mexican nation suddenly found itself practically without a government. A part of the Federal army under the control of Gen. Huerta was in possession of the palace and the greater part of the Mexican capital. Another part of the Federal army, headed by Gen. Felix Diaz, was still in possession of the arsenal, with its guns and large reserve stores of ammunition. The residents of Mexico with direst forebodings breathlessly awaited the outcome. Would Gen. Huerta and Gen. Diaz come to a clash, continue their bombardment and fight out the battle to its bitter end, thus accentuating the dangers and prolonging the horrible situation already existing in the capital? Or could these two contending generals, up to this time embroiled in a fierce and bloody fight, be induced to come together to compose their differences and to arrive at an agreement which would put an end to the wretched spectacle of a battle in the heart of a capital city, begun without notice to noncombatants and continued without giving them a definite opportunity to withdraw from the city to points of safety? Conditions in the city were becoming unbearable. The dead were unburied, and in some instances were burned in the streets. Provisions had soared skyward in price, and in many places could not be obtained at any price. Milk for the children, medical attention for the sick, religious consolation for the dying, all were difficult to be obtained. The city was absolutely without police protection; water had been cut off in certain parts of the city; the sewers were blocked for lack of flushing; the streets at night were dark, owing to the cutting and destruction of the electric wires; the working men were out of employment and had not been paid; hunger riots were in prospect; looting had already begun; and in the absence of police protection the uprising of the mob with all its attendant horrors seemed inevitable.

"The cry on all sides among foreigners and Mexicans alike was, what can be done to save the situation? It was at this juncture that our American ambassador rose nobly to the demands of the occasion, demonstrated his great efficiency and ability and brought the two contending generals together in a conference at the American Embassy, the place designated by them both as the only place in which they were willing to meet for conference. This conference lasted for several hours, and at various critical points in the discussion it seemed inevitable that it was destined to break up without reaching the agreement so necessary for putting an end to a situation replete with horrors. It is a fact of common knowledge that the skillful mediation of our ambassador during these long hours of conference when everything hung in the balance, and the personal confidence which he inspired in both the opposing generals, finally brought about the agreement between them which was then and there reduced to writing, read before witnesses summoned for that purpose, signed by Gens. Huerta and Diaz and delivered to the ambassador for safe keeping.

"This consummation so devoutly wished for by all the inhabitants of Mexico constituted a diplomatic triumph of the first order for our ambassador, not only by reason of the immediate results obtained, which were the cessation of the combat, the immediate renewal of the policing and municipal service of the city, the giving of an opportunity to the inhabitants who had left the city to return thereto and take up their peaceful occupations, the opening up of ways and means to obtain food for the suffering people, the opportunity for the burial of the dead which had accumulated in such numbers as to threaten a pestilence, and the alleviation of all the horrors resultant upon the long continued hostilities, but over and above all, because the effective mediation of our ambassador, and the confidence which he inspired in Gens. Huerta and Diaz during the conduct of these negotiations, placed him in a unique position in connection with the solution of all these difficulties and enabled him, more than any other man possibly could, to exercise a strong moral influence upon all the parties to this agreement to carry it out in all its expressed and implied terms.

"If we are right in our deduction as above expressed, the prestige which our ambassador in Mexico now enjoys with the parties in actual power and his personal acceptability to them and influence upon them render him indispensable to the satisfactory solution of the Mexican situation and the maintenance of peace so long as the present critical conditions in Mexico prevail.

"It is a well-known fact in connection with the Mexican character that it is extremely slow to give its confidence to an individual, but that once an individual has obtained that confidence, it is given to him in full measure, and carries with it a power to exercise influence which can not be transferred to a third party and is more potent in its effect than any authority or power which may be behind the personality. In other words, the personality and the personal equation are of the greatest importance in dealing successfully with the Mexican people.

"The fact that Mr. Wilson has for over three years discharged the duties of American ambassador in Mexico gives him an experience that is invaluable under the existing circumstances, and which entirely differentiates him from any new man, however able, who might succeed him at the present time. The great value of this experience is too patent to require further comment.

"We pass with a word the facts of the ambassador's long experience of over 16 years in the American Diplomatic Service; his recognized ability and his fidelity and assiduity in the discharge of his duties, amply attested by his dispatches to the State Department; his character as a cultivated gentleman of broad sympathies; and his accessibility to all his countrymen; the refined and elevating atmosphere of the embassy in Mexico; and the charming tact and social accomplishments of Mrs. Wilson.

"The facts above set forth and our deductions from them constitute the basis of our sincere and earnest belief that the retention of Mr. Henry Lane Wilson as American ambassador in Mexico, pending a satisfactory solution of the Mexican situation, will prove a most important factor not only in the protection of the lives and property of Americans and other foreigners in Mexico, but also in the continuance of the friendly international relations now existing between the two countries and the avoidance of any sudden and unfortunate event which might cause those relations to be strained or even ruptured, a contingency which would involve both countries in difficulties too painful to contemplate.

"Since our arrival in Washington our attention has been called to certain charges against Ambassador Wilson published in the public press. In Exhibit G, attached to this memorandum, we set forth these charges and our replies thereto.

"Mr. Secretary, in conclusion, permit us to say that as American citizens resident in the Republic of Mexico we highly appreciate the hospitality and good will of the Mexican people toward our fellow countrymen and ourselves personally, and recognize to the fullest extent the impropriety of our making any comment upon Mexican politics; and should anything we have said to you herein be susceptible of a construction contrary to such a view of the proprieties of the cases, we expressly disclaim any intention to that end.

"Permit us to convey to you our thanks for your kind reception and attentive hearing."

The facts in connection with the rebellion of February, 1913, which resulted in the overthrow of the government of President Madero by Gen. Felix Diaz are now historical, and are set forth in Exhibit A hereto attached.

The conduct of the American ambassador, the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, throughout the period of these revolutionary troubles was such as to win for him the highest praise not only from the Americans in Mexico, but also from the nationals of other foreign countries resident in Mexico and the Mexicans themselves.

The universal appreciation of the undoubted fact that Ambassador Wilson, by his skillful and efficient handling of a most difficult situation, had been instrumental in bringing about a termination of the bombardment in the City of Mexico, thereby saving life and avoiding a continuation of the destruction of property, resulted in a call, issued by the president of the American colony, for a mass meeting of American citizens in Mexico. This mass meeting was the largest and most enthusiastic of any similar meeting ever held by Americans in Mexico, and after many eulogies upon the conduct of affairs by the ambassador during the bloody 10 days of the bombardment, appropriate and laudatory resolutions were unanimously passed, as set forth in Exhibit B hereto attached.

In harmony with the same spirit which led to the call for the mass meeting, another call was issued to over 50 of the leading American citizens in Mexico City asking them to meet for a conference with a view to determining what action should be taken by them for the purpose of conserving the interests of the Americans in Mexico and the mutual welfare of that good feeling between both peoples (Americans and Mexicans). See Exhibit C hereto attached.

In pursuance to this call, some 50 American citizens met for conference, and after a prolonged discussion it was the unanimous opinion of this conference that it would be "highly conducive to the interests of Americans in Mexico and to the continuance of the extremely cordial relations now existing between the American and Mexican nations if the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson were to be continued in the position of American ambassador near the Mexican Government, which position he has filled with such marked efficiency and with such great honor to his country." This opinion was embodied in a resolution which was unanimously adopted. See Exhibit D hereto attached.

For the purpose of giving effect to the wishes of this conference, an executive committee of 18 was appointed with power and with instructions to proceed in such manner as it might deem best to accomplish the object desired. See names of committee in Exhibit E, hereto attached.

This executive committee at once prepared and sent the President of the United States a cablegram setting forth the views and wishes of the American citizens in Mexico in regard to the retention of the present ambassador, and likewise named a special delegation to proceed to Washington and lay before President Wilson and Secretary of State Bryan the view of the American citizens in Mexico on this subject, and their reasons therefor. The names of the delegation which came to Washington are set forth in Exhibit F, hereto attached.

Respectfully submitted.

GEORGE W. COOK, Chairman.

Mr. WILSON. Also, all the ministers of Mexico City, Protestant and Catholic, and the British Colony, passed a resolution of thanks, and asked to have a copy of it sent to the President, and the Y. M. C. A. I should like to have those inserted.

Mr. KEARFUL. They will be inserted.

LETTER FROM AMERICAN CLERGYMEN OF MEXICO CITY.

MEXICO CITY, March 15, 1913.

Hon. HENRY LANE WILSON,

United States Ambassador, Mexico City.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of American clergymen of the City of Mexico, held this day, our attention was called by different members of the body to articles recently appearing in certain American newspapers, which very seriously and unjustly reflected upon your character and official conduct during the trying and tragic ordeal through which we all passed in the month of February.

Therefore we, the undersigned, desire to express our surprise and indignation at the tenor of such unjustifiable attacks, since it was known to us that you put forth extraordinary efforts to save the lives of the late unfortunate president and vice president of this Republic; that you offered your own home as a place of refuge to several branches of their respective families; that within four hours after the fall of the Madero government you summoned to the embassy Gens. Huerta and Diaz, chiefs of the forces contending in the city, and succeeded in bringing them to an agreement which produced an immediate cessation of hostilities and the speedy restoration of guarantees of life and property in the city; that during the combat you used your best influences to secure the establishment of a neutral zone and the cessation of hostilities within the city limits; that you, with the aid of the diplomatic corps, secured an armistice of 12 hours; and furthermore, that you established within the embassy a bureau for the assistance of refugees, an automobile service for the removal of noncombatants from the most dangerous sections of the city, branches of the cable and post office, a temporary bank, an emergency hospital, a bureau of supplies for your own country people, which good offices greatly alleviated the sufferings not only of Americans, but many other foreigners, and not a few Mexicans; and that in all this humanitarian and Christ-like work you were patiently and efficiently aided by Mrs. Wilson.

We are also aware that your conduct in all these matters has won for you the general and high appreciation of the American colony at large, to which we particularly desire to hereby add our expression of sincere gratitude and highest esteem.

We are sending copies of this letter to the President of the United States, the Sun Bureau, Hearst papers, the Associated Press, and the Mexican Herald.

Faithfully, yours,

John W. Butler, district superintendent Methodist Episcopal Church;
R. C. Elliot, presiding elder Methodist Episcopal Church South;
R. A. Carhart, missionary, Methodist Episcopal Church; Geo. H. Brewer, superintendent Baptist Mission; Rev. John A. Reis, pastor San Lorenzo Catholic Church; J. P. Hauser, district superintendent Methodist Episcopal Church; Sidney M. Conger, pastor Union Evangelistic Church, member of the Presbytery of Otsego; Rev. Edmund A. Neville, M. A. (Oxon), rector Christ Church; Rev. F. E. McGuire, pastor Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church.

Resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Young Men's Christian Association of the City of Mexico, at their regular meeting on Thursday, April 10, and recorded in their minutes.

Whereas it is the sense of this meeting that the attitude of the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, ambassador of the United States to this Republic of Mexico, always consistently maintained and especially during the recent period of keen and critical tension in this city, has been wise, patriotic and unselfish and has been such in our judgment as to belie certain uncharitable and unfair attacks of which he has been, and is being, made the victim, be it unanimously

Resolved, That the members of this board cordially sympathize with the ambassador in the premises and that an expression of their renewed confidence be extended to him.

Resolved, also, That copies of this resolution be sent to His Excellency, the President of the United States, to Hon. Henry Lane Wilson and to the press.

Thomas Philips, president; Guillermo B. Puga, vice president; Luis Alvares Leon, Sec. de actas; S. W. Rider, J. E. Dennison, R. M. Raymond, W. A. Price treasurer; P. H. L. King, R. Williamson, W. W. Blake, Dr. Antonio Orozco, G. J. Babcock, general secretary; A. Aldasoro.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any dissenting voice from any quarter?

Mr. WILSON. None; absolutely none.

Mr. KEARFUL. What then occurred with reference to the organization of the Government?

Mr. WILSON. Immediately after the general agreement between Diaz and Huerta—which was approved by Blanquet, or otherwise it could not have been successful—a formal procedure was taken to carry out the agreement which had been reached in the embassy, which was to seat Huerta in the presidency with a Felix Diaz cabinet.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the provisions of the Mexican constitution as to the procedure?

Mr. WILSON. The Mexican constitution provides that in the event of the death of the President or his inability to discharge the duties of the office, or his resignation, the minister of foreign affairs shall assume the office, and that in the event of his death, inability, or resignation the minister of gobernacion shall fill the office. In this instance Lascurain was minister of foreign affairs, and, as Madero resigned the presidency in writing and his resignation was submitted to Congress, which accepted it, Lascurain became, by the operation of the Mexican constitution, President. He assumed the office of President, going through the formula usual upon such occasions, and then appointed Huerta his minister of gobernacion. Then he resigned, and Huerta came into the presidency through the regular operation of the Mexican constitution, and later his elevation to the presidential chair was approved by the unanimous vote of Congress, without a dissenting voice.

Mr. KEARFUL. You spoke of the resignation of the President. Did you intend to include also the Vice President?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; both of them resigned.

Mr. KEARFUL. At the time that Huerta became President in the manner you have described, where were Madero and Pino Suarez, the President and Vice President?

Mr. WILSON. In prison.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were alive at that time?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; they were alive. They were alive four or five days afterwards. I may say here that when Madero was first incarcerated in prison I immediately sent a card through one of the embassy messengers, Harry Berliner, to Huerta, in which I urged him to do everything that was necessary to protect the lives of Madero and Suarez. This request I made repeatedly, once under instructions from Washington, but much oftener on my motion.

Mr. KEARFUL. What assurances did you have that they would receive protection?

Mr. WILSON. Absolute. After one of these visits to Huerta I returned to the embassy with the German minister. Upon my arrival there Mrs. Madero, who was in the embassy with her brother, asked me to send a telegram to Washington requesting the good offices of the American Government in saving the life of Madero. Although I believed this telegram to be addressed to me and not to the American Government, I did forward it to Washington. At the same time Mrs. Madero asked our good offices in obtaining the transfer of the ex-President from the palace prison to some prison where he would have more comfortable quarters. I had already remonstrated against the treatment accorded him in keeping him imprisoned in this small cell. We had just seen Gen. Huerta and had urged upon him with insistence, and he had given us a positive guaranty that the life of Madero would be protected—that is, his personal guaranty—at the same time saying to us that there were men about him who wanted the life of Madero from motives of revenge, these men and their families having suffered at the hands of the Madero family during Madero's presidency. He said, however, that he had no grievance whatever against Madero, that he never received anything but kindness at his hands, and that his great problem was to get him out of the country and get him out of the situation entirely.

He then showed us telegrams which had been exchanged between members of the Madero family and Gen. Velasco, I think at Orizaba—it was one of those places between Mexico City and Vera Cruz—urging this general to rise when a train which Huerta had agreed to give the entire Madero family and Madero himself for the purpose of leaving Mexico, should pass through. This train was actually lighted and standing at the station with the Madero family in it awaiting the arrival of the president, when they discovered these telegrams. Then the whole thing was revoked.

Mr. KEARFUL. The telegrams showed that there was projected uprising to rescue Madero?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; to liberate him on the line through which the train was to pass. Is that made clear by what I have said?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Then Huerta said: "What can I do with him? He is loco"—meaning, he is crazy—"and he is under the control of other dangerous persons." When we went back to him, at the request of Mrs. Madero, he gladly accepted our recommendation to remove Madero to the military prison, and on that night he was taken out of prison along with Pino Suarez, the vice president, and while the automobile was en route to the military prison it was attacked, whether by friends or enemies of Madero I have never been able to establish; but, in the skirmish which resulted, the officer in charge of Madero shot him and Pino Suarez, the vice president.

LETTER FROM ADMIRAL VON HINTZE, GERMAN MINISTER TO CHINA, TO MR. HENRY LANE WILSON.

[PEKING, CHINA], January 8, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: By a lucky chance, your letter dated from the 8th of November dropped on my desk. I was rather surprised, as generally "my friend the enemy" is trying his very best to get hold of my correspondence, and succeeds extremely well. I wonder whether he simply enjoys reading letters meant for me or whether he answers them as well. It's a strange world nowadays, and though, as you know, not in the slightest sentimental, I can not help sometimes sighing a little bit when thinking of my English friends of former days. Do they condemn such questionable proceedings as some of their countrymen are indulging in—as undoubtedly they would have done in former days—or do they yell with the mob? Well, well, I shall stop asking questions and take to sighing again; it helps digestion. We have had a jolly good time in Mexico, my dear Mr. Ambassador, and you are mistaken in recommending me to walk the more prosaic, if less exciting, paths of diplomacy. Diplomacy, that dear old lady, does but little appeal to me, and I dare say, confidentially, I take her for as old and mossy as Methusala's donkey. We have outgrown the old-fashioned diplomacy of the teacup and the petticoat and the back stairs, and I fervently hope we shall tread upon another sort of international intercourse whose principle may be "straightforward, plain, and live and let live." I plunged here into another revolution and enjoy it. One day they will cut my throat—the enemy is deadly set against me—and I hope I shall bear it with the accustomed satirical grin. Now, then, here too they are out to chase a president. I try to help him as best I can, which is not much, but very little less and sometimes more than the honorable colleagues can or will do. I remember the time of poor Madero, an idealist reformer and a courageous man. I remember very well Thursday, the 19th of February, 1913, when early in the morning I called on you and found you and Mrs. Wilson, after a short dialogic, enthusiastic over the necessity of saving the life of unfortunate Madero. We went together to the palace and saw Gen. Huerta, and we got from him his word of honor as a caballero and a soldier to protect the life of his abated opponent. We got some more promises. Do you remember that I told you when we reached your embassy: "In future days you will realize that by to-day's action you have added a laurel wreath to the crown of the United States"? You have, and I am sure you and every American is proud of it. My warmest and kindest regards to Mrs. Wilson. How good and sweet and calm she was in all those exciting days.

Believe me, my dear Mr. Ambassador,

Yours, very sincerely,

VON HINTZE.

(Thereupon, at 12.20 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

MR. KEARFUL. What were the relations between President Madero and Francisco Villa?

MR. WILSON. Of the exact character of the relations I have no definite knowledge, but they were friendly. After Madero had been installed in power, and at the time Orozco arose against him in rebellion on the northern border, after the battle of Escalon, which resulted in the retreat of Orozco, who believed that he was defeated, and the retreat of the other side, believing that they were defeated, and the suicide of Sallas, the federal general, Madero, dispatched Huerta to take command of the forces in the north, and when Huerta proceeded north his army was joined by Villa who had been a notorious bandit up to that time, but who had received a commission either as colonel or general in the Mexican army from Madero.

Immediately after identifying himself with the army of Huerta, Villa separated from the command with his forces, and began plundering estates and mines wherever he could reach them. Most of those mines and estates in the northern part of Mexico are American, and my attention, of course, was immediately called to what was being done by urgent messages from consuls and from individuals. I took up the matter with Madero who expressed grave doubts as to the reliability of my information, stating that Villa was a patriot and that these stories were invented.

I made a second investigation upon this suggestion, and confirmed entirely the opinion I had received in the first instance. When I laid this before the president, he again expressed doubt, and I intimated to him that he was assuming a very serious responsibility, because, if our American people in northern Mexico found it impossible to obtain protection from the Mexican Government, they would resort to their own Government, and I would be obliged to recommend favorable consideration of their petition for protection from our own Government, at the same time insisting again that Villa should be arrested and tried by a court-martial.

The president was greatly perturbed by my attitude in the matter, but finally said he would have him tried by court-martial, and instructions were sent at once to Huerta. Huerta presided over the court-martial which tried Villa, and found him guilty and sentenced him to be shot at daybreak. Madero then interfered and commuted his sentence to imprisonment in the military penitentiary of Mexico City, and he was sent there, and remained there for a year, and escaping just prior to the overthrow of Madero, in point of fact, was in rebellion against Madero when Madero was overthrown, and then immediately changed the character of his revolt to one of protest against Huerta. That is the story.

MR. KEARFUL. What was the character of your relations with Madero, as to their being satisfactory or otherwise, when you were under the necessity of making representations to him?

MR. WILSON. When the Madero administration came into power my attitude toward the administration was as it should have been, entirely sympathetic and friendly, and during the time Mr. Calero was in charge of the foreign office I gave very frequent evidences of my sympathy and desires of assisting the Government to meet the difficult problems with which it had to contend. For instance, I think I had a very great deal of influence in securing the legislation necessary to bring about a change in our neutrality laws, which had hampered our Government for some time in discharging its obligations toward the Mexican Government through the protection of the border. I exchanged quite a voluminous correspondence with Members of the Senate and with the Department of State, and I think I had quite a considerable influence in bringing about the necessary change in our neutrality laws which enabled the President to prevent the organization of an armed rebellion on our border against Madero.

MR. KEARFUL. His action was very favorable to the Madero Government?

MR. WILSON. Yes. In addition to that I assisted very materially in obtaining the transfer of troops over American soil, a privilege which I disapproved of but which I thought was necessary to save the Madero Government, as, if they had been obliged to move solely on the soil of Mexico, railway transportation could not have been obtained. Mr. Calero and Mr. Lascurain, who were ministers of foreign affairs during the time of Madero, know that my attitude was friendly and that I desired to assist them always; the record shows that and their letters to me show that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever take any action, in your official capacity or otherwise, to hamper the government of Madero in any way?

Mr. WILSON. Never. During the latter stage of the Madero government I became very much dissatisfied with the attitude of the administration with reference to the interests of Americans in Mexico and with reference to the protection of American rights, and I was obliged to take a very firm and very positive attitude.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the facts that justified that attitude on your part?

Mr. WILSON. The enormous destruction of American property throughout the confines of the Republic, and the very great destruction of American life in every part of the Republic. The incident which brought about the direct coolness between the Madero administration and the embassy came from the discharge of the American railway employees by the Madero Government. In that matter the administration of Madero acted in distinctly bad faith with me, as I had a direct promise that the language regulations which were injurious to the American railway employees would not be enforced. This was a fact that was fully known to the railway employees and to the National Railway Association in the United States, which afterwards passed resolutions of a very complimentary character approving what I had done for the railway employees in Mexico. I asked to have a copy of these regulations inserted here.

Whereas the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, ambassador of the United States to Mexico, has, since his incumbency of that office, shown splendid ability and great patriotism in his work in behalf of citizens of the United States, many of whom are conductors, and has in all proper ways possible given his earnest and efficient help to them, with the result that the citizens of the United States now residing in that country are receiving that consideration and protection which they should have: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American conductors of Mexico and of the Thirty-third Grand Division of the Order of Railway Conductors do hereby thank the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson for his prompt and able labors in their behalf; and be it further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, Hon. W. H. Taft; the Secretary of State, Hon. Philander C. Knox; and to the United States ambassador to Mexico, Hon. Henry Lane Wilson.

ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS,
MONTEREY DIVISION No. 432,
Monterey, N. F. Mexico, April 30, 1911.

Meets every Saturday 3 p. m.

Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
President United States, Washington, D. C.

Hon. PHILANDER C. KNOX,
Secretary of State, United States, Washington, D. C.

Hon. HENRY LANE WILSON,
Ambassador United States, Mexico, D. F.

GENTLEMEN: The following resolution from Guadalajara Division No. 540 of the Order of Railway Conductors is the reason for this communication to you jointly:

"Whereas it has been reported in the press of Mexico and the United States that the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson, ambassador of the United States to Mexico, contemplates resigning his position and leaving the Republic; and

"Whereas the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson has shown himself admirably fitted for the position he now holds, in that he has exerted every effort to protect the rights and property of American citizens residing in Mexico and has splendidly maintained the dignity of the United States, therefore be it.

"Resolved, by Division 540, Order Railway Conductors, That we most respectfully ask the Hon. Henry Lane Wilson to reconsider any intention of resigning the post of ambassador of the United States in Mexico, and that we earnestly urge the Hon. Philander C. Knox that every effort be used to retain Mr. Wilson in the position he now occupies."

A. W. EARNEST,
Secretary and Treasurer.

At a regular meeting of Monterey Division No. 432, Order Railway Conductors, the above resolution was unanimously approved and I was instructed to forward copies of this approval and indorsement to the honorable gentlemen to whom this communication is addressed.

Assuring you of our best wishes, I am,
Yours, truly,

C. P. BEZANSON,
Secretary-Treasurer Monterey Division No. 432.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is so ordered. What further attitude of Madero and his Government caused dissatisfaction in your mind?

Mr. WILSON. With reference to me?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know of anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. You stated that during the close of the period of Madero's government you were dissatisfied with the treatment that you received.

Mr. WILSON. The only things that caused dissatisfaction was the sharp character of the notes which I addressed the Government. Those were very sharp, but they were made necessary by the situation which existed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you satisfied with the action taken in response to your recommendations of various sorts?

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were some of the actions that illustrated the attitude of Madero and his government?

Mr. WILSON. Well, Americans were very frequently thrown into prison. I think during the time [of Madero] I was there, 175 Americans were thrown into prison, from motives of greed or revenge, and each case I made a very careful examination and was unable to find that there was any justification for their arrest and their imprisonment.

In consequence I asked insistently that they might be released on bond, and not be kept in prison during the long periods which exist between arrest and trial under the Mexican law. I was not very successful in making any impression or accomplishing any results in this direction, and the feeling that Americans were being unjustly imprisoned in filthy jails and kept there without any reason whatsoever naturally occasioned the vigor of statement contained in the notes which I addressed to the Mexican Government, and which on that account was not pleasing to the Government. Some of these notes were addressed under direct instructions from Washington, and some of them were addressed without instructions. The Washington Government, under President Taft, fully understood the situation in Mexico and was moving rapidly into direction of its solution by vigorous methods, but the brevity of the life of the administration of President Taft after the situation became really serious made it impossible for the President to carry out the intentions which he had with reference to the situation there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling in Mexico among the thinking classes with reference to the death of Madero?

Mr. WILSON. The death of Madero made no impression whatsoever in Mexico. It was taken by Mexican public opinion as a necessary and usual consequence of an overthrow.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have spoken of Calero, who was the first minister of foreign relations under Madero, and later ambassador to Washington, and, after his resignation, senator in the Mexican Congress.

Mr. WILSON. Always a senator.

Mr. KEARFUL. And his name was Manuel Calero?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. He wrote a book?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; entitled, "The Mexican Policy of President Woodrow Wilson, as it appears to a Mexican," and on page 11 he says:

The men who killed Madero did not assassinate any president, but a man who had ceased to be such. Assassinations of a political character are only a natural fruit of the turbulent Latin-American politics. As the governments of these countries subsist only on condition of not having active enemies, Latin-American presidents often resort to assassinations as a means to maintain peace and conserve their power. It would be easy to cite the names of actual presidents in Central and South American States who have used and are using homicide as a means of ridding themselves of their enemies. Mr. Carranza, the protégé of President Wilson, employs this means with astonishing frequency, in the guise of punishment for alleged treason, or of military necessity.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that in accordance with your understanding of politics in Latin-American countries, including Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. With some modification. Mr. Calero's statement would not apply in the case of Chile, the Argentine, Brazil, Costa Rica, and possibly Salvador. In the case of Mexico, no man has ever been elected President since the revolution against Spain. Every President there has been shot in or shot out of power. A revolution is an election.

As to the death of Madero, which has been a subject of a good deal of controversy, it was not, in my judgment, brought about by Huerta, but by two, and perhaps three, individuals closely connected with his official family. The names of these individuals I do not mention because my evidence is wholly circumstantial, and because I have no desire to involve these gentlemen on mere circumstantial suspicion. To my distinct knowledge, Huerta did not desire the death of Madero. I am further cognizant of the circumstance that he was deeply shocked and surprised by his death. The inside facts with regard to the death of Madero were put in my possession by Francisco de la Barra, former provisional President of Mexico and minister of foreign affairs under Diaz and Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. And ambassador to Washington?

Mr. WILSON. And ambassador to Washington, a very highly cultivated and very humane man, whose opinion I would accept upon almost any matter of fact. But whosoever is guilty of the death of Madero, that guilt extends only to responsibility for an homicide, and an homicide only, because at the time Madero was murdered or killed he was not President of Mexico, but simply a Mexican citizen. His death, therefore, however repugnant to all codes of civilization, should have concerned us from a political standpoint no more than the death of any other Mexican citizen, especially at a time when we were overlooking the death by murder of hundreds of American citizens in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Calero gives his conception of the foundation of the Latin-American colonies on page 10 of his book, as follows, with reference to Huerta:

The proceeding followed by Huerta was not of his invention; it is one which has prevailed in the countries that are found south of the Rio Grande and which is still applied and will continue to be applied for many long years in the greater part of them. The temperament, the economic factors, the political traditions, the want of preparation for self-government and, more than all, the decisive influence which is exercised by the mass of Indians, completely ignorant and illiterate, who form the overwhelming majority of the population—all this explains the difference in political methods between those countries and the more favored ones of this continent.

Further on he says:

Was not the proceeding of Huerta the same as that which, a few days afterwards, was applied in Peru when a military chief headed an uprising of his soldiers and took possession of the person of President Billinghurst and imprisoned him in the penitentiary? The new Peruvian Government, born in this manner out of betrayal and of military revolt, has been nevertheless, recognized by all—including President Wilson.

Is that, in your judgment, a correct statement of the basis of Latin-American politics, and an accurate statement of what occurred in Peru?

Mr. WILSON. It is an accurate statement of what occurred in Peru, with the addition that the minister of war was murdered.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you agree with Mr. Calero's conception of the basis of Latin-American politics?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; when it is applied to certain States, but the grading of Latin-American States is very different. Chile and the Argentines are very high types of the evolution of Latin-American popular government. This may also be said of Brazil, of Costa Rica, and very largely of Salvador. Wherever the Indian element predominates, as it does in nearly all of the Latin-American States, the tendency to anarchy and revolution is very marked. In strict justice, it is always necessary to accept certain States rather than to include them in a general and sweeping statement. In the case of Mexico, Mr. Calero's description is accurate. In no other place else in the world has there been more turbulence and more violent over-turnings of government. Every man who obtained power obtained it by violence and finished his career in exile, by the dagger, or in the dungeon. This has been true from the time of the revolution against Spain passing down through a motley crew of vulgar tyrants, including Santa Ana and the presidents who have ruled since Diaz was overthrown.

Mr. KEARFUL. What action was taken by you to cooperate with Huerta?

Mr. WILSON. You will have to make that question a little clearer.

Mr. KEARFUL. Looking toward the recognition of Huerta as the head of a de facto government with which you would have to deal?

Mr. WILSON. With reference to his recognition?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. I might state, in order to make this point clear, that I never had any acquaintance with Huerta, and never had seen him until I met him in the presence of the president during the Decena Tragica, and I had never known Felix Diaz or Gen. Blanquet, or seen him prior to the Decena Tragica. During the bombardment of the city, through the medium of messengers, I made an attempt twice to see Huerta for the purpose of getting the benefit of his influence with the president to abate the horrible situation which existed in the city, but, as a matter of fact, I never saw him and never was able to discuss the matter with him at all. After Madero was overthrown and Huerta assumed office, I think 14 days were left to the Republican administration of President Taft. I think I am right.

MR. KEARFUL. From the 18th of February to the 4th of March?

MR. WILSON. Yes. The disposition of the Washington administration under President Taft and Secretary Knox was to accept my recommendations upon all questions. In other words, they followed the embassy. As soon as Huerta had come into power and assumed the presidency, in accordance with the formula of the Mexican constitution, I recommended a reasonable delay in his recognition, for specific reasons. At that time there had been before the chancelleries of the United States and Mexico for years five or six questions which we were endeavoring to have settled, but with very little success. All of our representations with reference to the justice of the claims were interpreted by the Mexican Government as attempts to infringe on their sovereignty which, of course, is a very easy method of escaping responsibility. This was true of the administration of Gen. Diaz as well as of the administration of Madero.

These five questions related, first, to the Chamizal question, which concerned the title to a large part of the city of El Paso, which had been thrown on to the American side by a change in the bed of the Rio Grande River.

Another was the Colorado River question, a question which related to the right of Americans to protect themselves from the Mexican side against inundations, a very important question, as you perhaps know, affecting all the people, all through that section. A third was the Tlahualilo cotton estates question wherein an American corporation operating the largest cotton estate in the world had been deprived illegally of its water rights.

The fourth was the question of damages growing out of the revolution, for which the Mexican Government was responsible under a strict interpretation of international law.

The fifth was the question of damages growing out of the revolution for which the Mexican Government was not responsible under a strict interpretation of international law, but which had the character of claims usually settled upon the ground of international amity.

I suggested to the Government at Washington that I thought it would be convenient to withhold recognition, although assuming it would be eventually accorded, until I could get these five questions settled to the satisfaction of our Government. I got a settlement in principle of the Tlahualilo case, the Chamizal case, the Colorado River case, the question of damages growing out of the revolution for which the Government of Mexico was responsible under a strict interpretation of international law, but I failed in the fifth, which was the question of damages which are usually settled upon the ground of international amity. These were to be adjudicated through an international court to be created by the joint action of the United States and Mexico, and perhaps other States. The Mexican Government was very reluctant to agree to this, although I was joined in the demand by the representatives of all the powers accredited to Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean the Huerta government?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, the Huerta government. I was joined in this request by representatives of all the powers. The lack of disposition on the part of the Huerta government to accord this demand grew primarily out of the circumstance that it would have had to accord the same privileges to Mexican citizens, and it was thought the Government would be swamped. Later on they began to believe that they would get more lenient treatment from the incoming Wilson administration than they had received from the old one.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean the Wilson administration, as compared with the Taft administration?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; and therefore they did not move as rapidly on that question as they might have done, had they known what was coming. I may say here that the Department of State, under Mr. Knox, recognized—and that recognition is of record—the legal character of the installation of the Huerta government. That is of record in the confidential dispatches of the Department of State. Beyond this circumstance, Mr. Knox said to me in a personal conversation that if all these questions had been settled, if the program which I had myself made the basis for recognition had been carried out, he would have recommended the recognition of Huerta to President Taft even as late as 10 o'clock on the morning of March 4.

Further than that, Mr. Taft has stated, in an address before the National Bar Association, I think, that a great blunder had been committed when the recognition of Huerta was not accorded, and there is not the slightest doubt in the world that the Taft administration would have recognized Huerta. It had already recognized the legality of the installation of his government, and by logical sequence it would have been obliged to eventually accord recognition.

That was the situation when Mr. Wilson's administration came into power.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say you were successful in obtaining agreement upon four of the principal points. You mean that there was a tentative agreement which never resulted in a treaty?

Mr. WILSON. An agreement in principle. The details were never worked out, but they agreed without exception that the principles upon which we had based our contention were right.

Mr. KEARFUL. But that agreement was not made effective?

Mr. WILSON. It was in the Tlahualilo case, I think. Of course, when the Wilson administration came in it immediately assumed the position that everything that had been done by the prior administration was wicked, and as this attitude involved the settlement of these questions, the excellent results which had been achieved were lost. The different positions which had been secured by diplomatic action should have been rigidly maintained by the incoming Wilson administration, but I believe our entire position was abandoned until Mr. Lansing reversed the position which had been taken by Mr. Bryan and assumed, I believe, with some vigor the position that this matter was res adjudicata.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if any, steps did you take to strengthen Huerta's power in order to assist him in pacifying the country?

Mr. WILSON. It seemed to me that aside from any doubts I might have had, or any one else might have had, as to the character of Huerta, that the maintenance of his position as chief executive of the nation was absolutely essential to the peace of the country. My view was that if his government fell chaos would result, and I accordingly, on my own initiative, not under instructions of the Department of State, by telegrams to our consuls, endeavored to secure acquiescence in the change of government, simply by unofficial advice through the consuls in different parts of Mexico. These facts were all reported to Washington, and afterwards approved fully by the Taft administration, which considered them as humanitarian transactions, and in the interests of peace.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was actually done with reference to recognition of President Huerta on your part and by the American Government?

Mr. WILSON. During Mr. Taft's administration nothing but de facto recognition existed. He was there, and that made de facto recognition essential.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were authorized to deal with him as the de facto head of the government?

Mr. WILSON. I was not instructed to deal with him either in a de facto or de jure character, but simply instructed, and that instruction went on after Mr. Bryan took charge of foreign affairs.

Mr. KEARFUL. That appears in the documents of the State Department?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes; I was instructed every day, almost every hour, to demand protection for American citizens and Americans' interest from a government which the Wilson administration refused to recognize. Of course, the whole policy of the administration with reference to Mexico was founded upon the President's announcement of doctrine that "governments founded upon violence would not be recognized." Having announced that doctrine, to maintain consistency, it was necessary for the administration to attempt the overthrow of Huerta, and following the principle enjoined by this doctrine they were led deeper and deeper into the mire, and in the end became responsible for the chaos which existed in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the action of the other principal governments of the world with reference to the recognition of Huerta?

Mr. WILSON. They all recognized the government of Huerta, with the exception of Brazil and Chile. These Governments withheld their recognition out of deference to me, as I so requested them, and not to take precedence of us. At that time I thought our Government would follow the example of European powers. Great Britain, France, Germany, and all of the States of Europe recognized the government of Huerta. Our Government and the two Governments named were the only exceptions. Further than that, I ought to say that the diplomatic corps in Mexico City held a meeting, without my knowledge—that is to say, they advised me they were going to meet, and invited me to be present. I refused on the ground that I had not the confidence of my own Government. And at this meeting they took up the matter of the international court, and approved my position, but they went further and drew up identic telegrams to be sent to their different Governments, urging them to instruct their representatives in Washington to say to our Government either to recognize Huerta or come down and make that peace which they refused to allow Huerta to make. This correspondence was, of course, couched in diplomatic language.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were not in Mexico City at the time they did that, were you?

Mr. WILSON. No; I was not in Mexico City. I was in Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the occasion of your going to Vera Cruz?

Mr. WILSON. The celebration of the Fourth of July in Mexico is always a very important event, and all of the diplomatic corps are invited, and the President and his cabinet. The celebration continues the entire day and evening. I usually upon those occasions, as ambassador, represented the colony and the President represented Mexico, and complimentary speeches were exchanged about our countries. Mr. Bryan seemed concerned about this situation and thought that my joining in this ceremony would be equivalent to a recognition of Huerta and he sent me down to Vera Cruz to celebrate the Fourth of July on a battleship. During my absence the celebration went on just the same, and at the same time the diplomatic corps held this meeting and determined on the course of sending identic dispatches to their Governments.

At that time President Wilson had in Mexico a confidential representative by the name of William Bayard Hale, who was conducting some sort of a detective work there. I do not know the exact character of it. At any rate, when I reported to Washington the meeting of the diplomatic corps and the action that had been taken by it, the Washington Government immediately telegraphed, as I have been told by members of the American colony—I do not know this—to William Bayard Hale to investigate the facts, and he reported to Washington, as I have been told by members of the American colony who have talked with him, that the meeting of the diplomatic corps and its action on this occasion had been instigated by me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that the truth?

Mr. WILSON. It was absolutely untrue. Not only was it untrue, but the action taken was very distasteful to me as it was done without my knowledge. I was in favor of recognition, but I did not approve the action of the diplomatic corps in a matter as vital as that, and which concerned me so closely, without advising me of it. Mr. William Bayard Hale reported as I have been told that I had instigated this thing. I do not make this as an absolute statement. As the result of this telegram to the Government at Washington, the President called me north, as the telegram said, "for consultation with reference to the Mexican situation."

Mr. KEARFUL. Let us go back a little. What was the disposition of President Huerta with reference to furnishing protection to foreigners and their lives and property and maintaining order?

Mr. WILSON. Excellent.

Mr. KEARFUL. What success did he have in that line?

Mr. WILSON. I have no complaint to make of the action of the Huerta Government while I was there. The action of the government, in response to remonstrances or complaints of any kind, was instantaneous, energetic, and even better than that of the Diaz government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling—

Mr. WILSON. The attitude of Huerta toward the United States was very friendly. He was very pro-American at the beginning. At the beginning of his presidency he made a very special effort to indicate his friendly attitude toward the Government of the United States. He was a disciple of the Diaz school and believed in Diaz methods, in addition to this, he had a very strong personal feeling and affection toward the United States, and if he had been left in power Mexico, during the late war in Europe, would have been a source of help to this country rather than a continuous menace and annoyance.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling in Mexico among the substantial farmers and thinking Mexicans in reference to the methods used by Huerta as to whether those methods were the correct ones or not, and whether he was likely to be successful?

Mr. WILSON. Of course, I left Mexico before Huerta's downfall. While I was there I think the general feeling was one of confidence. At any rate, his elevation to power was absolutely acceptable to the great mass of the Mexican people, and was received with general approval everywhere because, having had weakness they wanted strength.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did Huerta's attitude toward the American Government change?

Mr. WILSON. It changed after it became evident to him that he would not receive recognition, and especially after Mr. John Lind had been sent to Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What cooperation did you receive from the American Government, if any, while you were attempting to perform your functions as ambassador, during Huerta's time?

Mr. WILSON. From the Washington Government?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. What instances of failure to cooperate do you recall?

Mr. WILSON. Well, primarily there was the question of recognition, in which there was an absolute failure. After that there was the absolute refusal to give me any instructions of any kind of a political character. In addition to this, my position as ambassador, and my prestige there were lessened by the apparent indifference, or sympathy of the Department of State with the press reports with reference to its supposed hostile attitude toward me. As these reports were weakening my prestige and, in consequence, my ability to serve American interests in Mexico, I finally protested very energetically to Mr. Bryan relative to the position of the Department of State. I received no answer to my protest for about 10 days. I then tendered my resignation for the third time, and in very emphatic terms. This brought about a reply from Mr. Bryan of a very satisfactory character, in which he expressed regret and said he had been absent. He then gave out a statement to the press, rebuking it for its publication of embarrassing reports, which was very gratifying to me.

Mr. KEARFUL. I want to call your attention to a statement made in the book written by Samuel Guy Inman, entitled, "Intervention in Mexico," on page 134, as follows:

In February, 1913, Felix Diaz and Bernardo Reyes broke jail in Mexico City, where they had been imprisoned as leaders of a revolution against Madero and placed themselves at the head of the rebel forces representing the old Diaz group. Huerta was intrusted with the command of the Madero troops. In order to stop the fighting, which continued for 10 days, a conference was held in the American embassy with the American ambassador present, and Huerta agreed to turn traitor to Madero who was made prisoner and who was afterwards shot. For his part in this diabolical affair Henry Lane Wilson was recalled, and the United States did not appoint until 1918 a Mexican ambassador, the efficient Mr. Fletcher, who is still at his post.

Mr. Inman was the first witness called by the committee, but he was unable to give any facts for the language quoted, or to refer to any information that he had received from any source to justify it, but he said he would stand by the statement made in his book. Is there any truth whatever in the statement that you were implicated in the treason of Huerta against Madero or in the imprisonment or death of Madero, or that you were recalled for any part in this diabolical affair?

Mr. WILSON. There is absolutely no truth in any of those statements. I will state very briefly the facts. In the first place, I want to call attention to a very mischievous error in the statement of Mr. Inman, and that is that a meeting was held at the embassy, to which Huerta was invited and at which he promised to turn traitor to Madero. No such meeting was ever held in the embassy. The only meeting that was held in the embassy was held after the overthrow of Madero, not before. The relations of Huerta with Madero were never discussed by me with any living human being outside of the diplomatic corps.

Mr. KEARFUL. The meeting that was held there, as I understand it, was for the purpose of effecting an arrangement between the opposing forces of Huerta and Blanquet on the one side, and Diaz and Gen. Mondragon on the other?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. After the overthrow of Madero?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; it was inevitable after the overthrow of Madero, and it really became absolutely necessary for some one to do something to stop the terrible carnage that was going on in the streets of the city. All of my actions at this time and at this crisis were purely humanitarian in purpose. They have been so regarded by all Americans resident in Mexico at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has your attention been called to other publications of a similar character?

Mr. WILSON. There was something else in your question which I have lost count of now.

Mr. KEARFUL. That Madero was made prisoner and afterwards shot in consequence of this arrangement that was made at the American Embassy?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; of course, that is a most infamous falsehood. There is no other way to characterize it. Such an action as that is utterly foreign to my character and the general opinion of my character held by others. I can only say here that at this time that charge is disproved by the records of the Department of State, with which I was in constant communication by telegraph and which received reports of everything as they occurred from day to day. These reports finally united in a harmonious conclusion. It is disproved again by the testimony of over a thousand witnesses, all Americans or English. It is disproved by the unanimous reports of the American colony which met in a public meeting and dispatched a committee to Washington for the purpose of laying a memorial before the President. It is disproved by the unanimous testimony of all the American clergymen, Roman Catholic and Protestant, in Mexico City. It is disproved by the resolutions of the Y. M. C. A. organization, by the testimony of the Spanish and German ministers. It is disapproved by these sworn affidavits of the embassy staff, all of whom were fully cognizant of each step taken.

I would like to have all of this data that I have referred to inserted in the record.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has already been inserted.

We, the undersigned members of the staff of the embassy of the United States of America at Mexico City, do hereby certify that one of our number was constantly on duty, both night and day, at the embassy during the bombardment within the city, which lasted from February 9 to February 18, 1913, and also thereafter until the fall of President Madero's administration and the establishment of the present provisional government; that one of our number was present at all interviews between the ambassador and messengers from President Madero and later, at interviews between him and Gen. Huerta and Felix Diaz; that all correspondence and notes of every kind were either dictated directly to one of us, or when dictated to volunteer clerks, passed under our observation; that there was never the slightest indication of any understanding between Ambassador Wilson and Gens. Huerta and Felix Diaz excepting in regard to matters pertinent to the safety of the Americans and other foreign colonies within the City of Mexico; and that Ambassador Wilson's energies were directed throughout the bombardment to the saving of human life, to the bringing about of a cessation of hostilities, and after the fall of President Madero, to the restoration of order and peace within the City of Mexico and throughout the Republic.

We would also add that we have knowledge of the active efforts of the ambassador to render aid to various members of the Madero family, and especially to the deceased ex-president.

We voluntarily make this statement in view of the unjust attacks upon Ambassador Wilson by certain American newspapers and by some Mexicans of the late administration, whose characters in this Republic are not above reproach.

HENRY F. TENNANT,
Second Secretary of Embassy.

W. A. BURNSIDE,
Military Attache.

LOUIS D'ANTIN,
First Clerk of Embassy.

CHARLES B. PARKER,
Second Clerk of Embassy.

EMBASSY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Mexico City, April 14, 1913.

I, Nelson O'Shaughnessy, secretary of the embassy of the United States at Mexico City, Mexico, do hereby certify that the signatures of Henry F. Tennant, Louis d'Antin, Charles B. Parker, and W. A. Burnside, above annexed, are their true and genuine signatures, made and acknowledged in my presence, and that the said Henry F. Tennant, Louis d'Antin, Charles B. Parker, and W. A. Burnside, are known to me to be the persons they claim to be.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the embassy of the United States at Mexico City, the day and year next above written, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and thirty-seventh.

NELSON O'SHAUGHNESSY,
Secretary of the Embassy of the United States, Mexico City.

Mr. WILSON. It is disproved by letters from members of Madero's family in my possession, and which are among my papers. The whole story was an invention of an offended newspaper correspondent. It never had the slightest basis in fact. On the contrary, there was all the evidence in the world for those who wanted evidence that every effort that any human being could make in the premises had been made to save the life of this unfortunate demented man.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the newspaper correspondent to whom you refer?

Mr. WILSON. The inventor of the story was an American newspaper correspondent by the name of Murray.

Mr. KEARFUL. Robert H. Murray?

Mr. WILSON. I think those are his initials. He published articles in Harper's Weekly attacking me, under the head of "The Two Wilsons," and the entire paper was given up to these articles for four weeks. Immediately after they had published the last article, the magazine suspended.

Having no recourse, then, Murray being an utterly worthless man with no moral or financial standing, I brought suit against Norman Hapgood, the editor, in the District of Columbia, and finally obtained a judgment by confession. I took similar steps with reference to three or four other papers and magazines, in each case receiving a disavowal and apology. This was the only case in which I went to court.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did John Lind ever make any similar statements of that kind?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; but disavowed it. When brought face to face with the necessity of meeting the charge in court, he disavowed it. It is simply the loose talk of people who very largely were actuated by political considerations, but entirely overlooked the circumstances that in making charges of that kind they were not only assuming a certain risk themselves, but they were doing a great injustice to another.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you account for the state of mind of this newspaper correspondent?

Mr. WILSON. He was a man of enormous vanity, and I put him out of the embassy. One thing brought on another.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the occasion of your ejecting him from the embassy?

Mr. WILSON. He was guilty of frightening the ladies of the American colony by spreading the report, upon a night when there was an uprising and firing, that the American Embassy had been attacked. He seemed to do this with mischievous and malicious intent, and it brought on a very hysterical condition among the ladies of the American colony. For this performance I ordered him out of the embassy, and he left with the statement that he would get even.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the feeling of the Americans in Mexico City at that time with reference to this gentleman?

Mr. WILSON. One of entire disapproval. I do not think there was a dissenting voice in Mexico City among the Americans with reference to the embassy and the way in which I had discharged its obligations and met its responsibilities, except this one man who invented this story. I do not think there was another one.

Mr. KEARFUL. I was there at the time, and I can answer for the truth of that myself. Was it a fact that this gentleman was socially ostracised by the American colony in Mexico City at that time?

Mr. WILSON. I believe so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you take any steps to assist him, notwithstanding the treatment that you had received in that situation?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was that?

Mr. WILSON. I am rather disinclined to give this man so much importance. He is having rather more than I want him to have.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is important because he has addressed himself to the committee, which you perhaps do not know.

Mr. WILSON. Well, I may say that as a result of friendly correspondence and the friendly offices of Mr. Whifan, an Associated Press correspondent, I endeavored to remove the prejudice against him in the American colony, and while he apparently accepted my attitude with a great deal of gratitude, he nevertheless secretly crossed over to Havana and wrote this story, dispatching it by telegram to the New York World, and then afterwards denied that he had sent it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any reason to believe that he received cooperation in his efforts in attacking your character in the department at Washington.

Mr. WILSON. I am unable to understand where he could get the materials, unless he got them from the Department of State, and my belief in that is the more confirmed by the confidential files which I have here. These are mutilated to correspond precisely with the articles in Harpers Weekly. This volume was sent to me by Secretary Bryan. I do not believe he knows anything about it, but he sent it to me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Just explain what that volume is.

Mr. WILSON. This volume is a confidential print of the dispatches of the Department of State.

Mr. KEARFUL. Relating to Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Relating to Mexico; yes. It includes all of my dispatches and all of my telegrams, and all of the department's to me.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is marked "Confidential?"

Mr. WILSON. It is marked "Confidential," and therefore I am now retaining it in my possession. Of course, it is a difficult matter to carry this matter into testimony, but you can see here, if you take the trouble to compare it with a perfectly un mutilated copy, that out of this copy has been cut precisely the same things that were used in this paper.

Mr. KEARFUL. By Robert H. Murray?

Mr. WILSON. By Robert H. Murray, which was distorted, in some cases transposed, and in all cases misinterpreted.

Mr. KEARFUL. Garbled.

Mr. WILSON. Garbled for the purpose of giving a false impression. This was so manifest that no paper in the United States would touch it. It never was copied into a single paper. Here are the mutilations in the secret documents of the Department of State, cut out, almost clear through, transposed, and put before the printer in that way.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you happen to get possession of that confidential book?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Jenkinson, who was one of the very useful clerks in the Department of State, and who went up and down between Washington and Mexico several times, obtained them for me in a perfectly regular way. I was very anxious to have these volumes in addition to the regular ones in the Embassy at Mexico City, because I wanted an accurate history of the entire transaction for any possible future contingencies. These volumes were very voluminous, very interesting historically, and very valuable from a personal standpoint. After some difficulty Mr. Jenkins obtained an order from Mr. Bryan for these two volumes and brought them to me.

Afterwards, on going into the volumes and trying to account for the absence of some of my dispatches, I found these mutilated dispatches. I did not know at the time what those meant, but after these quotations came out in print, I found they corresponded precisely with the mutilations. Of course, you understand that the record department of the Department of State is a holy of holies, with no one except those in charge ever being permitted to touch any volume. I never placed my hand on a volume in that department as long as I was in the service of the Government of the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Through what process do you imagine a newspaper correspondent could gain such access to these documents, to be able to clip them?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would he not have to have an order from the Secretary of State himself?

Mr. WILSON. During the time of the gentleman—I can not recall his name—who was for many years in charge of the records there he would not have accepted an order from the Secretary of State to touch these documents. He considered himself directly responsible to the President for the safekeeping of these records and for their absolute secrecy.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that nothing less than an order from President Wilson would have enabled Mr. Murray to get at these documents?

Mr. WILSON. Anybody might have secured them, but not during the last administration, during this. Of course, you know that Mr. Bryan ran the Department of State like the back kitchen of a restaurant.

Mr. KEARFUL. While you were ambassador to Mexico, after the accession of Mr. Bryan to the office of Secretary of State, did you have any instances of incompetency or inattention to business?

Mr. WILSON. There was not very much else.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive telegrams uncoded, undated, and improperly addressed.

Mr. WILSON. Yes. This proceeded to such an extent that I finally declined to accept them as official, notifying Mr. Bryan that telegrams must be coded, must be properly addressed, must be sent from the Department of State before I could accept them as official.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the instructions that you received in regard to asking Mexico to join in the recognition of the Republic of China?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; Mr. Bryan instructed me to ask the Government of Mexico, which he had not recognized, to join with the United States in the recognition of the new Republic of China, and he also instructed me to extend an invitation upon several occasions to the Government of Mexico to associate itself with the United States in conferences.

Mr. KEARFUL. To join in a universal peace movement?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; in a universal peace movement.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was the government of Huerta?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; the government of Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there occasions when secret, special representatives were sent by the State Department or by the President to Mexico, without your knowledge?

Mr. WILSON. Of course if it was without my knowledge I would not know it now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Without notice to you at the time?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; two were sent while I was still in Mexico, one Mr. William Bayard Hale, who was sent there by the President, so far as I could ascertain and evidently to make a report to the President. The other person was Mr. del Valle, of California, who was sent there by Mr. Bryan to watch Mr. William Bayard Hale. I assumed that Mr. Bryan wanted to get his own views of the Mexican situation through other channels than those furnished by Mr. William Bayard Hale, for whom he had very little respect. This sentiment was fully reciprocated by Mr. Hale. Mr. William Bayard Hale, I imagine—although he has since fallen out with the President—sent a report which entirely suited the President. Mr. del Valle's report evidently did not please the President. He sent a report which was not at all satisfactory, in which he described the Madero administration as it actually was, and the Huerta administration as it was, and the conduct of the embassy as it had been. I did not understand that Mr. del Valle's purpose was to state the exact truth, and therefore I treated him with some lack of consideration which, however, did not affect his attitude, as I heard his report read myself in the Department of State. I was not intended to hear it, but I heard it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the missions of these gentlemen generally known in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; and especially that of Mr. William Bayard Hale, who had conferences with the Government officials down there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What effect did these conferences have on your prestige as ambassador?

Mr. WILSON. Nothing could have been worse.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did it tend to discredit you with the Mexicans?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any protest to the State Department in regard to it?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, to the Department of State and to the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. With what result?

Mr. WILSON. None.

Mr. KEARFUL. You got no response?

Mr. WILSON. In a letter to the President I expressed some views of the character of William Bayard Hale, and I think the President afterwards shared the same views which I expressed at that time, I mean, after we got into the war with Germany. Do you want this letter in the record?

Mr. KEARFUL. Just as you like.

Mr. WILSON. Do you want me to read it?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes, if you like.

Mr. WILSON (reading):

MEXICO, July 1, 1913.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I send you herewith, for your private and confidential information, a copy of an interview had with Dr. William Bayard Hale by the political secretary to Gen. Diaz, who is also an American and correspondent of the New York Sun.

This report was furnished to me by Gen. Diaz, who informed me at the same time that he had received other reports of a similar character and that both he and the Government had taken note of Dr. Hale's antagonistic attitude toward me and toward the present Government from the very moment of his arrival, and before he had any opportunity to make proper investigation.

He had his report ready the moment he got to Mexico. He did not have to wait until he got to Mexico City.

I have assumed that Dr. Hale has no official mission in Mexico and that he is not charged with the making of any report to you concerning conditions in Mexico, but in the event that information should be offered you from this source I deem it my duty, as your personal representative here, to say to you that this person is by temperament and habit entirely unfit to form a just and clear idea of the situation here. His mind appears to me, from the conversations which I have had with him, to be unevenly balanced, and the questions which he asks relative to events which have occurred here indicate a complete failure to grasp the underlying causes of the unrest in Mexico and absolute ignorance, or rather, misinformation as to the true history and chronology lying behind the scenes of the Mexican drama.

I know there is a disposition at this time in the United States to make of Madero a martyr to democratic ideals. Whatever may have been the history of his taking off, and I am not prepared to accept without reserve the opinion that the Government was privy thereto, the fact remains that the Madero family despoiled and corrupted every avenue of government and business in Mexico; that they talked glibly of liberty and human rights but gave none to the people; that they robbed the Government; seized without process of law the property of foreigners and Mexicans; debauched, silenced, and censored the press; established secret political societies which maintained a reign of terror; and made illegal arrests without warrant of law. All of the true and secret history of their brief rule in Mexico and prior thereto is known to no one but me. Others may have it in part but I have it all, and eventually I shall place it before the world together with clear demonstrations not only of the anti-American policy of these people but of their deliberate and almost organized efforts to attack almost every American interest in the country by legal conspiracies in collusion with the courts, and of the absolute inability of this embassy to secure the punishment of the murderers of Americans or of those who have deprived them of their property by violence or by stealth.

I feel, my dear Mr. President, that whatever may be your final attitude toward this Mexican administration, and it has its bad points as well as its good points, that it is my duty to you to see that you are in no wise misled either by the reports of sentimental idealists or by those who are endeavoring to bring about conditions which will force intervention, as to the real character of the Madero administration.

I do not expect to be in charge of this post very long. I have served my Government in the Diplomatic Service honorably and usefully for 17 years. I had the absolute confidence of Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, and the last named has placed in my hands a letter relative to my work at this post up to and including the last day of his administration, which would appear to justify my hope of receiving your confidence during such period as I may have the honor to serve under you. Beyond having the truth made known I care nothing. I beg to remain, my dear Mr. President,

Very sincerely, yours,

HENRY LANE WILSON.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MR. KEARFUL. What response did you get to that letter?

MR. WILSON. None. I did not expect any.

MR. KEARFUL. Why not?

MR. WILSON. I had not been able to get anything from the Secretary of State, and there was no reason to suppose that I would get it out of the President, but I intended to make a record. I intended that it should never be said that I had not advised everybody connected with the Wilson administration.

MR. KEARFUL. You spoke of your being called to Washington, following a report made by Dr. William Bayard Hale in reference to your having instigated the action of the Diplomatic Corps.

MR. WILSON. Yes.

MR. KEARFUL. What occurred then?

MR. WILSON. Immediately after Mr. William Bayard Hale sent his report, I received a telegram from Secretary Bryan instructing me to come to Washington, "for a consultation relative to the Mexican situation." That is the exact language of the telegram. I had assumed for some time that I would be relieved in Mexico, and expected it, and wanted it, but I doubted whether the administration would assume the responsibility of removing me or accepting my resignation at that very critical period. This seemed incredible, so when I had this telegram from the Secretary of State, I departed on the same day, leaving all my household goods and everything intact in Mexico City, supposing that I would at least have the privilege of returning to Mexico and arranging my affairs. When I arrived in the United States I was met by quite a lot of enterprising newspaper men, and I gave some very strong interviews as to conditions prevailing in Mexico at that time, trying to make it clear to the American people that Huerta was restoring peace in Mexico. I did that deliberately because it seemed to me that if public opinion were guided right in this country, the administration would go right. I recounted the circumstances that at that time Huerta had restored peace in every part of Mexico, and such peace as had never existed in the time of Madero; in every part of Mexico except in a small district in the State of Sonora where Carranza had gone as a fugitive. I gave these facts to the press. In conversations with members of the press I was asked a lot of questions which I did not answer, with reference to Bryan and the President. These questions suggested some things, which afterwards appeared as having been answered by me. They had transferred the questions around into answers.

As a matter of fact, I did not criticize either the President or the Secretary of State, and the New York Times correspondent or reporter who was present afterwards made a statement to that newspaper that I had been completely misrepresented in that instance. I suppose this circumstance had some influence upon the administration.

When I arrived in Washington Mr. Bryan told me that the President was very anxious to see me, and asked me to prepare a memorandum of the Mexican situation, a request which seemed to me rather peculiar, as all of the facts were in the records of the Department of State. However, I went to the Department of State and inquired from some of the employees there how much information the President had obtained through the records of the Department of State. I asked this simply to be guided in the formation of my memoranda. I was told that he had never read anything but the last volume of the confidential reports of 1913, and that therefore his knowledge of the Mexican situation was entirely confined to the events which occurred at the time of the overthrow of Madero. All of the events leading up to that of over two years, he knew nothing about.

MR. KEARFUL. Did you prepare a memorandum as requested?

MR. WILSON. Yes, I prepared a memorandum. I do not think it was a peculiarly happy memorandum, but it was sufficient for the occasion. The really important features about it were the recommendations made at the conclusion, and those I will ask to have inserted in the record.

(Recommendations concerning Mexico submitted by Ambassador Wilson to the President, in August, 1913, and afterwards to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate. Placed by Senate in Congressional Record:)

RECOGNITION.

Recognition under the present circumstances, can not be made with the same effect and same results as immediately after the assumption of power by the new administration. It would be misconstrued, now, as a yielding to pressure and force and would result in the loss of great prestige.

If recognition is accorded, it should be done in the following way:

First. By a preamble recognizing the remarkable and unprecedented situation in Mexico, the desire of the United States to contribute to the restoration of order in a neighbor and friendly state, and the necessity, on account of the important matters daily pending between the two Governments, to establish full official relations with all of the benefits and obligations resulting therefrom.

Second. No recognition should be accorded unless the important international questions like the Chamizal, the Colorado River, and the specific claims falling under a clear rule of international law, shall be immediately closed, upon the basis presented by the Government of the United States and agreed to by the Government of Mexico in correspondence with the ambassador and verbally.

Third. Recognition should not be accorded unless an international claims commission, having jurisdiction over all kinds and classes of claims arising out of the revolutionary movements during the last three years, shall be admitted in principle by the Mexican Government.

Fourth. Recognition should not be accorded unless ample guarantee for the holding of a constitutional presidential election, during the month of October, shall be given; and this should involve the removal of the present minister of Gobernacion who is a pure creature of Huerta and the substitution, therefor, of a Mexican of force and power, say Calero, who is thoroughly committed to the principle of constitutional government.

Fifth. Recognition should not be accorded unless the Federal Government is able to furnish evidence of its ability to restore peace and order to the twenty-sixth parallel.

Sixth. Recognition should not be accorded unless an arrangement can be made whereby, the American Government, in cooperation with the Mexican Government, will be able to cross the border and aid the Federal authorities in the restoration of order down to the twenty-sixth parallel, always giving ample stipulation for the retirement of our troops, whenever order and peace have been established, in the judgment of the American and Mexican commissioners duly appointed.

Recognition accorded in this manner will restore our lost prestige, impress foreign and native opinion in Mexico, and undoubtedly restore peace and avoid further bloodshed.

INTERVENTION.

If recognition is not accorded in some form or other our duty as a civilized nation, pledged to the world to preserve the peace and order in this hemisphere, points directly to immediate and effective intervention.

This should be done in the following way:

First. By discreetly removing the already decimated and ruined American population of Mexico.

Second. By the transfer of the charge of our diplomatic and consular establishments to the representatives of other powers.

Third. By the massing of our fleet in overwhelming proportions, aided by effective marine reserves at every Mexican port on the Atlantic and Pacific.

Fourth. By the massing of our Army, fully equipped for invasion at every strategic point lying on the border States, and calling out the reserves in all the border States.

Fifth. By the appointment of commissioners, one of whom should be the ambassador, another the general in chief of the Army, another the ranking officer of the investing fleet, and another a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate. The duty of this commission would be to seek by a preliminary action, a reconciliation of all the contending forces in Mexico, with the understanding that their duty should be urgent, expeditious and not detained by any dilatory methods and with a further understanding that they should follow in the path of invasion, reestablishing the rule of law and dispensing justice and order in the name of the United States.

An invasion should be accompanied by a public statement that our purpose is not one of aggression, but that we are acting in the discharge of a duty to humanity and civilization and that when once constitutional methods and practices are reestablished and a firm government installed our troops will retire to the United States.

Mr. WILSON. These recommendations were made to the President, and were afterwards made to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate. I am quite sure I am not exaggerating when I say that they were very favorably received by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

Mr. KEARFUL. You judge that from expressions of members of the committee?

Mr. WILSON. From their expressions and their attitude and from what members of the committee told me. This testimony, however, was interrupted by the President, who said to Senator Bacon and Mr. Flood, who was at that time chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Relations, that he did not care for "any further exploitation of my views." I consider this testimony which I am giving now as a resumption of the testimony which I gave about five years ago to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which was interrupted by the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you called before the committee to testify?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were called by the committee?

Mr. WILSON. I was called before the committee, and received permission from the Department of State to testify. That is the case. Senator Bacon, who was at that time chairman of the committee, obtained the permission; Mr. Bryan furnished Senator Bacon all of the records, and I was allowed to produce in the testimony before the Committee on Foreign Relations all of the documents emanating from the embassy but none emanating from the Department of State.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say that the President interrupted that testimony by making the request of the chairman that he did not desire that you should testify further?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; he used the phrase that he did not care for any further exploitation of my views.

Mr. KEARFUL. But his order, if you may call it such, was obeyed by the committee?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; quite so. Obeyed is the word.

Mr. KEARFUL. The testimony that you gave at that time, as far as you went, was not published?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; it was not intended to be published. It was entirely confidential to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the political construction of the committee at that time?

Mr. WILSON. Democratic.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know, at least by reputation, Mr. Venustiano Carranza, the President of Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know him personally at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know him by reputation?

Mr. WILSON. He was not a person prominent in public life when I was in Mexico. He was a Senator, but one of those inconspicuous Senators, whom among a large number are passed by without notice. I do not know him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Calero in his book before mentioned, says on page 68. of Carranza:

Carranza, the nominal chief, has the record of an obscure and servile politician of the dictatorship of Porfirio Diaz. He, who had arrived at old age without revealing any aptitude as a statesman, notwithstanding the opportunities which he had had, appeared the least able to place himself at the front of a country so difficult to govern as Mexico.

Is that a fair statement in regard to Carranza?

Mr. WILSON. I think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had he ever distinguished himself as a member of the Diaz government?

Mr. WILSON. No. You may infer that from the circumstance that I never even heard of him, and it was my business to know everybody in Mexico who had any measure of prominence.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you first hear of him?

Mr. WILSON. I first heard of him after he was appointed governor of Coahuila by the Madero administration, and later on, during the Madero administration, a number of the State governments got into financial difficulties and were unable to meet their obligations. To meet this situation the Federal Government made loans to these States to finance them through the difficult periods. Among other States, the State of Coahuila, of which Carranza was governor, was extended financial aid. Later on, in the settlement of these transactions, or the attempt to settle them, there was a very decided difference of opinion between the Maderos and Carranza, culminating finally in a demand from the Madero government that Carranza should make a clear and explicit statement of the disposition of these funds that had been placed in his hands. Mr. Ernesto Madero; minister of hacienda (the treasury), and the President himself told me of the difficulties existing between Carranza and the Government, and indicated that they intended to take some very energetic action. While this was pending the Madero government fell, and at that time Carranza was not a Maderista; he belonged to an association of northern governors who were preparing a secession movement against Madero. Immediately, however, with the downfall of Madero, he, like Villa and a lot of those men, became a Maderista.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was at the time of the revolution that he became a Maderista?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. After Huerta became installed in power, the rapidity of the submission to his government throughout Mexico was astonishing. All over Mexico in every direction men who had been in constant rebellion ever since early in 1910 were submitting to Huerta daily and every hour. Carranza was in the State of Chihuahua, and, as I understand—I do not say this positively because I do not know it—but, as was generally said at the time, he was quite willing to submit to Huerta if his official transactions were not investigated, and our consul—I think it was Mr. Holland, but I am not sure—

Mr. KEARFUL. That is at Saltillo—

Mr. WILSON. Initiated telegraphic correspondence with me at the request of Carranza for the purpose of extracting some sort of attitude out of the Huerta government of a friendly character that would enable him to submit with good grace to the Huerta government.

Mr. KEARFUL. To enable Carranza to submit?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; and as I was very busy trying to accomplish a state of things exactly in line with what he wanted, I readily lent myself to the attempt and went to Mondragon, secretary of war for Huerta, and showed him these telegrams, urging him not to dispatch any more troops into Coahuila, but to await the development of the situation, and to give this man a chance to save his face and to make an arrangement. They quite agreed with me, apparently, but I think only apparently. I think they started a troop movement. I communicated the replies to the consul, the consul communicated them to Carranza, and Carranza made his reply. I went again, but finally found that I could not trust either side; that I was just simply exerting myself, getting red in the face, and accomplishing nothing at all, so I dropped the matter, and in the meantime Huerta did invade the State of Coahuila and drove Carranza out. He became a fugitive and finally took refuge in the State of Sonora with Obregon, who is fighting him at this moment with the power of the State of Sonora. At that time he did not have 500 troops altogether and was not an object of any consideration either to Villa or Zapata or Huerta, or anybody who was in power in Mexico.

Just at this moment our Government began to express an interest in the Mexican situation and announced the peculiar doctrine, that "Governments founded upon violence would not be recognized." This was contrary to all the precedence of this Government from its foundation. Our Government began inquiring actively into the situation, through consuls, through private agents of all sorts in Mexico, and finally the elements which had submitted and were apparently thoroughly subdued and prepared to return to peaceful activities, began to look up and pay attention and say, "Here is the Government of the United States interested in having Huerta overthrown." The consequence was that thousands and thousands of men began to leave their peaceful pursuits and go back into the business of revolutionizing Mexico.

Our Government then enlarged its activities by sending John Lind down to Mexico as an unofficial representative, and by dispatching envoys to represent us in a movement against a friendly Government, and then lifted the embargo on arms and ammunition and permitting them to go across the border, to be used for the purpose of murder. By natural sequence, it became finally involved in the seizure of the port of Vera Cruz and the landing of troops for the real purpose of overthrowing the government of Huerta. The landing of troops there had no purpose in the world except to overthrow Huerta.

MR. KEARFUL. You think, then, this flag incident was merely a pretext?

MR. WILSON. Absolutely so. The purpose was to seize the custom-house with its revenues. They had already destroyed his credit, through our diplomatic establishment in Europe, so that he could not get any money and was obliged to dispatch his troops to the north and fight Villa and Carranza without arms and without ammunition. Thousands of men went into the engagement without any ammunition, because of the circumstance that Huerta could not make supply purchases.

This incident, followed by the Tampico incident, and then by the massacre of Santa Ysabel, and the invasion of American soil at Columbus and other points, followed eventually by the dispatch of the so-called punitive expedition. This expedition invaded Mexico for the purpose of punishing Villa and never caught him, but was finally attacked by the army of Carranza—

Mr. KEARFUL. With American guns and ammunition?

Mr. WILSON. With American arms and ammunition, in which attacks altogether something like 30 American soldiers were killed, at Carrizal, Parral, and other places. This situation became so tense and these abuses became so gross, and these barbarities so repugnant to civilized concepts, that the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, who was endeavoring to carry out the policy of the administration as best he could, was finally obliged to write an indictment of the Mexican Government which was rather inconsistent with the policy which the administration had pursued and is pursuing.

Mr. KEARFUL. You refer to the note of June 20, 1916?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. During this time or, rather, during the troubled period, 665 Americans have been murdered on Mexican soil and on the border, without a single Mexican ever having been brought to justice. If there is any Mexican who has been brought to justice, I have been unable to ascertain the fact.

During this time it has cost this Government very close to half a billion dollars to carry out this particular policy; that is to say, to prevent the Carranza government from being overturned by movements from our borders. You possibly know there is about a million of the best Mexicans in the United States to-day. These would cross the border any day if the bars were let down.

About 300,000 Mexicans have been killed and about 100,000 more have died from pestilence and starvation; the $100,000,000 which Diaz left in the treasury has disappeared, and in its place there is a deficit of something like $350,000,000; 3,600 churches have been desecrated—I am giving these statistics from memory; I have them all in my papers—1,500 clergymen have been expelled from the country; 364 religious institutions; that is to say, nunneries and places where women are—

Mr. KEARFUL. Parochial schools?

Mr. WILSON. Have been desecrated under circumstances that are not fit for print. At the present moment we have 80,000 troops on the border—I am using the figures of perhaps a month ago, but these are estimates of people in military circles—which are costing the people of the United States $100,000,000 a year.

This border force is maintained not for the purpose of protecting American citizens in Mexico or for the purpose of influencing conditions there. Their presence on the border may be of some incidental importance, but their presence is really made necessary by the policy of the present administration, which is bound to maintain Carranza in power, to prevent invasions of Mexico, and thus maintain the legend that there is peace and order across the border. Any failure of the administration to protect the Carranza administration or any hostile act by this Government which would bring about the downfall of Carranza would be equivalent to a confession by the Wilson administration that its whole policy toward Mexico is a mistake.

My statistics on the matter of the number of Americans killed in Mexico have been made up from three sources. One is the Government's reports, one is my own record made while in charge of the embassy in Mexico—that is to say, I made the record up to that time—and the third is private letters and newspaper telegraphic reports.

For instance, a month ago the number of Americans who had been murdered in Mexico was 653. To-day it is 665.

Mr. KEARFUL. There is another passage in Mr. Calero's book that I want to read to you. He says, on page 34, in reference to Carranza:

He had passed 25 years of his life serving with humility the man whom to-day he calls with disdain "the tyrant of Mexico," Porfirio Diaz. Carranza was a senator under the government of Diaz and never did anything else in the senate except to approve, without the slightest protest, the recommendations of that tyrant whom to-day he denies. In the two years in which he was the governor of the State of Coahuila, Carranza promoted nothing which would reveal him as the reformer which he now pretends to be, nor did he do anything for the political, moral, or economic advancement of the people.

Not only this, but Carranza, enemy of progressive innovations, was the only governor who opposed having schools established in the State under the auspices of the Federal Government when President Madero, in execution of a law initiated in the time of Diaz, was trying to diffuse elementary instruction in a country in which 85 per cent of the population does not know how to read or write.

This is the true Carranza, the man who, together with Villa, received the aid of the United States in seizing the Government of Mexico.

Do you think Mr. Calero is a man who could be regarded as an authority to speak upon that subject?

Mr. WILSON. Absolutely.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe this statement is correct?

Mr. WILSON. It is. I have a very high opinion of Mr. Calero, both of his moral character and his intellectual attainments.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Calero is one of the Mexican exiles to whom you referred?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not such men as Calero and the other Mexicans who are unable to live in their own country that it is necessary to depend upon for government in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. Mr. Calero belongs to the whites. He has no Indian blood. He is of pure Spanish blood, and there is a vast number of Mexicans of that class in the United States now; and also of the industrial class, who are spreading all over the western part of the United States at this particular moment, seeking simply to live. They want to get on in the world, and they have crossed the border and have come clear up as far north as Kansas City, and they are invading the hotel service and the public automobile service and everything of that sort, thousands of them, and I must say that they work very faithfully and render good services.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Calero also speaks of the agrarian problem, so-called, in Mexico, and the revolutionary pretext of dividing up the lands for the peons. He says on page 81:

As experience has amply demonstrated, it will serve for nothing to divide up the land among the Indians, for the latter, for want of resources and because of their ignorance, are not capable of keeping it. Nor is it possible to establish a country of small proprietors wherein there are no institutions of rural credit or ways of communication or the other elements and facilities which exist in countries where agrarian property is subdivided among numerous cultivators.

To accomplish the realization of all this, which is the labor of years, a constitutional government is required, which will subject its proceedings to the laws, and which will enjoy a firm credit; that is to say, a government precisely different from that of from which Carranza is the head.

Do you agree with that statement in regard to that feature?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say you sent in your resignation more than once.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Apart from the formal resignation that would naturally be submitted at the time of the change of administration, what were the reasons that actuated you in desiring to resign?

Mr. WILSON. Well, I had been carrying a very heavy burden of responsibility there, a responsibility that had almost broken me down, with a friendly administration in Washington. It seemed to me that it would be very difficult and very harmful to American interests for me to attempt to carry on the representation of the American Government, with an administration in Washington that had no confidence in me. I therefore dispatched a letter to the President, which he received a few days after his inaugural, through a very intimate Democratic friend, very high in the counsels of the party, in which I tendered my resignation, after explaining the very difficult situation which existed, and the necessity for selecting as my successor a man with the qualities that were exactly needed for that delicate task, I offered to come to Washington and assist him for a reasonable period in adjusting the situation. This was read to him, or he read it, I am not sure which. I think it was read to him, and then destroyed in his presence. However, I have no copy of it.

Again I tendered my formal resignation, which is quite enough, if anybody wanted to act on it. The other two were not necessary.

Then, when the Department of State permitted these stories about the attitude of the administration toward me to be circulated day after day, without any denial, and I called upon Mr. Bryan for a denial, and that denial was not accorded, I again resigned in language that was very forceful. That resignation was not accepted. Finally my resignation was accepted by the President actually because of absolute disagreement as to the recognition of the government of Huerta, after I had placed before him a memorandum covering the situation, and the recommendations by which recognition should be carried out had been handed to him.

After my resignation was accepted, when the terms in which the President made the announcement to the press were read to me, I dissented very strongly from it, and said to Mr. Bryan that I had been 17 years in the Diplomatic Service of the United States; that I had rendered faithful and honorable service during the terms of three Presidents, in addition to Mr. Wilson; and that I thought it would not lower the dignity of the administration at all to say so; that with that statement I would be entirely satisfied and would leave the service in a spirit of perfect content. Mr. Bryan seemed to be very anxious to do this—and I must say he was always extremely kind. He seemed very anxious to do it, and he took the statement over to the President, who replied that he “had an open mind”—I am using his exact words, because you have heard them since—he had an open mind with reference to my record, but that he had not had time to investigate and did not know, and he was therefore not prepared to make a statement of that kind. “Well,” I said, “Mr. Secretary, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. McKinley have both given utterance to very emphatic expressions about my record, which have been published and which are matters of record, and Mr. Taft has just placed in my hands one of the handsomest testimonials any public officer ever had, which I intend to give to the press when I leave this room, and I see no reason why the President of the United States should not give me the simple recognition of the value of the services which I have performed under his three predecessors." He said, "I have given you my final answer, Mr. Ambassador. I am sorry nothing can be done." I said, "Very good."

That was in August, and my resignation did not take effect until the month of November following. I then remained in Washington for something like a month, helping with the difficult situation in Mexico in the Department of State, and to a very considerable extent directing the action of our representatives in Mexico, under the supervision, of course, of Mr. Bryan. While I was engaged there in this business for the department, at its request, and also because I felt deeply concerned about the fate of a great many of our Americans in Mexico, the newspapers published a dispatch or news telegram from London, in which it was said that the British Government had been induced to recognize Huerta's government because of the circumstance that the American ambassador had delivered a speech to Huerta which amounted to recognition. This was published in the papers, and Mr. Bryan and the President, when seen by the press representatives, expressed great gratification that the British Government had made a statement which was equivalent to impeaching the correct procedure of their own representative.

I immediately turned my attention to this matter, and I found this circumstance: First, that the British Government well knows that no diplomatic officer can ever recognize a chief executive in any country. I do not know whether Mr. Bryan knew it or not, but, as a matter of fact, every diplomat knows it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Every diplomat knows it?

Mr. WILSON. Every diplomat knows it. Second, that the British Government never expresses its views through the press. It expresses itself in Parliament always. It has a different system. It does not have to go to the press.

Armed with this understanding, I gave an interview to the press—which I wrote, not entirely without feeling, because I was indignant—in which I said that I doubted very much whether the British Government ever made any such statement through its authorized representatives; that it was impossible for me to conceive of the British Government ever making such a statement, well acquainted as I was with its methods of procedure and with the methods of British public men; and that I felt I was called upon to tell the real circumstances, these were that the brief remarks made to Huerta by me on behalf of the Diplomatic Corps were written by the British minister and the Spanish minister, and I had nothing to do with it. I declined to draw the paper because I was conscious of a delicate situation, so I simply followed instructions and delivered the words as prepared by the Diplomatic Corps.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you did that because you were the dean of the corps?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; I did that because I was dean of the corps. I gave this explanatory statement out to the press of the country, and it created quite a lot of newspaper comment. The President was reported by the press to be very angry about it, and was studying what he would do about it—what kind of punishment could be inflicted. He had not gotten his war powers then.

Their agents rushed about and tried to find out whether the British Government had made this statement, but no one could be found. They tried to get hold of the British ambassador, who was up somewhere in the North, near Mansfield, Conn., I think, but they could not find him quickly, and they were so anxious to get this note out that they did not wait. So they wrote a note to the British Government, and gave it to the press, reprimanding me for undiplomatic remarks about Great Britain and another to the British Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Apologizing to Great Britain?

Mr. WILSON. Apologizing to Great Britain. This was immediately published in Great Britain, and the British foreign office announced, through the New York Times, that they did not know what the American Government was apologizing for; then when their attention was called to the exact words used, they said there was nothing irregular or undiplomatic in the statements made. So our Government was placed in the attitude of apologizing for an utterance of its representative, provoked by its own utterances, and which were declared by the Government about which they had been made as being of no importance whatever.

After that I tendered my resignation again, and insisted upon being immediately relieved, but it was not acted on, and I remained in the service until the month of November.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you go back to Mexico to wind up your affairs?

Mr. WILSON. No; Mr. Bryan asked me not to go back. Of course, I understood the reason.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the name of your successor as ambassador to Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Henry P. Fletcher.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Fletcher, for whom Mr. Inman vouches as efficient, was called before the Rules Committee of the House on July 22, 1919, to testify about Mexico, and he testified, among other things, that "the Carranza government controls all of Mexico," that the Carranza government is "fulfilling its mission as a government toward the people of Mexico." Asked as to the general attitude of the Mexican people toward the Government and people of the United States, he answered: "They have committed as a government no act that I know of that would be considered inimical." Asked as to the situation between the two governments, he answered: "I think it has improved in the last three years."

Subsequently, as shown by the testimony of the witness Oliver, Mr. Fletcher prevented the shipment of arms and ammunition to the Carranza government, after a permit had been issued by the State Department, at that time ridiculing the ability of the Carranza forces to protect the population from the rebels, and stating that the munitions were apt to be used against Americans.

Later, in December, as shown by the ad iterim report of the chairman of this committee, Mr. Fletcher was in sympathy with and approved the resolution introduced in the Senate by the chairman of this committee on December 2, requesting the President to withdraw recognition from Carranza, which resolution, as shown by the same report, was very strongly disapproved by the President, on the ground that the Congress had no constitutional function to act upon it, shortly after which Mr. Fletcher resigned.

Mr. WILSON. No; he had resigned long before that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Shortly after that, or some time after that, he left the office of ambassador.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; that is a correct statement. He had resigned a long time before.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee was desirous of procuring the testimony of Mr. Fletcher with reference to what his attitude really was, and what his experience in Mexico actually had been, but our information is that he has gone to Europe. Do you know what the ground of his resignation was?

Mr. WILSON. Fairly well. I assume that Mr. Fletcher's statements while he was on the witness stand were made vary largely in a spirit of deference to the administration. I assume that he took the position that while he was in the service it was necessary for him to state the matters the way the administration wanted them stated. I do not intend by this to endeavor to describe Mr. Fletcher's opinions or character or morals. That is not my intention at all. I assume that his purpose was to maintain loyalty and consistency, even at the expense of veracity. Nor do I mean to say that he was not veracious. I am simply trying to analyze the situation, because, as a matter of fact, when he resigned his resignation was an indictment of the administration for its lack of policy and for the failure of power which this lack of policy had brought about, in procuring satisfactory results for American interests. The latter was couched in diplomatic language, and was courteous, but it left no room for doubt as to its meaning. I see no reason for criticism of Mr. Fletcher; his position was difficult.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know of Mr. George A. Chamberlain, who was consul general at Mexico City after you left there, and during the Carranza régime?

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know why he resigned?

Mr. WILSON. Only from his own statements in the papers.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for his resignation, as thus stated?

Mr. WILSON. Absolute disapproval of the administration's attitude in Mexican affairs. He has written a number of articles in the magazines here.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know John Bassett Moore, who was counsel of the State Department under Secretary Bryan?

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know why he resigned?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know. I was told at the time that he resigned very largely because of dissatisfaction with the administration's attitude in Mexican affairs. I was told this in the Department of State.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that a matter of common knowledge in the department?

Mr. WILSON. It was at that time.

(Whereupon the further examination of the witness was adjourned until Saturday, April 17, 1920, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

Testimony taken at Washington, D. C., April 17, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HENRY LANE WILSON—Resumed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Wilson, you stated that in 1910 there were about 75,000 Americans operating in Mexico and about 10,000 in Mexico City. What information have you as to those Americans in Mexico since that time?

Mr. WILSON. During the time I was in charge of the embassy, especially during the latter stages of the Madero administration and markedly so during the latter stages of the Huerta administration when it became evident that recognition was not to be accorded to Huerta, the American emigration was very heavy from every part of Mexico to the United States. In the City of Mexico probably 50 per cent of the Americans, apprehensive of the results which might follow the failure of the Washington administration to recognize the government of Huerta, left for the United States either to await the final outcome or remain permanently.

Correspondence with the consulates throughout Mexico and advices brought from other sources indicated to me that at the time I left Mexico about 20,000 Americans had left. Information which has come into my possession from various sources since my departure and during the disturbed conditions preceding and following the Presidency of Carranza is that from 25,000 to 30,000 Americans have left Mexico and are now in this country. This would make a total of about 55,000 Americans who have returned to the United States. Whether there has been any counterflow or not I am unable to say. At the same time my estimate of the number of Mexicans who have left Mexico on account of the disturbed conditions and who are now living in the United States awaiting the restoration of normal conditions amounts to about 1,000,000 people. These emigrants, or rather fugitives, come from the landowning intellectual middle classes in Mexico to a very large extent, but there is also a very large percentage from the laboring class in Mexico, who find it impossible to continue peaceful pursuits during the present régime there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what the attitude of this Government has been with respect to the Americans living and having business in Mexico remaining there?

Mr. WILSON. During the administration of Huerta the Americans were ordered out of Mexico by the Department of State and I believe by proclamation, but I am not sure.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have occasion to ascertain by conversation with Secretary Bryan or President Wilson what their attitude was in regard to the Americans in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. I believe you will have to put that question some other way. I know pretty well what their policy toward Mexico was, but their attitude toward Americans was another thing.

Mr. KEARFUL. Apart from the various orders that were given for Americans to leave Mexico, what was the attitude, if you know, in regard to the Americans there?

Mr. WILSON. Personally, neither the President nor Mr. Bryan expressed to me any opinion upon the subject of the Americans in Mexico. From various sources, from Americans who had had interviews with Mr. Bryan and the President and from the position taken by the President and Mr. Bryan in receiving the American delegation representing the American colony, it appeared to be quite evident that any testimony from American sources was regarded with suspicion, and that persons who were interested in Mexico were regarded as prejudiced witnesses.

Mr. KEARFUL. I understand that your principal concern was with reference to the life and interests of American citizens in Mexico. Was not that matter discussed between you and the President when you saw him here on returning from Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. I had only one interview with the President, which covered not to exceed two hours of time. Prior to that interview I went to the Department of State and inquired from some of the subordinates what papers and documents the President had called for, for the purpose of informing himself on the Mexican question. I was told by subordinates that he had only called for the last confidential report—that is to say, for the report made from the embassy covering the revolution against Madero—and that he had not asked to be furnished with any of the preceding reports. I made this inquiry for the purpose of being able to discuss with the President the situation in an intelligent way.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your conversation with the President did he express any concern for the lives or properties or interests of Americans in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. No. The entire conversation was confined to the question of the recognition of Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. With respect to Americans who had established themselves in business and in homes in Mexico, what was the effect upon them of their being told to leave that country?

Mr. WILSON. Thousands of them have been absolutely ruined. Perhaps I would better say that in the interview with the President he maintained a very reserved attitude with reference to the situation in Mexico and that by the very force of the circumstances I was compelled to do most of the talking. The basis of my representations to the President was the recognition of Huerta and I submitted to him a memorandum which is elsewhere inserted, outlining precisely how recognition ought to be accorded and what reserves ought to be insisted upon. I also recommended that in the event that recognition was not accorded that, in compliance with what would be our apparent duty in the situation which would result, intervention would probably become necessary and I indicated how that intervention could be carried into effect.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the President seem to be impressed with your recommendations?

Mr. WILSON. No. His only comment was that Huerta would not carry them out. At the time he made this statement I had the verbal assurances of Huerta that he would expect, in the event of the firm installation of his government, to have the moral assistance and advice of the Government of the United States in procuring by evolutionary practice the gradual establishment of real democratic methods in the government of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any notice given to American citizens to leave Mexico during the administration of President Taft?

Mr. WILSON. None. During the administration of President Madero conditions in Mexico became, especially toward the last, practically intolerable in certain parts of Mexico. It was very difficult to secure protection for Americans in these districts. I therefore recommended to the Department of State that consuls within these especially dangerous zones be instructed through the embassy to advise—not order, but to advise—Americans to change their residences to urban centers where protection could be accorded. But no Americans were ever ordered out of Mexico during the Taft administration. On the border some of the consuls probably ordered Americans to go into the United States as that was the safest and easiest place of procuring safety.

Mr. KEARFUL. These advices related only to certain restricted and dangerous districts?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; and they are defined in the statement which was issued.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those were districts in which there were revolutionary or bandit activities?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; and there was no protection at all. Those localities were named.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know what became of the Maderos and the property of the Madero family under the rule of Carranza?

Mr. WILSON. For a long time the Maderos were not permitted to enter Mexico and their estates were seized by the Carranza government. Whether that condition still exists or not I am unable to say.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Carranza start his revolution as a Maderista and as a protest against the assassination of Madero?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that that was the real motive or merely an ostensible one?

Mr. WILSON. That was the popular and sentimental slogan suited to the situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. How do you account for the state of mind of President Wilson in adopting and following out the policy that he has adopted and followed in reference to Mexico and the American citizens in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. It is of course impossible for me to fathom the President's mind or to analyze accurately the motives which impelled him to the adoption of the peculiar policy or lack of policy which has been pursued with reference to Mexico during the last seven years.

From close observation and study of the President's character in connection with other policies of the administration, I am inclined to think that his policy toward Mexico was the result of a mental obsession that all knowledge and all power rest in the Executive. It is impossible to believe that the motives of the President were not good, but as to the inspiration of these motives I think we may obtain a fairly clear idea from his course at other critical periods in the history of the last seven years.

I believe the President came into office obsessed with the idea that he held a mandate from the American people not only to reverse all the policies of his predecessors, but with the determination to enlarge and perhaps exaggerate the power of the Executive beyond all precedent in our history. To this idea he has risen mentally, but certain weaknesses in his character have usually brought about inconsistent and hesitating performance. To illustrate, one of the first acts of President Wilson after assuming office was to destroy what is generally known as the Six-Powers Agreement which had been constituted by the great powers of Europe in conjunction with the United States not only for the purpose of the development and evolution of China, but likewise for the purpose of holding Japan in check.

The result of the President's precipitate action was that all semblance of European and American control over Asiatic conditions was sacrificed, and the great prestige and influence which this Government demanded and obtained under the administration of the Department of State by Mr. John Hay was lost. Following the collapse of the six-power agreement Japan asserted a practical sovereignty over China. With the outbreak of the European war she advanced her position and became practically the overlord of all far eastern countries. Here at this point was recorded the direct result of the precipitate and unwise action of President Wilson in foreign affairs. He was immediately brought face to face with the unfortunate results which were made quite evident in the Lansing-Ishii treaty, by which the Government of the United States recognized the predominance and overlordship of Japan in the Far East, a predominance and overlordship which had been brought about very largely by the weakness of this administration and by its precipitate action. The Lansing-Ishii treaty affords a very fair illustration of the logical but unpleasant consequences of precipitate haste in adventurous diplomacy too often expressed in grandiloquent phraseology.

The evil results of this hasty step did not, unfortunately, end there, for when President Wilson engaged in the discussions of the peace conference at Paris he was again confronted with the fruits of his unfortunate diplomacy in the form of demands made by Japan before the conference, accompanied by subtle threats, that actual lordship over the Peninsula of Shantung should be accorded to her, and the peace conference, which at that moment was beset by the urgent demands of Italy, along with other vexatious problems, rather than add to its difficulties, admitted the claims of Japan, which are in direct contravention with the principles enunciated by the President in his Mount Vernon speech.

In other words, in the announcement and definition of a foreign policy which the President seems to consider his special province, we have precipitate announcement of doctrine, but there is usually absolute failure of performance, because between announcement and conclusion, the fruit of un wisdom is borne.

The same quality of mind is illustrated in the discussion of article 10 of the peace treaty. Article 10 is an important article in the treaty, but there are other articles which are fully as important and vital. However, the President wrote article 10, and that was his sole contribution to the treaty of peace. Confronted with the American opposition to article 10, which had been precipitately and adventurously injected into the treaty by the President himself, the President shows a preference to sacrifice the interests of the bleeding world rather than sacrifice his pride of authorship and opinion. Therefore, the treaty falls because article 10 is modified and changed contrary to his wishes.

The attitude of the President in Mexican affairs has been, from the origin of the difficulties there, that he understood the situation and that no one else did. To this mental obsession he has clung in spite of an absolute collapse of his policy and of widespread and disastrous consequences, and in my opinion he will continue to maintain the attitude which he has assumed, as I am informed he has written the plank on Mexico for the Democratic national convention, in which it is declared that a state of peace reigns in Mexico and that his policy has been vindicated.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present information in regard to the state of peace that reigns in Sonora, perhaps the largest State of the Republic of Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. My information is that the State of Sonora and the State of Sinaloa are both in revolution against the central government. I have heard that there were other States, but I have no positive information about that. The population of the States of Sonora and Sinaloa is made up very largely of white Mexicans who emigrated 50 or 75 years ago from Texas. It is quite distinct from the other border population.

Mr. KEARFUL. Sonora is the State in which Carranza's revolution was started, with the assistance of Gen. Alvaro Obregon, is it not?

Mr. WILSON. No; hardly that. The revolution of Carranza started in the State of Coahuila, but he was driven out of Coahuila by Huerta and became a fugitive. He finally went to Hermosillo, in the State of Sonora, and was received and protected by Obregon. At that time he had no soldiers at all, but was an absolute fugitive from the Federal Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. What I meant was that his first successes began under protection of Obregon?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. In order to illustrate what you have just been saying about President Wilson's strange misconception of Mexico, I refer to Mr. Calero's book again. On page 77 he said, quoting Mr. Wilson:

"My passion is for the submerged 85 per cent of the people of that Republic, who are now struggling toward liberty," said Mr. Wilson in May, 1914, referring to the revolution, whose most conspicuous figure was then Francisco Villa. (Interview in the Saturday Evening Post.)

Who composes that 85 per cent? Mr. Wilson himself undertakes to say: "The present revolution, like all preceding revolutions, is primarily a revolution by the peons, who want to regain their land;" and he adds that the revolution was "a fight for the land, just that and nothing more."

On page 68, Calero gives his conception of the motives of the revolution as follows:

No one could have confidence in the revolution, because in this there dominated that which dominates in all Latin-American revolutions: The personal ambition of one, or various men to possess themselves of the Government. Only Mr. Wilson, who appears ignorant of the psychology of this kind of revolts, could believe that it was the conscientious movement of a people struggling for liberty; but for those who are acquainted with that psychology, the confidence or want of confidence which the revolution inspired, was measured by the confidence or want of confidence which its leaders inspired.

Particularizing as to the acts of the revolutionists at that time, he said on page 61:

The struggle between the Carranzistas and the Conventionists (of which latter group Villa was the head) assumed a character of terrible cruelty. Those combatants did not appear to fight against their enemies, but against the immense pacific population. Everyone, who may have followed the changes of this drama, knows the infinite number of attacks upon the honor of women, upon religion, upon property and upon life. A savage struggle in which the Yaquis, barbarous and sanguinary, who formed a part of the hosts of Carranza, the criminals, taken from all the prisons, the Mexican Indian, ignorant and avid for blood and rapine, who formed the bulk of the combatants, satisfied their instincts for bestial ferocity at the expense of fifteen millions of human beings.

Hunger and pestilence increased the ravages of war. The military chiefs made scandalous fortunes, and what they did not appropriate to themselves was sent to the United States to the voracious speculators, who were paid with the bread and tears of the Mexican people for the arms and ammunition which sustained that infernal conflict.

Read the reports of the Red Cross; examine the official data with which the Department of State is stuffed, and it will be seen that while thousands of women and children were dying for lack of food, cargoes of corn, beans, live stock, and all that could satisfy hunger, went out of the Mexican ports and of the frontier cities to be converted into rifles and cartridges, into instruments of destruction.

Which do you think is correct, President Wilson or Mr. Calero?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Calero's is a very accurate description. It is practically and precisely, except as to the words, the position I have taken in numbers of addresses and numbers of magazine articles.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does this statement of Mr. Calero accord with the note that you mentioned yesterday that was sent by Secretary Lansing in June, 1916, to President Carranza?

Mr. WILSON. The conclusions are the same.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you conceive that it is possible for the Democratic convention at San Francisco to adopt a plank approving and sustaining the policy of President Wilson under those conditions and upon those facts?

Mr. WILSON. It is hardly possible for me to analyze the Democratic convention or the attitude it may take upon any public question.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that any patriotic body of men could approve that policy in the light of those facts?

Mr. WILSON. A resolution approving the policy of the President toward Mexico in view of what has happened toward the Americans there would be equivalent to a resolution passed by any body of Americans in this country, after the blowing up of the Lusitania, indicating German sympathy. There is not a particle of difference except that the one thing occurred on land and the crimes and the tragedies were scattered over a considerable period of time, and the other occurred on the sea and the tragedy occurred at once. There is no difference whatever. From my standpoint any man—assuming that he is fairly well informed—who supports the Mexican policy of President Wilson is unpatriotic and un-American.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have come in contact with the Mexican people. Can you give a statement as to the character and potentialities of the Mexican people?

Mr. WILSON. Are you referring now to the so-called higher classes or lower classes?

Mr. KEARFUL. My question is general and you may particularize as you please.

Mr. WILSON. Of course you must understand that 80 per cent of the population of Mexico is Indian and unable to read or write.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the submerged 85 per cent?

Mr. WILSON. The submerged 80 or 85 per cent, that President Wilson refers to, is Indian and unable to read or write. That 80 per cent has widely different elements. The Indian of the north is a distinctly different person from the Indian of the south in habits, in blood, in traditions, in all that goes to make up a unit in the body politic.

The Indian of the north is a descendant of the Aztec. He is as a rule grossly ignorant, intemperate, uncleanly. Brigandage is his real occupation. His other pursuits are merely nominal.

The Indian of the south of Mexico is a descendant of the Maya race of Indians, sometimes called the white Indians, with admixture in some instances and in some localities with the Toltecs who preceded the Aztecs in the invasion of Mexico. The Mayas, the original Mexican race, who inhabit the States of Yucatan, Tabasco, Campeche, and Chiapas, are almost entirely of the pure Maya race, cleanly, industrious, handsome, and law abiding.

In the section immediately to the north of these States there is a mixture of the Maya and the Toltec which makes the prevailing type in the States of Vera Cruz, Puebla, Oaxaca, and Morelos. These are also industrious and orderly people. There never has been a marked tendency to anarchy and revolution among the Mexicans south of a line running through San Luis Potosi.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is about the center of Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; south of that line there would have been no revolution and no disturbances of any kind if the country had not been invaded by the revolutionary elements, upsetting order, bringing about confusion and plundering the people. Through all this section the government of Gen. Diaz was very popular and very strong. A very large part of it never accepted the government of Madero and a very considerable part of it has not accepted the government of Carranza. The great and prosperous State of Oaxaca, for instance, is now absolutely independent, and with it goes its dependent States of Tabasco and Campeche.

The southern Mexican Indian, who is a man who labors upon the soil, if treated firmly and kindly and justly, does well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think he has potentialities of a good citizen?

Mr. WILSON. The southern Mexican; yes. They have no understanding whatever of finespun or altruistic political theories. They do understand justice when accompanied by firmness, but the word "justice" has no meaning to them unless it is reinforced by power and vigor of executive action. The Americans in Mexico were very successful in dealing with this class of Mexicans. They paid them better and looked more closely after their physical welfare than the Mexican employers. The American always dealt firmly with them, understanding their character generally much better than the white Mexican employers.

With good government, civilized conditions, education, and the wise supervision of a semiautocratic government, these people can be gradually brought to a comprehension of the practices of real democracy; but they never can be brought to that state of mind or to the practice of democracy by revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you observed to be the effect socially, morally, and educationally upon the Mexican natives of the operation of American enterprises in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. On the railways, which were wholly the creation of American enterprise and capital, a very distinct type of Mexican was evolved, fully equal in some branches of railway work to the American employees. They made good engineers, good trainmen, good switchmen or yardmen, but not good conductors. In the oil regions the results achieved through the employment of Mexican labor were and are, I believe, very satisfactory. I once visited the oil regions in the State of Tamaulipas, near Tampico, and made a very complete investigation of the conditions prevailing upon the properties of the Huasteco Oil Co., which is the mother property of the Mexican Petroleum Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was also the pioneer oil enterprise in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; and I found there conditions prevailing under the administration of Mr. Doheny, who is president of the Mexican Petroleum Co., which were a great credit to the company—schools, hospitals, churches, good roads, all the usual arrangements pertaining to the good health and moral well being and happiness of the people. I was quite impressed with what had been done in this direction. I made inquiry at the time and was told that the conditions prevailing upon other oil properties, which had been largely modeled upon the Huasteco, were not in any instance very far behind conditions prevailing on the Huasteco Oil Co.'s property.

I have also, from time to time during my residence in Mexico, visited American sugar estates, cotton estates, coffee estates, rubber estates, and mines, and in every instance I have found working conditions better than those prevailing in similar properties owned by Mexicans, and invariably the wage scale was higher and workmen better contented and more industrious than in Mexican owned property.

The city of Tampico at that time was being transformed from an aggregation of adobe houses into a modern municipality, with all the conveniences of modern life. All this, or most of it, was being done through American initiative and by American capital.

Mr. KEARFUL. I had intended asking you about the character of Porfirio Diaz. Mr. William Jennings Bryan, in an issue of the Commoner, which he owns, on January 30, 1903, had this to say:

The third great man produced by the Mexican Republic is the present President. With the exception of one term, he has been President since 1876, during which time he has shown wonderful ability, and it is doubtful if there is in the world to-day a chief executive of greater capacity or devotion to his people. Certainly no people have made greater relative progress than the Mexican people have made under the administration of Porfirio Diaz. Education has been promoted, law and order established, agriculture developed, commerce stimulated, and nearly every section of the country connected by railroad with the capital. While there are many able and strong men upon whom the mantle of President might worthily fall, he has been so remarkably successful and has such a hold upon all classes of the people that he will doubtless remain at the head of the Government as long as he lives. The people would hardly consent to his withdrawal, even if he desired to lay down the responsibilities of the position.

How does that statement compare with your observation of Diaz and his work?

Mr. WILSON. In so far as it relates to his work I agree entirely with Mr. Bryan's statement. As to his expressions relative to the firmness of the government of Diaz, I am inclined to think that Mr. Bryan does not understand Latin-American psychology, for in Latin-America it is "hallelujah" one day and anathema the next.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Porfirio Diaz the character of man who will have to be relied upon to govern Mexico if it is to be governed by a Mexican?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; Mexico can not be governed in strict accordance with republican or democratic principles, because the people have not been educated to understand what those principles are. We ought to be satisfied to have Mexico preserve the form of republican government under an administration which will gradually, through the processes of evolution, bring about the practices of real democracy.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are familiar with the history of Mexico. Has there ever been any period in Mexican history in which there was law and order and protection to life and property except during the administration of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. WILSON. None.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Gen. Huerta the character of man that might have been relied upon to govern Mexico as it must be governed?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; I should have said in answering your previous question that under Huerta conditions were very rapidly moving in the direction of absolute peace and order.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Huerta essentially the same character of man that Porfirio Diaz was?

Mr. WILSON. He had some of the characteristics of Diaz, but was not as high-grade man as Diaz. Diaz was not only a firm ruler; he was a statesman of vision and looked ahead into the future. Huerta was anxious to follow in the footsteps of Diaz, being in entire sympathy with the Diaz type of government, and also being in complete sympathy with the Diaz foreign policy of maintaining absolutely friendly relations with the Government of the United States. He lacked the moral poise of Diaz. He lacked the power of restraint. He was somewhat hasty in his decisions and with a tendency, which he constantly held in check, to extreme action. It is to be noted that during the time of Huerta Americans were everywhere protected in Mexico—that is to say, until the last.

Mr. KEARFUL. Until the occupation of Vera Cruz?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; until the occupation of Vera Cruz—and that during his administration only two Mexicans were killed outside of legal procedure.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that an unusual thing in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. Very. One of the persons executed by order of Huerta was one of his own relatives who had brutally murdered a soldier. The other one was a member of Congress who endeavored to incite a revolt in Congress against the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have any conversations with President Huerta in regard to the American policy and his own attitude towards the United States?

Mr. WILSON. Many.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you at liberty to give the committee the benefit of those interviews?

Mr. WILSON. Of course, these all related to the pressing urgency of the situation in Mexico and also as to the probable attitude of the Government at Washington.

In the beginning of those discussions Huerta was pliable, diplomatic, gracious, and ready to concede practically anything demanded. After the final interview which I had with him on this subject, his attitude changed completely, and whereas prior to that time there had been an excess of willingness to grant everything I demanded officially, after this interview there was a complete change of front, and the deliberate policy seems to have been adopted of illustrating, through their treatment of me, their resentment of the attitude of the administration at Washington.

From the time of this interview, a memorandum of which, made at the time, I will ask to have inserted in the record, I was given very scant courtesy by the Mexican foreign office.

MEMORANDUM OF THE AMBASSADOR'S INTERVIEW WITH PRESIDENT HUERTA.

Mexico, May 7, 1913.

I saw the President to-day at his request. He said that he had been wanting to have a consultation with me for some time relative to the delayed recognition of this Government by the Government of the United States. I said to him that, believing that the interests of our own country as well as those of Mexico were involved in the early recognition of the latter by the former, I had made repeated representations to Washington urging the resumption of full and cordial official relations, but that neither the Department of State nor the President had given expression to any views on the question, and that I was without any guidance as to the views entertained at Washington except those furnished by conjecture. I said to him that possibly immediate recognition might be brought about by the immediate and unreserved settlement of all the great questions pending between the two Governments at the present time, and which had formed the basis of my letter of February 24, 1913, to him. I said to him that I could only conjecture that this might be the reason for withholding recognition, and that, on the other hand, the Government might, in deference to a certain section of public opinion, be delaying its action so as to follow other nations in making official recognition; and that, also, the question probably might be influenced by the complete reestablishment of peace throughout the country.

The President then asked me if he might talk to me unreservedly as a friend of Mexico and a personal friend of his. I said that he might, but that he must understand that I could have no secrets from my Government concerning political matters. He then went on to say, speaking with much earnestness, eloquence, and some bitterness, that the Mexican nation was solvent and independent, and that this administration, which, though not elected, had been as legally constituted as any government could possibly be, had entered upon the task of reestablishing peace with a bankrupt treasury left by the Madero administration, which had plundered the nation, and with no army; that by a careful administration and skillful direction of public funds a new army had been built up and equipped and was about to take the field for active operations against the rebels. This recruiting he said was now going on at the rate of 800 soldiers a day; that peace was being rapidly established throughout the Republic except in certain districts on or near the border and in the State of Morelos. All other outbreaks, he said, were purely brigandage; and that by the end of June he expected to have practical peace reestablished throughout the Republic. He stated that the loan which the Government had been negotiating for some time was about to be closed, and that the Governments of Germany, France, and Italy were about to follow England and Spain in recognizing this Republic.

In view of all of these facts, the President said he felt that the attitude of the Government of the United States in refusing to accord recognition to this administration was unwise, unfriendly, and that, in the event that this Government should fail to sustain itself the opinion of the world was certain to place the responsibility upon the administration at Washington for whatever disasters might follow. He said, in view of this situation, that this Government did not feel that it would be justified, in view of the hostile public opinion and in view of the undignified position in which it would be placed by so doing, in concluding the questions at present pending between the two Governments. That is to say, the Chamizal, the Colorado River case, the special-claims cases, and the general claims cases. He added that the Washington Government's view in these cases, together with the Tlahualilo case, which had been entirely concluded, had been accepted in principle by this Government, and that whenever the Government of the United States would place this Government in the position of settling the questions as matters between two friendly and sovereign, if not two equally powerful countries, their prompt solution could be expected, but not before.

He added some words of appreciation of the personal services which I had rendered to the country and said that my attitude was fully understood and that all classes here were profoundly grateful for what I had done, and that in the event of my departure expression of public approval of a most unique and unprecedented character would be paid me.

A little bit later, when there were anti-American outbreaks in Mexico City, evidently inspired by the Government, I sent a very sharp note to the minister of foreign affairs, in which I demanded immediate action by the Government for the procurement of absolute cessation of these attacks. This note was couched in very vigorous language and was very strongly resented by the Huerta administration. From that time on the embassy was absolutely isolated, and I found myself without the confidence of the Government I was representing or any influence with the Government to which I was accredited.

This unfortunate situation continued until my departure; and whereas it will be seen in the memorandum attached that it was the intention of the Mexican Government to accord me unusual and unique expressions of appreciation on the occasion of my departure, in recognition of the work which I had done in bringing about peace, as a matter of fact when I left Mexico City the usual courtesies accorded by the Mexican Government to departing diplomatic representatives were not given me. On the other hand, when Mrs. Wilson left, the courtesies were extremely marked, showing that they intended in this way to mark their disapproval of the attitude of the Washington Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. But, nevertheless, to show their personal appreciation?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. The attitude of the people at that time, as long as I remained in Mexico, and of the Government, aside from this evident purpose to express their resentment at the attitude of the Washington Government, was one of deep gratitude and kindness.

The memorandum of this last interview with Huerta is very interesting, in that it reveals something of his character. There had been a very persistent effort made in the United States to produce the impression that Huerta was an ignorant, rough, and intemperate soldier. On the contrary, he was a highly educated man, and possessed wonderful gifts of eloquence and oratory, was persuasive, diplomatic, and courteous. He was provincial in dress and in knowledge of social conventions, but not otherwise.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of the existence now of any able and strong man in Mexico upon whom the mantle of President might worthily fall—such a man as Porfirio Diaz as he was described by Mr. Bryan in 1903?

Mr. WILSON. No. If there are any Mexicans approximating to the character of Diaz, they are in this country or in Europe.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was testified here by a prominent Mexican that approximately 80 per cent of the intelligent class of Mexicans were exiled from Mexico and unable to return there. What is your opinion about the prospect of establishing a government in Mexico without the assistance of this intelligent class of Mexicans now exiled from Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. It is an impossibility.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you opinions that you can give for the benefit of the committee in regard to what should be done to establish peace and stable government in Mexico?

Mr. WILSON. At the present time Mexico is burned out. All of the intelligence and most of the patriotism of the country are in exile. Nothing can be done in the direction of setting up a different government in Mexico so long as the Washington administration maintains a force on the border for the purpose of maintaining the present Carranza government. An illustration of the extremes to which our Executive goes in maintaining the Carranza administration probably will be furnished to-day or to-morrow in the granting of permission to Carranza to pass troops over American soil for the purpose of fighting the Obregon forces in the State of Sonora. I shall be very much surprised if this permission is not granted, and yet it constitutes an act of absolute interference in the political affairs of Mexico, granted at the request of an administration that has taken an attitude of deep hostility toward the Government of the United States, and which has instituted intrigue after intrigue against the Government of the United States, and has apparently with deliberation refused to give protection to American citizens in Mexico.

All of the natural leaders of a new movement in Mexico are in the United States or Europe. It would be extremely difficult, except under the direction of the Government of the United States and with its cooperation, to bring these people together under any definite leadership. It may perhaps be done and probably will be done if the next President of the United States is prepared to carry out the declarations of the platform upon which Mr. Wilson was first elected.

To cure the situation in Mexico to-day there are only three remedies which can be employed:

First, abandonment of the country officially and the recall of the American population, with the consequent relapse of the country into barbarism.

Second, the installation there by this Government of a government friendly to this, and willing to work in harmony with it; the firm establishment and maintenance of this government by the financial and moral assistance of the Government of the United States, enabling it to restore peace and order and meet its international obligations.

Third, intervention by the armed forces of the United States down to the twenty-second parallel, which covers the area within which most of the revolutions originate, and which is the most sparsely inhabited part of Mexico; the establishment and recognition of an independent republic within this territory, its stability to be maintained by the protection and financial and moral aid of this Government, and the inducement of immigration from all countries. This would constitute a buffer State, and therefore the destinies of Mexico would be controlled by the peaceful population south of San Luis Potosi and the Mexican question would cease to have any importance, or at least not more importance than the affairs of any other Latin-American question.

I do not recommend any one of these three courses.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you any objection to stating which one of them you prefer?

Mr. WILSON. I think it would be rather difficult to say that. Of course, one prefers to see Mexico restored to peaceful conditions and the practice of law and order with her territories intact if that can be accomplished through the method which I have suggested under No. 2. I very much doubt whether that plan can be successfully carried out, and I am coming reluctantly to the conclusion that in the ultimate analysis we shall be forced to recognize and to assume the duty of putting Mexico in order by some method closely connected with the third recommendation. Of course we can not continue in the business of talking about making the world a decent place to live in with our own back yard in a filthy condition. If we are to engage in the business of evangelizing the world, we must begin our moral and altruistic program within what really might be called our own household.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think we owe any duty to anybody, and if so, whom, to step in and set Mexico right?

Mr. WILSON. I should say that the immediate proximity of a great civilized power to a nation of anarchistic tendencies, where law and order do not prevail, furnishes in itself abundant reasons for such action on the part of the great power as will produce peaceful conditions within the borders of its weaker neighbor. In this case there is the additional reason that our Government is in a very large measure responsible for the conditions which prevail in Mexico, as we dispossessed a legally constituted government for the sole reason that we did not like it, and after a long period of chaos set up there a pure military autocracy which never has had any semblance of authority from the Mexican people, which never has had control over more than one-half of the territories of Mexico—a government weak where it should be strong and strong where it should be conciliatory; a government which has involved Mexico in a mountain of debt, which has utterly destroyed the works created by years of diligent statesmanship under Diaz, and which were in part maintained by Madero, and which to-day represents, not a nation, but an aggregation of feudal brigands.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think that the anarchistic condition of Mexico, lying at our back door, constitutes a menace to us, and that we therefore owe a duty to ourselves to correct that condition for our protection?

Mr. WILSON. The Mexican question has ceased to be a border question. It has become a national question. During the recent European war the Mexican Government had in its employ a number of German officers, usually estimated at something like 110, training the Mexican army for assault on our borders in conjunction with Japan. It therefore becomes evident that we are always open to attack from the south. The ocean is our protection on the Atlantic and the Pacific, and we have a peaceful neighbor to the north, but from the south we are always open to attack, and, while I am entirely sure that the advances of the Carranza government to Japan at this time were not even considered, the fact that such offers were made ought to constitute a warning to the American people.

Mr. KEARFUL. You think, in the second place, that because we interposed to overthrow the government of Huerta and impose upon Mexico the government of Carranza we owe a duty to the Mexican people?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Not to go over again the duties that this Government may owe to its citizens living and having interests in Mexico, do you believe that this Government, by reason of the peculiarities of the situation, owes any duty to other countries whose nationals are affected by the Mexican situation?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes. We have directly assumed that obligation by refusing to recognize the government of Huerta, which was recognized by all European Governments. By insisting upon our own policy contrary to the views of all European Governments we have made ourselves responsible for what followed, and now we are in the situation that these same Governments have refused to recognize the government of Carranza, maintaining their perfectly legal position which they took in the time of Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not there was any agreement entered into by this Government with the European Governments interested in Mexico to the effect that if we should be allowed a free hand in Mexico we would be responsible to them for the consequences?

Mr. WILSON. Only as I have read it in the newspapers. I have seen references to it, but I know nothing about that.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I care to ask that I have any notes upon, Mr. Wilson. Is there anything further that has not been covered that you would like to say?

Mr. WILSON. I rather think not. Of course, I could talk to you some days here, but I do not know that I would add anything if I did. I believe there is nothing else.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee is very much obliged to you.

(Thereupon, at 12.15 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until Monday, April 19, 1920, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

TUESDAY, APRIL 27, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The following testimony was taken at Washington, D. C., April 27, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee of Foreign Relations of the Senate:

TESTIMONY OF JOHN LIND.

(The witness was sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your full name.

Mr. LIND. John Lind.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present address?

Mr. LIND. Minneapolis, Minn.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your profession?

Mr. LIND. Lawyer.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are a native-born American citizen?

Mr. LIND. No; I am not. I was born in Sweden, but I have lived in the United States over 50 years.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are a naturalized citizen?

Mr. LIND. I became naturalized by reason of my father's naturalization.

Mr. KEARFUL. While you were a minor?

Mr. LIND. Yes; I was a child when my parents came here.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were subpoenaed to give the committee the benefit of your views in regard to conditions in Mexico, based upon your knowledge and experience. The members of the committee, being otherwise engaged, have authorized me to proceed with the examination.

What has been your opportunity to observe conditions in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Since I left Mexico in the early spring of 1914 I have had no opportunity; I have not been there, and I have had no correspondence. For a long time I received the Mexico City papers. Later I asked that they be sent direct to our university. During the war I read the Mexican papers pretty carefully, but had absolutely no correspondence either with Americans or Mexicans since 1915. So my knowledge of Mexican conditions, if I have any at all, is simply based on the impressions that I have received from the press, Mexican and American.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you first go to Mexico?

Mr. LIND. In July, 1913.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any knowledge of conditions in Mexico before you went there?

Mr. LIND. Only the general knowledge that an American would have who has been in public life to some extent, as I had, and general reading. I had never been in Mexico prior to that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had you made any special investigation of Mexican conditions before you went?

Mr. LIND. I had not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Briefly, what was your mission to Mexico?

Mr. LIND. That is best explained by the President's communication to Congress, to which I will call your attention.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have the particular portion to which you wish to refer?

Mr. LIND. The letter which I carried. It is given in full.

Mr. KEARFUL. This is an address by President Wilson to Congress, delivered August 27, 1913, in which he sets out a letter of instructions that was given to you?

Mr. LIND. Yes. If I may interrupt at this point to explain, I had no knowledge previous to the receipt of a telegram from Mexico that the President or the administration had any step of this character in view. I think it has been stated at the hearing or somewhere that I was a candidate for office. I never held an appointive office in my life. The President had had the kindness to offer me an appointive office without my solicitation previous to this, which I declined. The telegram simply requested me to come to Washington immediately. I was busy in court at the time and had to ask the postponement of the trip for a few days, and then I came on. The first I knew about what the President had in view was when I reached Washington. Then this memorandum to which I have called attention was given to me and its purpose explained in a general way. It was regarded as a mere temporary employment. I expected, and I think that was the thought of all concerned, that I would return in the course of two or three weeks, so I did not leave with any preparation to remain any length of time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Briefly stated, did you understand your mission to Mexico to be the elimination of President Huerta from the Presidency of Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Not at all, except as suggested in the memorandum. That was all the guide and all the instructions that I had.

Mr. KEARFUL. You accepted the mission?

Mr. LIND. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. If it was not to eliminate President Huerta, what did you understand it to be?

Mr. LIND. I had no other view of the purpose of my mission than as explained in the memorandum.

Mr. KEARFUL. In carrying out your mission to Mexico you did present to President Huerta, on behalf of President Wilson, a proposition that he should remove himself from the position that he occupied, did you not?

Mr. LIND. I prefer not to give any version of my own of what I presented. I presented the paper which you have before you and which the President charged me to communicate. I did not present it to Mr. Huerta in person. I presented it to his then secretary of state, as he was called, Mr. Calero, although later I had interviews with Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. You went to Mexico accepting the mission set forth in your instructions, expecting to accomplish it and return in two or three weeks?

Mr. LIND. I had no expectation in regard to the accomplishment. I did not know and I do not know that any one knew what action would result from the mission, but I expected, as I said, to return in two or three weeks.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the letter of instructions that you carried delivered to you before you left?

Mr. LIND. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or was it sent to you?

Mr. LIND. It was delivered to me; handed to me by the President.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Bryan or President Wilson before you left, as to the object of your mission?

Mr. LIND. Yes; I had.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will ask you whether or not it was the purport of that object that Huerta must go?

Mr. LIND. I will answer that question by saying that I do not recall any conversation with either of them that was not exactly in line with the plan outlined in my memorandum, but I would not feel justified in assuming to disclose, if I remembered, or give any version of conversations that I had with either of them, because they were and are confidential so far as I am concerned.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have now plainly in mind a conception of the object of your mission to Mexico?

Mr. LIND. The object of my mission to Mexico was to bring about, as I understood it, an adjustment between the contending parties. You will note there is a suggestion that Huerta agree to an armistice. The rebels, as they were then called, were in arms in the northern part of the country, and that was the prime object, to induce them, if possible, to adjust their affairs so that the country might have peace and a government so constituted that it could receive the recognition of our Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did that adjustment involve the elimination of Huerta from the position which he assumed and held as President of Mexico?

Mr. LIND. I did not so understand. The object was to have an election at the earliest possible date and in the meantime an armistice and an adjustment of their contentions until an election could be held.

Mr. KEARFUL. At which election Huerta would not stand as a candidate?

Mr. LIND. He would not stand as a candidate: You know there was an agreement negotiated by the ambassador by which Huerta had pledged himself not to be a candidate at the election to be held after the coup d'etat.

Mr. KEARFUL. After the organization of the government under the agreement made between Huerta and Felix Diaz?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any proposition or arrangement for Huerta to remain as president of Mexico until the election could be held, under your instructions?

Mr. LIND. No; but I do not recall that that question was ever raised or mooted.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did Huerta receive the proposition?

Mr. LIND. This best is explained by Gamboa's answer, which is annexed to the document which you have there. He refused absolutely the armistice.

Mr. KEARFUL. He refused all the propositions presented, did he not?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did either he or Gen. Huerta ever indicate that any of the propositions were satisfactory to them apart from their written communication?

Mr. LIND. They made several communications later, all of which I transmitted to the department, and I made some—that is, I answered some of their communications on my own initiative in some instances, that is where I felt that my understanding of the attitude of that department was clear, but usually under instructions.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember making the proposition that if Huerta would agree to hold elections within the territory controlled by him at which he would not stand as a candidate, that the man elected would be recognized by this country and that the then de facto government would be aided in getting financial assistance?

Mr. LIND. I submitted a suggestion that embraced some of the features to which you refer, but I would not undertake, after the lapse of nearly seven years, to discuss it in detail. I think that has been published. It is a matter of common knowledge and public property.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember submitting this proposition to the Huerta government in a note dated August 25, 1913:

"The President authorizes me to submit to the consideration of the de facto Government of Mexico the following propositions:

1. That the elections convoked for October 26, 1913, be carried into effect in accordance with the constitution and laws of Mexico.

2. That President Huerta, in the manner indicated in the beginning by the President (Mr. Wilson) give the assurance referred to in paragraph C of the first instructions (that is, that Huerta should not be a candidate).

The President further authorizes me to say that if the government de facto acts immediately and in conformity with the indications mentioned, then the President will assure the American bankers and their associates that the Government of the United States would view with pleasure the contracting of an immediate loan in sufficient amount to cover the necessities of the moment of the de facto Government of Mexico.

The hope is sincerely entertained that the Government of your excellency will consider it in keeping with the best and highest interests of Mexico to accept immediately these propositions, which are submitted with the same spirit and the same objects as the first ones, but in this more restricted form, with the object that the Government of Mexico may act with regard to them, without the necessity of the cooperation or aid in the present circumstances of any factor foreign to the situation.

Do you remember presenting that?

Mr. LIND. I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have in mind now what was meant by the expression "without the necessity of the cooperation or aid in the present circumstances of any factor foreign to the situation?"

Mr. LIND. Yes. You will observe by Gamboa's answer to the President's memorandum that I carried down and delivered to the Mexican Government that the memorandum contained the armistice suggestion which that referred to, and Gamboa took the position that it was absolutely contrary to the policy of the Huerta Government, and that he would not in any circumstances either consent to or consider any armistice proposition with the Carranza forces; that they were rebels, and would only be treated as such.

Mr. KEARFUL. The meaning, then, would be that the action proposed should be taken by the Huerta Government without consulting the rebels of the north?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. By Carranza and Villa?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. In other words, that it would relate only to the territory under his control?

Mr. LIND. The territory which he controlled, yes. The sole object of my efforts and of my trip, as I understood it, was to secure peace under a constitutional, orderly form of government.

Mr. KEARFUL. You conceived that it was essential to that, did you not, that Huerta should eliminate himself at the earliest moment, in accordance with the constitutional forms?

Mr. LIND. No; but that there should be an election at which, under his own contract with Diaz, he should not be a candidate; that there should be a free and fair election without being embarrassed by his own candidacy, which of course would in itself, in view of the contract that he had entered into with Diaz and the others, prevent an adjustment.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you expect that there would be a free and fair election in the territory controlled by Huerta?

Mr. LIND. Well, those were the assurances that the Huerta government put forward right along, that there would be a free and fair election.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you or did President Wilson understand that it was possible to hold a free and fair election under the supervision of Huerta and his government?

Mr. LIND. I do not know what the President understood. I had misgivings, but for the time being I assumed that they probably meant to carry out what they professed.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know that subsequently an election was held?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the territory controlled by Huerta?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the result of that election?

Mr. LIND. There was not any result.

Mr. KEARFUL. As I remember it, Huerta announced that he would not be a candidate.

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. But, nevertheless, the returns overwhelmingly elected Huerta, so far as any returns were published. Is not that correct?

Mr. LIND. I do not recall whether any returns were published, but I remember Consul Canada and myself took a walk around Vera Cruz on the day of the election. It is seven years ago and my memory is not very accurate, but it is my best recollection that at one poll which we visited, and I think that is the only one we found, over at the Diligencia, at that restaurant, there was one of Huerta's officials with a cigar box in which he was collecting ballots, and either while we were there or previously, he had put in a bunch of 150 or 200 ballots, and so far as we could discover those were the only ballots cast in that precinct and possibly in Vera Cruz. Consul Canada's recollection is probably more accurate than mine, but, of course, the election was the merest farce.

Mr. KEARFUL. The ballot boxes were open boxes, were they, as you remember it?

Mr. LIND. I think so, and there were put in, either while we were there or there were already in the open box, a bundle about 4 or 5 inches thick, as I recall, of ballots tied together.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there present at this election any of the ordinary things occurring at an election in this country?

Mr. LIND. No; and in no other country?

Mr. KEARFUL. There was no line of voters waiting to vote?

Mr. LIND. No. There was no voter in sight.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was no secrecy of voting?

Mr. LIND. No. I say there was not a voter in sight while we were there, and we sat down on the porch and had a cigar and watched it for a while, and then left. It was a ridiculous farce. You were in Mexico at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. I was in Mexico City and noticed the same thing occurring there.

Mr. LIND. As I recall it, Gamboa came out ostensibly as a candidate of the administration. He was the nominee of the Catholic party and expected the support of that party, but a few days before election it was given out that Huerta and Blanquet would be candidates. I do not know whether it was published in the papers or not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not understand that it was given out by Huerta and Blanquet that they would be candidates?

Mr. LIND. Yes—well, I can not say, but that was the understanding.

Mr. KEARFUL. You remember, do you not, that after it was determined that Huerta and Blanquet had been overwhelmingly elected according to the returns as President and Vice President, that Huerta declared that the election was null because he was not constitutionally eligible for election and that therefore there having been no election, he would retain the provisional presidency?

Mr. LIND. I recall faintly that the election was declared null and void, but what the reasons assigned were I do not recall.

Mr. KEARFUL. You understood that, it having been declared null and void, Huerta would, of course, retain his position?

Mr. LIND. Well, he did. He was there and he continued.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your understanding of the precautions that would be taken to have a real free and fair election as you proposed? Was it understood that the American forces or American officials would supervise the election?

Mr. LIND. Not at all. There was not a suggestion of that. The understanding was that it would be a free and fair and open election in harmony with Mexican law, and held and conducted by Mexican officials. The report was current that the Madero election had been a very fair and free election for Mexico, and the general assumption was, so far as I was concerned, that it would be conducted in the same manner and by the properly constituted authorities, the same as the previous presidential election had been conducted.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you understand that the previous presidential election had been any different from the customary method of conducting elections in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Yes; I did, not that it would in any measure compare with our elections, because even in that election, if I recall it, a very small proportion of the legal voters of Mexico actually appeared at the polls and voted. Nevertheless I understood in a general way that the election was fairly conducted.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not the election of Madero was conducted in any different manner from the one you have described at Vera Cruz?

Mr. LIND. I do not, except, as I say, that my information was that it was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember where you got the information?

Mr. LIND. In various ways.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or was that just a general impression which you got from newspaper reporters?

Mr. LIND. No; it was from Americans that I talked with and Mexicans. I remained at Mexico City some weeks after my arrival in Mexico and then went to Vera Cruz, where I stayed with Consul Canada. I venture to say that 90 per cent of the Americans and perhaps 90 per cent of the foreigners called on me there in Mexico City or Vera Cruz—that is, during my stay. Of course I made diligent inquiry in regard to conditions past and present, and a great many Mexicans called on me that I conferred with and questioned.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Henry Lane Wilson, American Ambassador to Mexico, was in Mexico at the time of the holding of the Madero election, and he testified in regard to it some days ago. Have you read his testimony?

Mr. LIND. I have not. I have read no reports of any of the testimony taken before this committee.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not go to Mexico with the idea of making an investigation for the purpose of basing action upon the result of the investigation, but went there to take definite action?

Mr. LIND. I went there under the circumstances and with the object that I have called to your attention, but after I was there I devoted my time to inquiry and investigation of the actual situation, political and economical.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know William Bayard Hale?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you meet him in Vera Cruz upon your arrival in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. I think not, but I am not sure. Mr. Canada will remember. My impression is that I did not meet him until I reached Mexico City.

Mr. CANADA. He was there when you arrived at Vera Cruz?

Mr. LIND. Was he at Vera Cruz?

Mr. CANADA. Yes.

Mr. LIND. Then I was mistaken.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember conferring with him on board ship and going with him to Mexico City in company with Consul Canada?

Mr. LIND. Yes. I had forgotten that he met me at Vera Cruz, but of course Consul Canada's memory is correct. The individual that I remember most distinctly in connection with the trip from Vera Cruz to Mexico City was Consul Canada, because he guided me and virtually took charge.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you advised of the mission of William Bayard Hale to Mexico at that time?

Mr. LIND. I was not. I never heard anything about Mr. Hale until my arrival in Mexico, but he explained to me that he had been down there to investigate the situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he offer you any advice in regard to it?

Mr. LIND. He advised me, as I recall, to be very careful. He was exceedingly nervous, under very high nervous tension, so much so that I urged very strongly upon him, and I think I conveyed the view to others, that it would be well for him to return to the United States as quickly as he could. There had been a murder a few days previously. (Addressing Consul Canada) What is the name of that senator who was assassinated?

Mr. CANADA. Whose tongue they cut out?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. CANADA. I do not remember that senator's name.

Mr. LIND. I can not recall. Perhaps, Judge Kearful, you remember the senator who was assassinated.

Mr. KEARFUL. In Mexico City?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Dominquez?

Mr. LIND. Yes; and there was one other. That seemed to have affected Mr. Hale very seriously. He was very much worked up about the situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you consult with the ministers of other foreign governments in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Oh, yes. I did not solicit any consultation, but they called on me and I called on them and we discussed the situation very generally.

Mr. KEARFUL. With what ministers did you have the most conferences?

Mr. LIND. With the English minister, the Scotchman who carried the parrot on his shoulder, and who, by the way, was a very wise canny old Scotchman. I became very fond of him and I do not hesitate to say that I profited very much by information that he gave me in regard to the situation. Then later I got in touch with the German minister and found him the best informed of any man in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was Von Hintze?

Mr. LIND. Yes. He had the situation down to at, as we say. He had an accurate estimate of the revolutionary forces and their capacity, and he also had a very accurate conception of the Huertista forces and their weakness. He was the one foreigner in Mexico who was convinced that Huerta could not win or maintain himself.

But I will say this for Von Hintze—he never made a suggestion or assumed directly or indirectly to influence my views, but in a confidential way he talked very freely about the actual situation, and he possessed the information.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the views which you finally adopted coincide with his in regard to the weakness of Huerta and the strength of the revolutionists?

Mr. LIND. When I met him I already had come to that conclusion in my own mind, but he confirmed it.

Mr. KEARFUL. That conclusion was opposed to the opinions of most of the Americans in Mexico, was it not?

Mr. LIND. Most of the Americans in Mexico City thought that Huerta ought to be recognized, and when they expressed that opinion to me I would ask this question: "In the event of Huerta being recognized, how long do you suppose he will be able to maintain himself or how long will the country have peace?" They all shook their heads. I do not recall exactly, but I think I put the same question to you when I met you the first time. No American in Mexico ventured to predict that there would be peace for a period longer than 18 months or a couple of years at the best.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was their opinion as to what should be done to put Mexico on a basis of permanent peace?

Mr. LIND. They differed. Of course those who had oil interests and who had the misfortune to buy those tropical plantations that were exploited and stock sold in the north, all wanted intervention. They wanted Uncle Sam, as they usually put it, to come down and clean up Mexico and protect them and their purchases or concessions that they had obtained. The mining interests, to the extent that I came in contact with them—of course I did not come in contact with the mining interests of the far north to any great extent, but the mining interests through Guadalajara and south of Torreon did not urge intervention like some of the others did.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon what facts, briefly stated, did you arrive at the views which you say you entertained before you spoke to Von Hintze?

Mr. LIND. I devoted a good deal of time to the study of the land situation and the grievances of the peons, and those who sympathized with them urged and I became thoroughly satisfied in my own mind that the trouble in Mexico was primarily economic and social; that the attitude of many of the Americans that it was simply a political controversy between rival aspirants for power, as they put it in Mexico, was only partially true.

There is no question that the rivalry between ambitious politicians is the cause of a great deal of trouble in the Latin countries and in Mexico, but back of it all were the economic and social conditions which make it impossible for any permanent adjustment, any tolerable adjustment, until those conditions are corrected. That is the conclusion that I came to.

Now, for instance, I went with Admiral Fletcher, who was at Vera Cruz, and we took a trip to a hacienda owned by a man by the name of Emery, a former Minnesotan, from 86 to 100 miles south of Vera Cruz. He had—I say he, I do not know that, but some one had bought one of those old feudal estates that they have in Mexico and sold stock and organized a company, and Mr. Emery, who at one time was a member of the board of regents of our university in Minnesota, was in charge as manager of that estate or hacienda. We spent a couple of days there, Admiral Fletcher and myself, and the observations I made convinced me beyond peradventure that it was impossible to look for peace or orderly social conditions in Mexico until the evils that I saw on that trip were removed. Here was a very large tract of land operated as a sugar estate, and I presume that it was as humanely operated as any estate of that character in Mexico. I do not wish to insinuate that Mr. Emery was not a kindly, honorable, and humane man. Still he had in his employ and under his management some 150 to 200 enganchados—what do you call them?

Mr. KEARFUL. Contract laborers?

Mr. LIND. They were contract laborers who were virtually prisoners and had been sent there by the Government. Admiral Fletcher and I saw this remarkable situation in the twentieth century of men being scattered through the corn fields in little groups of 8 or 10, accompanied by a driver, a Cacique, an Indian from the coast, a great big, burly fellow, with a couple of revolvers strapped to a belt and a blacksnake that would measure 8 or 10 feet, right after the group that were digging, and then at the farther end of the row a man with a sawed-off shotgun. These men were put out in the morning, worked under these overseers in that manner, and locked up at night in a large shed with shelves to sleep on. Each had a blanket. They were slaves to all intents and purposes. Both Admiral Fletcher and I marveled that such conditions could exist, but they did exist.

Unfortunately I came to the conclusion that it is not practicable to operate those estates by Americans without such labor conditions, or labor conditions that are almost as bad, so I regard it as a very great misfortune to our Nation and to our people that they have become involved in those tropical estates.

Mining can be carried on and is carried on in a very different way, and commercial enterprises, of course, can be carried on, but the tropical farming is a very unfortunate undertaking for Americans and only begets strife and ill-feeling and revolutions, in my judgment.

By the way, in this connection it may be interesting to relate this. On the second morning of our stay at this hacienda I was on the porch of the living house, which is located in the river bottom, and I saw some sugar fields on the other side of the river which we had not visited. I asked Mr. Emery whether they belonged to his estate. Yes; he said they did. I said, "How are they operated?" He said, "That is a very peculiar situation. You will notice in the hills beyond there is quite a collection of huts. That is an ancient Indian village which was never conquered by the Spaniards." This was in the State of Oaxaca. "The Oaxacans are living there like their fathers did before them hundreds and hundreds of years ago." I said, "Do they work?" "Yes," he said; "they are splendid workmen." He had told me previously that it was impossible to conduct a sugar estate except by the employment of this contract labor, or rather forced labor. It is not contract labor in the sense that we understand the term.

Mr. KEARFUL. Convict labor, is it not?

Mr. LIND. Yes; convict labor—conscripted labor rather than convict labor. I said, "How do they work?" He said, "They live under their old village régime. They elect a foreman and he goes out to take contracts. I make contracts with him to keep so many acres of sugar cane in order and to harvest and ship it to the mill." I asked whether those contracts were carried out, and he said, "Invariably."

So that under a proper Mexican land system, work could be done without resorting to the methods that have been invoked.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was in the State of Oaxaca?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember whether it was near a village called Tierra Blanca?

Mr. LIND. It is below Tierra Blanca.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you visit any other hacienda at that time or any other time while you were there?

Mr. LIND. Yes; I saw them. I spent more time on that one than I did on any other. There is a hacienda up there some place—I do not know the name of it—that was operated by an American Jew, as I recall. That is on the line of the railway toward Mexico City. He had a better system. He was not an employer of conscript labor. He had contracted with the villagers to produce cane there for him, and he collected the cane and paid them so much, and appeared to be getting along fairly well; but that is an exception.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. William Jennings Bryan, who was Secretary of State during the time you mention, made quite an extended visit to Mexico, and when he returned he wrote about it, and his experiences in Mexico were published in The Commoner, owned and published by him at Lincoln, Nebr. This was published on January 30, 1903. He had this to say as an illustration of what Americans were doing on the plantation in that region.

West of the village of Tierra Blanca, just across the Amapa River, in the State of Oaxaca, we visited a rubber-tree plantation. It was projected by Alfred Bishop Mason, a Chicago business man, but the work of development has fallen to his nephews, Raymond Willis and James Trowbridge, the former a graduate of the Boston Polytechnic and the latter of Yale. These young men began about three years ago the clearing of about 400 acres of tropical forest, so dense that it was difficult to secure any accurate idea of the lay of the land.

They now have about 300,000 rubber trees growing, the oldest 2½ years old. It will be four or five years before the plantation begins to yield a return, but there is at this time every promise of success. If the experiment realizes the hopes of the young men they will deserve the reward that they will secure, for they will not only make a fortune out of mother earth, but they will show others what can be accomplished in the development of this industry and thus become public benefactors. This well illustrates the difference between wealth created by the establishment of some new industry and wealth absorbed by trading or speculation.

For two years Willis and Trowbridge lived in a hut that thatched with palm leaves, but last spring they began the erection of a commodious stone house, with wide and airy porches, and to this newly completed residence the former has recently brought his bride, a Wellesley graduate, to preside over this now center of American civilization.

In connection with that I want to ask whether you think the precepts and example of American enterprise in Mexico had anything to do with removing or alleviating the conditions of the laborers which you mentioned?

Mr. LIND. I would answer that by saying the example and precept of Americans in the South had, in my judgment, no beneficial influence—speaking generally. There were undoubtedly exceptions.

If I may offer this suggestion in respect of the article just read, unfortunately the rosy expectations outlined were not realized. The labor plantations were a failure and have been. I do not think any of them have been profitable.

The greatest help to the Mexicans, in my judgment, has been from the contact with American conditions in the United States. At Vera Cruz there were upward of 300 men employed in the terminal yards. The shop and railroad work was carried on under the auspices of one corporation. They were all Mexicans. An American by the name of Elliott was superintendent of the yard. Through him and by experiences sometimes and through Consul Canada and by my own inquiries and efforts, I came in touch with a great many of the men employed in that yard. Many of them speak English fluently. They were good Mexicans, intelligent men. All the work was done by Mexicans. Many of them had been in Texas and in the United States. I quizzed them very closely and very carefully about their impressions, what they had gained and what they thought about the future and what they should do. They said that the treatment that they got in Texas sometimes was very humiliating to them, and that they were called "niggers" and "greasers," but nevertheless they got good pay. One of the men in particular I remember said, "I was able to live in my own house and to send my children to school, and I had enough money to marry my wife so we could live decently." He said, "Ever since I returned from the United States I have had good employment and had good wages."

I think that more has been gained to Mexico by the workmen—I mean, so far as the masses are concerned—inspiring them with ideals for better things and creating larger wants and a larger horizon by being employed in the United States and returning to Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. A large number of witnesses have testified before the committee, men who have been engaged in enterprises in Mexico for many years, and their testimony has been unanimous to the effect that the result of American enterprise in Mexico has educated and lifted the Mexican laborers to a higher plane and that their ability as mechanics and superior workmen has been brought about through their employment in the enterprises in Mexico. Not one of them has testified or intimated that many thousands of Mexicans who have thus been benefited gained their education in the United States. How do you account for that?

Mr. LIND. I can not account for it. If you understood me to convey the idea that the Mexicans had not benefited by American activity in Mexico, I did not succeed in making myself understood. I said that in my judgment the benefits had not occurred on the plantations, but on the railroads and in the mines. There can be no question about it. For instance, this is true to-day, that the Mexican railroads on the whole are very efficiently operated, even now, as I understand it, under very troubled conditions and are operated wholly by Mexicans.

For instance, the general superintendent under Mr. Brown, Mr. Clark; I spent a great deal of time with Mr. Clark, and he was very enthusiastic about Mexican laborers. He had devoted years to training them, and he told me, and it is a notorious fact, that American railroad men who went to Mexico to take positions originally—I mean the workmen, the brakemen and employees, and I am not referring to those who went down to take official or office positions—were a very indifferent class. Many of them had been blacklisted in the United States and were drunken and unreliable. They said they were a hard lot to get along with; but he was hopeful from the start that he would be able to educate the Mexicans to do this work. He was very proud of the success, and he had certainly been successful. He said that their repair shops and car-construction shops were as efficiently managed and the work as carefully done as could be done by any class of people. I noticed that in the yards at Vera Cruz. They were wonderfully efficient and they were all Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were educated in Mexico, were they not?

Mr. LIND. They were educated on the Mexican railroads.

Mr. KEARFUL. In Mexico?

Mr. LIND. In Mexico, not wholly, but largely. The same is true of mining. The American mining enterprise in Mexico has undoubtedly helped very largely in developing not only industrial improvement but social betterment among Mexicans.

What I meant to convey by what I said was that the field of American enterprise in Mexico—and I think the same would be true of any tropical country—is less desirable in attempting to carry on tropical plantations. Financially they have been a failure, and socially and economically they have not been a success in my judgment. There may be exceptions, of course.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have not read the testimony of the men who have been engaged in those enterprises as given before the committee?

Mr. LIND. I have not. I have not read any of the testimony.

Mr. KEARFUL. You thought that the conditions which you saw in this plantation of Mr. Emery were such that something should be done to remedy those conditions?

Mr. LIND. That is hardly the way I felt. I did not suggest any remedy, but I felt that there could never be peace in Mexico, there could never be progress, there could never be a step into the day of the twentieth century until conditions of that character were eliminated, however it might be accomplished.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you think those conditions could be eliminated?

Mr. LIND. I thought then that the revolution, that movement which, as I said a moment ago, was essentially social and economic, would tend to eliminate those conditions, and I think it has.

Mr. KEARFUL. You thought that the success of the revolution of the north, under Carranza and Villa, would result in eliminating those conditions?

Mr. LIND. In betterment—not in eliminating. It would take decades and generations to eliminate the conditions of poverty and ignorance of the population that has been deprived of the land and deprived of education, and everything else that tends to human development.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it the basis of your view that the Mexican people of the north had advanced much further in the way of civilized progress than those of the south?

Mr. LIND. No. I am of the opinion, and always have been, that the Mexicans of the south—I am speaking now of the peon population, the Indian peon—are more capable, brighter people than the people of the north, but they are less efficient by reason of the larger contact of the Mexicans of the north with the American people across the border. They have gained some of the efficiency that we possess, so that when it came to fighting, the northern troops and the northern leadership would be more efficient than that of the south.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it your opinion that the rehabilitation of Mexico depended upon the domination of Mexico by the northern Mexicans?

Mr. LIND. Well, in a measure. I felt that the northern Mexicans would dominate politically, and I felt also and feel now that their ideas on the whole are more progressive, more in line with modern ideals, than those of the people of the south. They have had a wider horizon and many of them are much better schooled and educated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you get your information that the Mexican railroads are now efficiently operated?

Mr. LIND. Efficiently, of course, is a relative term. Compared to one of our lines I would not say efficiently, but the fact that they are operated at all, considering that they have had no rolling stock and no locomotives from the outside ever since we entered the war or at any time since I was in Mexico, and that they have had two or three years previously the destruction of railway property and pulling up the track and burning the bridges, I say it is almost phenomenal that they are operated at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you meet Mr. E. N. Brown, president of the International Railways?

Mr. LIND. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think he is a reliable man?

Mr. LIND. I certainly do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would you depend upon statements of fact that he would make?

Mr. LIND. I would, particularly relating to the railroads. Certainly I would, and any other statement of fact. He and I probably differ very materially in regard to certain questions of policy, but he is a man of broad experience and unquestioned reliability. My judgment is that he and Mr. Clark differed very seriously on questions of policy.

Mr. KEARFUL. You would not for a moment question statements of fact in regard to railroad conditions in Mexico made by Mr. Brown under oath, would you?

Mr. LIND. Why, certainly not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Brown testified about the efficiency of the railroads in Mexico and if you are interested in getting the truth about whether the railroads are efficiently operated, I would advise you to read his testimony.

Mr. LIND. If you will hand it to me I will be glad to read it, but I explained to you that when I used the word "efficiency" I did not mean in the sense that we use the word with reference to American railroads. I meant efficiently operated in that peculiar situation where they have had no rolling stock and no motive power for some 10 years and still succeeded in patching up the old stuff and repairing the roadways and building bridges so they could operate at all, and they are operating because I get the papers that have been coming regularly. They are operating the line from the border to Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not the Mexican Government has operated all of the proceeds or receipts?

Mr. LIND. I know absolutely nothing about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether it has accounted to the owners of the railroads for any of the receipts or paid any interest on its obligations?

Mr. LIND. I do not know anything about it, but my general understanding is that those things remain in statu quo and that there have been no payments. That I get from financial publications.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know that a very large percentage, perhaps 90 per cent of all of the freight trains operating in Mexico are owned by private parties, mostly American operators?

Mr. LIND. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that they are maintained and equipped by private capital?

Mr. LIND. I do not know anything about it. My comment on the railroad situation was rather directed to the point of calling attention to the fact that the Mexican people in the course of a generation have become able and efficient in operating railroads and such instrumentalities as they have—not with reference to the efficiency of the railroads as railroads.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the efficiency which you mention was acquired, was it not, under American operation and American instruction over a long period of years under Mr. E. M. Brown and Mr. Clark?

Mr. LIND. In part. If you will pardon me, I wish to make a little statement at this point so as to make clear what I sought to convey.

When I became satisfied after reaching Mexico that I would have to remain some little time, my first solicitude was to arrive at a clear judgment in my own mind with regard to the Mexican peons, whether there was any hope that they would, with proper opportunities and in a proper environment, make progress and become efficient, valuable human beings in the sense of general efficiency and citizenship. There were a great many American missionaries in Mexico, people who called themselves missionaries, but they devoted most of their time to the establishment and maintenance of schools and churches. The Presbyterian Church of the South was very active; the Methodist Church was active. There is a man by the name of Vanderbilt, I think, in charge of the Presbyterian work, a very intelligent man. I had many interviews with him. Nearly all of these missionaries called on me, I think all of them. A man by the name of Wallace and his wife were much interested in the work and I had repeated conferences with them.

When these Americans engaged in work of that character, educational work, called on me, I would invariably, with reference to the work in the South, ask whether or not they had had experience in the education of negroes in the South. Many of them had, and I would ask this question: "Has it been your observation, as it has been mine, that a negro child will be very alert and quick to learn until they reach a certain age, 12 to 15 years, when they seem to reach the limit of their mental development, in a measure?" They invariably said that that had been their observation. I would ask, "What has been your experience with these peons?" I would ask, "Do they seem to have a cut-off in their mental growth and development?" They invariably answered, "No." That while many of them were slower than American children would be in their development, they all seemed to progress and develop as long as they continued in school.

So I became satisfied in my own mind that potentially the Mexican people and the Mexican people have a great future if they have the opportunity of education and development that a people needs to make the most of its capacities.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you conclude that those opportunities would be afforded for educational work by the churches that you have mentioned?

Mr. LIND. They had done great work.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any conferences with officials of the Catholic Church in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Yes, many.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your opinion in regard to the effect of the operations of the Catholic Church upon the natives of the country?

Mr. LIND. The policy of that church has not been to foster popular education of the masses; I mean in the same sense. I will not say that, either, but I am not assuming to say what its policy has been, but it has not been done that is all there is to it. Outside of the towns there was not a schoolhouse to be found in Mexico at that time. There are some, now, a great many, as I understand it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the education has increased and more schools been established under the Carranza Government than had existed before?

Mr. LIND. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you get that information?

Mr. LIND. The official reports have been sent to me of the department of education, and I know that in 1915 the Carranza Government sent a great many teachers, Mexican young women and young men, to be trained in the normal schools in some of the New England States. I met the superintendent of public education, a very intelligent man. I met him in Washington three or four years ago and had a long talk with him and he explained what had been done. There has been a great deal of work done along those lines, as I understand it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he say anything to you about the large number of schools, that had been in operation up to the time of the success of the Carranza revolution, having been suspended?

Mr. LIND. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he explain to you anything about the fact that a large number of those schools had been closed on account of inability or disinclination to pay the teachers?

Mr. LIND. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not know anything about the fact, if it is a fact, that a large number of schools formerly in operation in Mexico City have been closed?

Mr. LIND. I do not know anything about the situation in Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. Except as was told you by this official of the Carranza Government?

Mr. LIND. Yes; and what I have seen in reports and publications from time to time.

Mr. KEARFUL. But you have not seen any of the testimony that has been given here on that subject?

Mr. LIND. No; and I have not been in Mexico, as I told you, since my return.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you think that the operations of the Catholic Church in Mexico were for the good or to the injury of the Mexican people?

Mr. LIND. That is a controversial question that I think would be very unfair and very unprofitable to discuss.

Mr. KEARFUL. I am asking only for what your opinion was.

Mr. LIND. I may not agree with some of the policies of the Catholic Church or any other church, but for me to undertake to condemn its work in toto would be an absurdity that no sane man, no level-headed man could be guilty of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it one of the bases of your matured views that one of the difficulties in Mexico was the operations of the Catholic Church?

Mr. LIND. No, sir. I have said and have felt that a state church in politics is a misfortune to any country. I have always felt that way and feel that way now, and I think, when those were the conditions in Mexico, that Mexico was no exception.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not find those conditions existent when you were there, did you?

Mr. LIND. What conditions?

Mr. KEARFUL. This interference in politics on the part of the church?

Mr. LIND. I do not know, but they had a Catholic party, a church party, and always have had, as I understand it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the so-called laws of reform instituted by Bonita Juarez following the constitution of 1857?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it not your understanding that ever since that time the church has had no influence in state affairs?

Mr. LIND. Theoretically, no.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was not the church property all taken away by the Government and held as Government property?

Mr. LIND. I could not discuss those questions with any degree of accuracy.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you of the opinion, at the time you formulated your views, that it was necessary to do something to eliminate the influence of the Catholic Church in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you learn anything about the operations of the revolutionists of the north in reference to the persecution of priests and nuns and the desecration of churches?

Mr. LIND. Only what I have seen reported, and I have also seen claims and since my return I have talked with men, both Americans and Mexicans, in regard to those reports and have been told that they were some of them false and very many greatly exaggerated. That some things occurred there is no doubt. I never heard of orderly warfare anywhere. I think Mexican outrages rather paled into insignificance compared with what has transpired in the highly civilized countries of Europe since that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever express an opinion that the Catholic Church was responsible for the bad conditions in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never expressed that opinion to Nelson O'Shaughnessy?

Mr. LIND. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or to Mr. Bernard Frisbie?

Mr. LIND. Who is he? I do not remember.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not recall expressing such an opinion to Mr. O'Shaughnessy and Mr. Frisbie on board a Ward Line steamer?

Mr. LIND. I certainly have not. I might have said that it was very unfortunate that the Catholic Church, with its hold on the people and its power, has not devoted more efforts to education of the masses of the Mexican people. That I may have said, and I say that now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you get that information that the Catholic Church has not performed its proper functions in regard to the matters?

Mr. LIND. I did not say it had not performed its proper functions. Whether an institution had performed its proper functions depends upon the time, place, and the circumstances. But I say now that I think it very unfortunate that a larger effort by those in position to exercise power has not been made to establish and maintain popular education. For instance, I do not agree with the opposition in the United States to our public school system and our public schools. I have never concealed that fact.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Secretary of State Bryan ever suggest to you that the Catholic Church was responsible for the conditions in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he ever express himself to you on that subject?

Mr. LIND. Not that I recall.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember having a conversation with Nelson O'Shaughnessy in Mexico City in which he stated that it had been reported that a number of priests had been killed; and did you at that conversation express your satisfaction that such had been the case?

Mr. LIND. No, sir. If any statement of that character has been made it is absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get your information in regard to the operations of the Catholic Church from the Protestant missionaries in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. I can not say that I got it from any particular source. It was my aim and effort to study the activities of all the institutions, all instrumentalities that operated among the Mexican people. I sought to obtain information from all sources.

Mr. KEARFUL. After you returned from Mexico, you delivered some lectures which were subsequently embodied in a booklet published by The Bellman, Minneapolis, Minn., entitled "The Mexican People, by John Lind, formerly personal representative of President Wilson in Mexico." Does that booklet embody your views about Mexico?

Mr. LIND. You premised by saying that I delivered some lectures. I did not deliver any lectures. I received an invitation from the Traffic Club of Chicago shortly after my return, a very urgent invitation to be their guest and speak on the Mexican situation. I accepted and delivered an address. I have not delivered it anywhere else. Mr. Edgar, of the Northwestern Miller, who was impressed with the situation, heard of the address; it had been commented on to him; and he called on me and asked to see it, and I gave him the manuscript to read. Afterwards he asked to publish it. I said, "Go ahead." Unfortunately, he did not state in The Bellman that it was delivered as an address on the occasion that I referred to. He published it rather as an original article. Of course, it was not prepared with the care that I would exercise in writing an article for publication. You can see by the latter part of it that it is not constructed as one would prepare an article for publication. But I did deliver that speech as printed by him.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you prepare that address?

Mr. LIND. A couple of days before it was delivered.

Mr. KEARFUL. The booklet does not show when it was delivered.

Mr. LIND. It was in the latter part of 1914—probably in October or November of 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. I notice, on page 10 of the booklet, this statement:

Northern Mexico was settled by killing and driving out the Indians who originally roved over the country much in the same manner as our West was settled.

Do you believe that to be a correct statement?

Mr. LIND. I think the settlement of Chihuahua and northern Mexico was accomplished very much like the settlement of Arizona, and the territory in our country north from the line. As I read Mexican history, they had Indian fights the same as we had in early days, though not to the same extent that we had.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you traveled over Chihuahua and Sonora?

Mr. LIND. No; I have not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have observed the conditions there with reference to the Indian settlements which are still there by way of contrast with the Indian settlements in the northern part of Mexico?

Mr. LIND. You must bear in mind that the Indian population in those parts is very different from the Indian population that we had on our side of the line. Many of the Indians of Sonora, as well as the Indians south of a line drawn roughly from Tampico to Mazatlan were settled, industrial, agricultural people, with developed industries and a settled social and economic development. They were not blanket Indians, like many of the Indians toward the border and north of the border.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the present Indian population of Chihuahua and Sonora are similar to the blanket Indians that you are familiar with in Minnesota and other parts of the West of the United States?

Mr. LIND. I could not answer that question by "yes" or "no." There is no peculiar feature about the Indian population from the northern part of our State and the Indian as far south as I have been in Mexico. There is a general similarity in physiognomy and appearance. In fact, I have seen peons walking around the plaza at Vera Cruz of an evening who to me looked very much like the Chippewas that I am familiar with in the northern part of the State so far as facial appearance was concerned, but the differences are cultural rather than physical.

Mr. KEARFUL. From whom do you understand that the Indians received their cultural development? Was it not from the Spanish priests and friars that settled among them?

Mr. LIND. That is probably true in the northern part so far as there is any cultural development. In the south, if Spanish writers and historians are to be believed, the cultural stage of the Mexican people was very nearly as high at the time of the conquest as it is to-day—I mean, the purely Mexican people, the indigenous race.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you get that information?

Mr. LIND. I got it from Solis, the royal historian of the Indies, as the Americas were called in those days, under Charles II. He wrote along about 1665, within a century of the conquest, and his language is very specific and very interestingly complete in describing the institutions, the courts, the schools, the general development of the Indians among the Aztecs.

Mr. KEARFUL. You refer to some of those things in this booklet. Have you, since the publication of this booklet, read a pamphlet issued by Rev. Francis C. Kelly, entitled "A Book of Red and Yellow," in which he refers to the statements made by you?

Mr. LIND. Yes; but I do not care to discuss the book or pamphlet. I do not want any controversy with any Jesuit or anyone else.

Mr. KEARFUL. He points out in that book that the statements which you made were taken from the works of historians which had been subsequently shown to be imaginary. Have you since investigated to ascertain whether he is correct in that criticism?

Mr. LIND. I think the histories that I consulted are as reliable as any there are. The historical résumé that I have in that address I quoted almost literally from Solis, the Spanish historian, and I shall be very glad to get the volume and call your attention to it. Prescott and all the writers and the investigations published by the Smithsonian Institution and our department of ethnology all concur that the Mexicans had reached a high stage of civilization. For instance, their astronomical computations previous to the conquest were more accurate than any made in Europe up to that time. In view of the fact that you brought this out, I shall ask leave to bring in that volume if you desire to call me after luncheon.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well.

On page 12 of your booklet I find this statement

The better circumstanced of the northern Mexicans invariably learn English and educate their children in the United States. It is these facts that make them rebels against the conditions of the south and of the old Mexico.

Mr. LIND. I think that is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. And elaborating that somewhat on page 25 I find the following statement

The people of the north know us. They like us as well as any foreign people can like another. They are willing to be spoiled by contact with us—yes, they are willing to trade with us and to deal with us. They are trying to keep step with the march of our people politically. They are going to dominate the future of Mexico. They have the physical power, they have the brains, they have the energy.

Is that a correct statement according to your understanding?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. As contrasted with the Mexicans of the south?

Mr. LIND. Well, they are more efficient, they are more determined; there is no question about that; but in point of potential brain power capacity, I really think that the Mexican people of the south, particularly the Oaxacans, are the superior people of Mexico. I am speaking now of the indigenous element as a whole.

Mr. KEARFUL. You recall that two of the greatest men outstanding in Mexico history, Benito Juarez and Porfirio Diaz, came from the State of Oaxaca?

Mr. LIND. Yes. That is not the only reason, but I have seen a great many of the Oaxacans and talked with them. For instance, Luis Cabrera, whom I know very well, is only part of Indian blood, but he is a remarkable man intellectually.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that he likes the American people, and wants the American people in Mexico and wants them to trade with Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Not as interventionists or conquerors, he does not. As business men he certainly does, in my judgment.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you ever talked to him about his feelings in regard to Americans operating in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. I have.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his expression of sentiment in regard to Americans operating in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. I never heard him express himself adversely at all, but, like all Mexicans, he undoubtedly feels that any foreigner operating in Mexico should conform to Mexican laws and help bear the burdens of taxation and the maintenance of their institutions.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been testified here by more than one apparently credible witness that Luis Cabrera stated upon several occasions that the Americans had been exploiting the Mexicans long enough, and that they ought to be driven out of the country and their property taken from them. Did he ever express any such sentiments to you?

Mr. LIND. Not at all; not at all. We discussed the oil situation on several occasions, and I never heard him express a sentiment that was not entirely cordial to enterprise, and welcomed investment and development, but he always insisted that foreigners operating in Mexico should not seek to avoid taxes and the performance of their duties the same as was required of Mexican citizens.

Now, speaking about the oil situation—

Mr. KEARFUL. Just a moment; I want to ask you a question right there. Did he take the position that it was the custom of Americans to avoid their obligations in regard to paying taxes and other requirements of the laws of Mexico?

Mr. LIND. No; but to protest and object to any regulation, and to appeal to the Government and to the State Department. I have heard him object to that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in sympathy with that expression of sentiment on his part?

Mr. LIND. I think that when the citizens of any country go into a foreign country, whether for trade, commerce, or industrial development, it is incumbent upon them to observe the laws of that country, and to carry the burdens that are properly imposed for the maintenance of Government, the same as the citizens of that country; not to call upon his Government, the Government of his former allegiance, frivolously for the purpose of annoying or protesting against action that does not do violence to our accepted notions of right and wrong.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you understand that Americans operating in Mexico had been in the habit of making frivolous protests to their own Government in regard to the way they were treated?

Mr. LIND. When you say, "Americans," that is broad. I have heard complaints that individual Americans caused the Government and the authorities a great deal of embarrassment and annoyance by objections to reasonable things, and complaints to their own Government. It caused friction and bad feeling.

The oil situation is very peculiar. We have exactly the same situation in our State of Minnesota. I am referring to the psychology of it, not for the purpose of either condemning one side or upholding the other; but here the Steel Corporation owns nearly all the iron mines in our State—that is, it has leases on them—and that is the bulk of the iron ore in the United States. They pay taxes, and they pay very large taxes in the aggregate, but there is constant agitation in our State for higher taxes. Our people say, "Why, the Steel Corporation is taking away the iron ore, of which we only have one crop; when it is gone, that is the last of it; and they are leaving us an unsightly, ugly hole in the ground, and why should they not contribute liberally toward the support of our schools and to create a permanent fund?"

Now, I am not saying that that attitude on the part of our people is always reasonable—not by any means—and, mind you, the Steel Corporation is composed of Americans, our own citizens, and still there is that prejudice. Now, I imagine that the Mexicans feel the same way: "Here, the foreigners are taking the oil out of our soil, and they are leaving us the surface destroyed, black holes in the ground, and if we do not get a revenue for the support of our schools and for our development, where are we?"

I am not either commending or condemning; I am just speaking of the natural psychology of the situation, that it is only human nature that the Mexicans should seek to exact some revenue and taxes, just the same as our people endeavor to do, and that the oil corporations should seek to evade or reduce the taxes just as much as is possible, the same as they do in our State.

There is the situation.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that the oil companies operating in Mexico have sought to evade taxes?

Mr. LIND. Yes; because they have come to me and solicited my cooperation. When I say "evade," I do not mean to evade all the taxes, but to escape the additional taxes that were required. When I was in Mexico, that is a matter that they took up with me frequently.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know the extent of the taxation and whether it amounted to confiscation?

Mr. LIND. Well, I guess there have been no confiscatory taxes. Whether the taxes exacted have been excessive or not, I do not know, and express no judgment. I am just speaking of the psychology of the situation. That is one that inevitably, so long as human nature remains where it is, will cause contention and differences of opinion.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with article 27 of the new constitution of 1917 in reference to the nationalization of the subsoil?

Mr. LIND. Yes; I am.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the oil companies have any just ground of complaint on that score?

Mr. LIND. It depends on how it is administered and how you look at it. In Mexico, the same as with us, originally, the State owned all the minerals. You know, the Government of the United States owned all of the minerals, I think, until in the forties Congress released the minerals. We have recently resumed the oil and coal and minerals of that character in the public lands. The State in Mexico owned the oil until some time during Diaz's administration, when Lord Cowdray discovered oil. Then they secured an act of the Mexican Congress relinquishing the State's claim to the oil and real property. Of course, Lord Cowdray and his organization in Mexico, under Diaz, were in position to virtually dictate, and they did dictate to the Mexican Government what they wanted, and they got what they wanted.

For instance, I am very sure that I sent to the State Department a photographic copy of the stock ledger of the Aguila Oil Co. when it was organized. I think the capitalization was some 1,300,000 pesos. Cowdray and his associates had the bulk of it, but the Mexican secretary of state, the Mexican secretary of the treasury, and Diaz's son had, I think, 400,000 pesos of the stock of the Mexican Aguila Oil Co.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you mean when you say that the oil belonged to the State up to the time of Diaz? Do you mean that where private property had been granted, nevertheless the oil was reserved to the State as its property?

Mr. LIND. Yes; just the same as other minerals. You know, on any land in Mexico, privately owned, anyone can go and condemn—denounce, as they call it—minerals rights. I am correct in that, am I not?

Mr. KEARFUL. I am asking you for your information.

Mr. LIND. My understanding is that in Mexico to-day, and it always has been the law in Mexico, the owner of real property does not own the minerals, that they are subject to denunciation by anyone who discovered them. Denunciation is what they call the process, as I recall. That was true of oil until Cowdray secured that amendment of the law. Now, as I understand the constitutional provision to which you refer simply reinstates the old law with this provision, that it shall not apply to land acquired by foreigners during the period that the law was in operation, or to lands where oil had been developed. That is my understanding, but that may be imperfect in detail.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you get your information that the law of Mexico was that the oil below the surface belonging to private owners belonged to the Government?

Mr. LIND. Why, that is the Latin law; that is the Code Napoleon; and then I have often seen the act quoted by which the Government relinquished it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of a distinction being made between oil and coal on the one part and metalliferous minerals on the other, as to the reservation of rights to the Government?

Mr. LIND. Under operation of that law relinquishing—

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean, prior to that law, did it ever come to your attention that the reservations that were made in the grants of the original titles were purely of certain specified metalliferous minerals and that nothing but those specified were reserved? Was that ever brought to your attention?

Mr. LIND. No.

(Thereupon, at 12.20 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 5 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The hearing was resumed at 5 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, April 27, 1920, pursuant to the recess taken at 12.20 o'clock p. m. to-day.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN LIND—Resumed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you wish to say something before I resume questioning you?

Mr. LIND. The volume of history that I referred to this morning was "Historia de la Conquista de Mejico, by Don Antonio de Solis," printed in Paris in 1844. I call your attention to Chapter XVI. The first two or three pages of this chapter call attention to the land system, the system of taxation that prevails in the Mexican Empire under the Montezumas; the different ministers; their sessions from time to time resolving questions of peace and war; the organization of the nobility and the army; the organization of the courts; the administration of justice appealed from the inferior courts to the higher courts.

Then it takes up the system of education that prevailed, three classes of schools, public schools for the common people, where they were taught to read the characters and hieroglyphics which constituted their writing, and were taught manners and politeness, and others were taught trades, and the children of the nobility were fitted for public office and for the army, and some women for vestal virgins, and so on.

I should be very glad if you would let your translator—

Mr. KEARFUL. Is that book in Spanish?

Mr. LIND. It is in Spanish; yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you read it in the original?

Mr. LIND. Yes; certainly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you take the material that you used from the original Spanish?

Mr. LIND. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. Translate it? Did you translate it yourself?

Mr. LIND. Yes; I can translate this freely, offhand, only it takes time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know any Spanish when you went to Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Very little. I had read some Italian and of course had Latin at school, but the Spanish that I got—and it is only speaking broadly, a reading knowledge of Spanish—I acquired in Mexico, and I have kept up my reading since.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Emery, about whom you testified as having a plantation that you visited, was a witness here and he told about the trip that you made and said that you were not able to converse with the natives, but that you had to have an interpreter.

Mr. LIND. That is true. Later, if a person spoke Spanish to me slowly I could follow him or her and very many Mexicans can understand English if it is spoken slowly and distinctly; but now I can not carry on and would not attempt to carry on a conversation, though I can get along traveling and, as I say, read readily. Of course in reading, particularly old literature like this, there are idiomatic phrases that I sometimes have to reflect on and perhaps consult the dictionary.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your booklet before referred to, you say in one place that you mingled with the people a great deal?

Mr. LIND. I did.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not mean that you conversed with the natives in their own language?

Mr. LIND. In a way I did, and still you could not call it conversation. Now that you have asked me that question, I wish to say that I used to take walks around Vera Cruz every afternoon about this time of day. You know how the little houses in the outskirts are located. Everybody knew me. I am well marked to start with, and my mission had been discussed in the press, and the men and the women and the children would come up and look at me and bow. I would step into the houses, up in the direction of Los Cocos and all around. They would come very politely and usually the women of the cabin would ask me if I would like coffee, and I always responded that it would be very agreeable to have a cup of coffee, and talked a little, but not what you could call conversation.

I used to play with the children a good deal and I pitched pennies with the boys sometimes. I just wanted to see how the people lived and be on relations of sufficient intimacy so that they would not run at the sight of me.

The consul, Mr. Canada, was my eyes and ears, too, in many instances. We occasionally walked out together and met the people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you find that your mission caused some hostility among the people of Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Yes, and no. Among the official class, the Huertistas class, which is the only official class of course that I met there, was undoubtedly a feeling of hostility; but I must say that even those who are deemed the most hostile politically always treated me with courtesy. I never had more kindly or more pleasant treatment than I received at the hands of many Mexicans. There were very few exceptions.

The common people, for some reason or other that I can not comprehend, simply went out of their way to make it pleasant for me. For instance, if you will pardon me—it is illustrative of the character and attitude of the people—they would grab my hand and sometimes kiss it. That is what I take to be the old sympathizers of Madero, the liberal element would do that.

As Consul Canada remembers, Huerta sent down spies, as we called them. Whether they were sent down to spy on me or to guard me against any accident or any incident that might cause friction, I can not say; but those men, when I went about town, usually followed me or very often followed me, 40 or 50 rods back, and when we got out a ways I would pull out my handkerchief and wave to them and they would come up, and sometimes we had a glass of beer or a cigar.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your mingling with the people that you mention in your book was confined to the suburbs of Vera Cruz?

Mr. LIND. Of course I met a great many in Mexico City. Thousands called on me in the aggregate, and those were passed through Vera Cruz. There was not a day, I venture to say, during the month that I remained at Vera Cruz that I did not have from 15 to 25 or 50 callers. May I ask Consul Canada how my estimate is on that?

Consul CANADA. There were several every day, Gov. Lind, while you were there, that would come to the office. I could not say how many.

Mr. LIND. No; neither can I, but a great many.

Mr. KEARFUL. On page 25 of your booklet is this statement:

You have heard a great deal about the hostility of the Mexicans against everything American. I found no such hostility, except among the class who supported Huerta. They hated us. What there is left of them hate us now. They do not hate us as individuals. They hate and dread the influence of our institutions. They say contact with the United States, and even with individual Americans, spoils the people—

Mr. LIND. That is true.

Mr. KEARFUL (reading):

and makes rebels of them. Their eyes turn to Europe for trade, for finance, and for all intercourse.

Do you know whether or not the class of people of whom you were speaking there were the same class that supported Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. LIND. I can not say how their earlier alignments existed.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are not able to say that that same condition existed in the time of Porfirio Diaz?

Mr. LIND. No; I say I can not speak of that time. I was not in Mexico then.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe that Huerta failed in any respect in his duties and in the protection of American property rights and personal rights?

Mr. LIND. Oh, outside of the City of Mexico there was no safety for property or property rights or individuals in Mexico, generally speaking.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were not outside of Mexico City except to go to Vera Cruz and this one hacienda, were you?

Mr. LIND. Oh, yes. I was around on the railroad, but I got my reports every day, scores of letters; for instance, delegations came to me from all directions, and the Americans, of course, suffered and were leaving, a great many of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. You also say on page 25 of the booklet:

The elimination of Huerta was demanded by the interests of the Mexican people.

How did you ascertain that?

Mr. LIND. The whole attitude of the Huertista government, as I judged of the situation, was one of force and repression, and I felt confident then, as I do now and as I expressed myself this morning, that the new ideas of the twentieth century had reached Mexico. The people had begun to see, or at least to feel, the injustice that had prevailed; the conditions under which they had lived. They looked for better things, such as they had seen across the line in the United States. There was a sort of French revolution brewing.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean the ideals that were represented by the revolutionists of the north headed by Villa and Carranza?

Mr. LIND. Well, the revolutionary movement in general, north and south. It was very strong in Mexico City; it was very strong all over, and very active in the north.

Mr. KEARFUL. Witnesses before the committee have testified with practical unanimity that within the territory controlled by Huerta life and property were secure. Are you prepared to say that they are incorrect?

Mr. LIND. If you limit it to the City of Mexico and the portion of the territory toward the Gulf, that is probably true; but within 25 miles of Mexico City, in the whole State of Morelos and in Oaxaca, neither life nor property were safe, nor when you got up to Torreon or half way to Torreon. It is the same condition of affairs there, and in the great region between Tampico, Mexico, and the Huastica region. We had a great deal of trouble, as Consul Canada will remember, with respect to the condition of affairs in the Texas land and mining district.

Mr. KEARFUL. The testimony I referred to covers the States of Yucatan, Campeche, Chiapas, Oaxaca, Vera Cruz, and all of the States up to the northern territory which has been overrun by the revolutionists. Were you in any of those States?

Mr. LIND. Certainly I was.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were?

Mr. LIND. I was, and all I can say is that my views differ from the testimony you state. I will not undertake to argue it. For instance, you spoke about Yucatan. Yucatan was in trouble all the time. Huerta had sent down there some of his troops to capture volunteers for his army—that is the way they got volunteers for Huerta's army, by capturing them—and the little gunboats that they had would bring them up to Vera Cruz and there they would come in strings. I have counted, from Consul Canada's window, I think with him at my side, a string of volunteers for Huerta's army who were walking in line, with a long rope or cable with loops in it, and a loop thrown around the neck of each one in a row, about 2 feet apart. That is the way they were marched through the city.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who were those people?

Mr. LIND. They were volunteers for Huerta's army to fight the rebels of the north.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where and how did he get them?

Mr. LIND. He got them by capturing them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where did you get your information in regard to them? Who told you that?

Mr. LIND. It is common knowledge. I saw them landed and the papers were full of it. My attention, I think, was first called to it by Consul Canada, who said, "Governor, come here." He was standing at the window. "Come here and see some of the volunteers for the Mexican army." There was a string of these fellows with this rope around their necks, as I have described.

Mr. KEARFUL. Consul Canada told you that they were volunteers that Huerta had taken from peaceful pursuits? Is that your information?

Mr. LIND. I will not say to what extent of detail he went into, but he called my attention to them, and then I made further inquiry and verified it, of course.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know of any instance where Huerta failed to protect the lives and property of Americans in any part of the territory that was not controlled by the revolutionists of the north?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What instances?

Mr. LIND. In Oaxaca, toward the Isthmus, near Cuernavaca. They were streaming through Mexico to Vera Cruz every day.

Mr. KEARFUL. I think the committee would like to have specific instances, because we never heard of that before.

Mr. LIND. This was six or seven years ago, and I can not give you names or the dates. These things are reported pretty fully in my official reports. I kept no record except the reports that I made to the department from day to day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you come to the conclusion upon the information that you obtained that the salvation of Mexico depended upon the success of the revolutionary movement instituted by Carranza?

Mr. LIND. No. I came to the conclusion that the only salvation of Mexico depended upon a new régime, in which some of the existing abuses would be eradicated, in which the people would be afforded an opportunity to attend schools, and in which some of the blessings that other peoples enjoyed would be given them to enjoy. I did not feel that Carranza or any individual or any group of individuals could bring a millenium in Mexico, nor do I feel now that any man or set of men can restore—they can not restore any good conditions because the conditions have always been bad, but I do not feel now that any individual or any set of men can give the Mexican people ideal conditions, ideal government, or absolute peace and plenty as the people might enjoy in a country as rich as that. It will take decades and generations for the people to develop into self-governing, intelligent citizens.

Mr. KEARFUL. But in the existing condition as you found it, did you believe that that movement of Carranza was the first step toward that result?

Mr. LIND. I did, and I do now.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it your belief that if that revolutionary movement failed, that intervention by this country in Mexico would be inevitable?

Mr. LIND. I think I had that fear, but my conviction was that if that revolutionary movement failed it would be followed by another until the conditions that inevitably caused revolutions were cured or removed at least in part.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you not often expressed it as your firm conviction and have you not stated it to me that it was Carranza or intervention?

Mr. LIND. I think I have—I think I have—not Carranza as an individual, but he—

Mr. KEARFUL. As typifying a cause?

Mr. LIND. As typifying a cause, the movement.

Mr. KEARFUL. In reference to the proposition of recognizing Carranza as the head of the de facto government of Mexico, did you not take the position that unless Carranza were recognized intervention would be inevitable?

Mr. LIND. I think so. I was anxious to see Carranza recognized as soon as there was tolerable peace in Mexico, as there was at the time he was recognized, for two reasons: I felt that that was the only hope in the situation at that time, and I felt also that in view of the European war, which had begun, and in which I felt certain we would be involved sooner or later—and I expected it about as early as it came—that it was an impending absolute national necessity that we should have our flank at peace or as nearly at peace as possible.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those the views of the President?

Mr. LIND. I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. Upon the basis of Carranza or intervention, if Carranza were now thrown out by the counter revolution would you believe that intervention is the only solution?

Mr. LIND. No. Whatever happens in Mexico—I am no prophet and I am not sufficiently informed to discuss the present situation intelligently. In regard to the reports that I see in the papers, I can not help being reminded of what Mark Twain said when his attention was called to the fact that he was reported dead. He said that the report of his death was very much exaggerated. That is what I think of these reports. Still, one can not say what may happen in Mexico, but whatever happens I should look upon intervention as a most unfortunate step for the United States as well as for the Mexican people.

Mr. KEARFUL. I can say personally that I very heartily agree with you on that point. I wish to ask this question: Your faith in Carranza and the other leaders of his revolution was founded, was it not, upon his acts and the acts of his leaders in the progress of the victorious march through Mexico and on to Mexico City?

Mr. LIND. I wish you would divide that question. You assume that I had faith in Villa.

Mr. KEARFUL. No, I said Carranza.

Mr. LIND. I never had any faith in Villa as a possibility even for any executive or administrative position. Villa is essentially an intelligent savage. That is the best and the worst you can say of him. Carranza as I knew him by reputation and as a result of much inquiry at that time, and as better acquaintance since has confirmed me, I regard him as a very able, and, I think, patriotic man. He is strong-minded, opinionated, and, as I said in one of my dispatches, pig-headed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Villa was Carranza's principal general in the beginning of the operations in the north, was he not?

Mr. LIND. I do not know. I do not think there were any principal generals. I think they all fought together by common consent.

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean the main successes in the early stages of the revolution were gained by Villa, were they not?

Mr. LIND. I think many of the military successes were.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you not regard the turning point of the revolution to be the taking of Torreon by Villa?

Mr. LIND. Well, I think so. I think that is what virtually was the beginning of the end.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will return to the previous question. Was your faith in the revolutionary movement headed by Carranza founded upon the action of the army as it marched through Mexico and in its triumphal entry into Mexico City?

Mr. LIND. My faith in the revolutionary movement was founded upon the economic and social necessity for the revolutionary movement. The movements of the army were only evidence of that necessity for a change in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the fall of 1914 when you wrote the address which is published in the booklet referred previously, Mexico City had then been in the hands of the constitutionalists for several months. Carranza entered Mexico City early in August, 1914. Previously other important towns had been taken. On page 22 of the booklet you make this statement:

Mexico has not enjoyed more than eight years of real self-government in the whole life of the nation. But here also the indications are promising.

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL (reading): "The discipline and restraint shown by the victorious constitutional armies and their chiefs were most creditable and encouraging."

Were you present in any of the cities that were taken by the victorious constitutional army?

Mr. LIND. No, I was not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had no opportunity personally to observe their actions so as to judge whether they exercised discipline and restraint and whether that was creditable and encouraging?

Mr. LIND. No, but I still would use that same language when you reflect on what occurred by people very much more cultured and disciplined, as we supposed, in the late European war. You must bear in mind that in the Mexican armies perhaps 90 per cent of the soldiers are utterly illiterate and without any civilizing antecedents or discipline. When they enter victoriously into a city the size of Mexico City or any of the other large cities in the Mexican nation, one would naturally expect very great and very flagrant excesses and outrages. I have no doubt that there were excesses.

Mr. KEARFUL. Would you expect that those excesses would be committed by the leaders of the army as an example to the men?

Mr. LIND. No; we would not expect it, and still those things happened in the war, if the reports that we had from the occupation of Belgium and northern France are to be believed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know Manuel Calero, who was foreign minister under Madero and afterwards ambassador?

Mr. LIND. I only know of him. I never met him, but I am familiar with his name.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know his reputation as a Mexican of standing or not?

Mr. LIND. I do not recall very distinctly, but I have no recollection that I heard him spoken of as a vicious man.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was one of the ardent supporters of Madero and is now exiled from the country.

Mr. LIND. I recall him. He passed through Vera Cruz and was conducted to Vera Cruz. I recall him now. No; I never heard him spoken of except highly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever read a book written by him in 1916 entitled "The Mexican policy of President Woodrow Wilson as it appears to a Mexican?"

Mr. LIND. I have not read it.

Mr. KEARFUL. In that book he refers to what occurred in Mexico City at the time of the entry of the victorious constitutionalist's army there.

Mr. LIND. But he was not there. He was not an eyewitness.

Mr. KEARFUL. On page 31 of that book he said:

What happened then is something that the American Government has not dared to publish. The few honorable constitutionalists shudder to recall it. The Department of State has in its archives the official information of the outrages committed by the so-called constitutionalists in the great capital of Mexico. Never had the city suffered such indignities, not even in the blackest days of our revolutionary life. Even the diplomatic representatives of the foreign Governments were robbed by the Carranza "generals" and by the mob of ravenous politicians that followed. Even the Brazilian minister, official representative of the United States, was robbed.

Again, on page 78, speaking of the same subject, Mr. Calero says:

The revolutionists entered a place, and the inhabitants, terrorized, shut themselves up in their houses, concealed their wives and their daughters to save them from the lust of those ferocious beasts, and concealed their properties to save them from pillage. In the great cities there were customarily acclamations and friendly receptions for the victors, inspired more by fear of being considered unfriendly than by a legitimate enthusiasm, but nowhere was seen the popular effort to draw from that triumph any advantages for the effectiveness of the public liberties. Martial law was the form in which the revolutionary authority was exercised. The military tribunal, without law, and arbitrary, substituted the civil tribunal; the military commander took the place of the municipal council; the military governor that of the civil governor of the State, and the "first chief" substituted the president of the Republic, the Congress, and the Federal courts of justice.

On page 62 he gives an account of what occurred after the break between Villa and Carranza, as follows:

Those combatants did not appear to fight against their enemies, but against the immense pacific population. Everyone who may have followed the changes of this drama knows the infinite number of attacks upon the honor of women, upon religion, upon property, and upon life. A savage struggle in which the Yaquis, barbarous and sanguinary, who formed a part of the hosts of Carranza, the criminals, taken from all the prisons, the Mexican Indian, ignorant and avid for blood and rapine, who formed the bulk of the combatants, satisfied their instincts of bestial ferocity at the expense of 15,000,000 of human beings.

Hunger and pestilence increased the ravages of war. The military chiefs made scandalous fortunes, and what they did not appropriate to themselves was sent to the United States to the voracious speculators, who were paid with the bread and tears of the Mexican people for the arms and ammunition which sustained that infernal conflict.

Read the reports of the Red Cross; examine the official data with which the Department of State is stuffed, and it will be seen that while thousands of women and children were dying for lack of food, cargoes of corn, beans, of live stock, and all that could satisfy hunger went out of the Mexican ports and of the frontier cities to be converted into rifles and cartridges, into instruments of destruction.

Did you ever hear any of those accounts?

Mr. LIND. There are undoubtedly instances or occurrences that justify an indictment; not such as that. I think that is a very extreme, partisan statement even of the excesses that are always incident to the advance of a victorious army of that character.

Mr. KEARFUL. You can not say that of your own personal knowledge?

Mr. LIND. No; and neither could he, because he was not there any more than I was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Witnesses who have heretofore testified before the committee were there and substantiated the statement. Are you prepared to say they are mistaken?

Mr. LIND. No, but I think many of them are prejudiced.

Mr. KEARFUL. Or that they have testified falsely?

Mr. LIND. I would not say that they have testified falsely, but the main difference was in the construction that they put upon the incidents happening in times of stress. For instance, Mr. Murray, whom you know very well, who had been a reporter for the New York World in Mexico City for years and years, one of the most intelligent men that I have known in Mexico, told me some three or four years ago, when I met him here in the city of Washington, that what astounded him more than anything else was the discretion exercised by these victorious armies that occupied Mexico City from time to time. He said even Zapata and his followers did not cause the devastation nor the hardships that were anticipated. Everybody expected that if Zapata and his followers entered Mexico City the whole population would be robbed. He said there were instances of that character, but on the whole the entry and the occupation was much more orderly than he had ever anticipated. He spoke the same way about the entrance of the Constitutionalist armies.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is undoubtedly true that Zapata, when he entered Mexico City, surprised everybody and kept order, and undertook to and did return to the owners of property such articles as could be found that had been stolen from them by the forces of Carranza previous to his evacuation, but I was speaking of the Constitutionalist armies.

Mr. LIND. He was speaking of them also. He was an eyewitness to all occurrences, and he expressed great surprise that the excesses were not greater and worse than they were.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear about the occupation of houses in Mexico City by Carranza's generals and the looting of those houses?

Mr. LIND. I heard about houses being commandeered for the use of the officers in the army.

Mr. KEARFUL. You understand, as a lawyer, that the word "commandeer" means to take property and pay for it, do you not?

Mr. LIND. Not at the time, not payment at the time. I never knew a government or an army to do that except, possibly, out in the field where generals sometimes have cash. But our Government, when it commandeered during the last war, took possession of such houses, and such ships, and such instrumentalities as it required, and has not paid for them to-day.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you understand that was the process followed by Carranza and his generals in Mexico City and other places?

Mr. LIND. Not in the same orderly way, I do not imagine. You can not judge of the Mexicans by our standards and do them justice. You can not expect that they will carry on a Government or carry on activities of any kind in as orderly a way as we would and do. That is what I mean.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the creditable and encouraging acts that you had in mind when you wrote the statement referred to?

Mr. LIND. I can not recall now just what I had in mind when I used that language, but the whole situation to me looked promising and it has continued to do so until this present unfortunate electioneering contest that is in progress.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean that it was creditable and encouraging to you that they did not commit any greater excesses than were actually committed? You expected them to—

Mr. LIND (interrupting). No; I did not expect, but I feared that there would be greater excesses than any committed, and I often discussed that with Consul Canada. I will say here that is the fear of the possibility of excesses from any of the armies, I counseled with the naval officers and the Army officers, not under instructions from Washington but on my own and their initiative, to take precautionary steps if anything should happen while I was there to prevent any serious conflagration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear about a Mexican historian named Francisco Bulnes?

Mr. LIND. I think not. I am not familiar with his writings anyway, whether I ever heard of him or not.

Mr. KEARFUL. He is quite a celebrated historian. He wrote several very illuminating books on Mexican history and his last book is entitled, "The Whole Truth about Mexico." On page 295 of that book he refers to the agrarian problem and the insincerity of the revolutionists in promising to the peons division of land. He said:

And the land holdings, the great land holdings, what of them? The greatest among them passed into the hands of the constitutionalists chiefs, to be enjoyed with the rights of absolute ownership. What had constituted the great offense against the poor had become the great plum of the conquest. All the personal property of the wealthy was appropriated by the constitutionalists. Handsome residences, automobiles, jewelry, furniture, money, clothes, everything possessed by the aristocrats, and even those who were not aristocrats, was taken by the revolutionists.

Do you think there is any truth in that statement?

Mr. LIND. I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. That statement was called to the attention of a Mexican who has testified before the committee, a man of very high standing in Mexico, who is exiled from that country.

Mr. LIND. Who was the man?

Mr. KEARFUL. He is now engaged in business in New York, and his name is Vicente Sanchez Gavito.

Mr. LIND. I do not know him.

Mr. KEARFUL. And he confirmed that, as well as the statements previously made from the book of Manuel Calero.

Mr. LIND. Did he give any incidents, dates, haciendas, or houses taken? Did he give any data or just mere denunciation?

Mr. KEARFUL. The date has been given by various individual witnesses from all parts of Mexico, who have testified before the committee.

Mr. LIND. Understand me; I can not either affirm or deny the truth of alleged indiscretions or trespasses committed by anyone in Mexico since the time I was there.

Mr. KEARFUL. This relates to the time of the march of the revolution, and what was done upon the taking of cities by the constitutionalists.

Mr. LIND. The language and tenor of the language indicates that it was written in a controversial, denunciatory spirit, to say the least, and while there may be some basis of truth for it, I would want to know the fact.

Mr. KEARFUL. As I said before, many witnesses from all parts of Mexico have testified in detail, giving dates, names of individual, description of property, etc., fully substantiating the general statement. Are you prepared to say that testimony is mistaken or false?

Mr. LIND. I am not saying that anyone's testimony that I have not heard and that purports to be about facts of which I have no knowledge is either true or false. I am not here to prosecute or persecute or defend anybody.

Mr. KEARFUL. This booklet of yours containing statements referred to was published in Minneapolis, as I remember, late in the year 1914 and at that time was quite widely distributed. I know I got a copy.

Mr. LIND. No, it was not widely distributed. It has never been distributed.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say it has never been distributed?

Mr. LIND. No, sir. Individuals have written to Mr. Edgar for copies. There were only 300 printed in all.

Mr. KEARFUL. For your information I will state that a telegram was sent to The Bellman at Minneapolis requesting two copies to be sent to a certain gentleman, and also that the bill be sent with them. The copies were immediately sent, together with a letter stating that there was no charge. This occurred within the last few days.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Edgar is a very prominent publisher and a friend of mine, a personal friend of mine. He printed this without my knowledge and without any request on my part that it be printed. He used the same type and print that was used in The Bellman, and struck off these copies, I think 300. He sent 50 or 75 or possibly more to my office and they are there yet in my office except occasionally people who have read The Bellman or heard about the address wrote to me and asked for a copy and I have sent it out. It has never been distributed and never circulated except as I have explained.

Mr. KEARFUL. The publication and distribution of this pamphlet was done at the expense of the gentleman you mentioned?

Mr. LIND. Wholly.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you do while you were in Vera Cruz by way of aiding the revolutionists of the north to triumph over Huerta?

Mr. LIND. Not a thing, not a thing. I never corresponded with one. I refused to correspond with any except my official correspondence in regard to political matters.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any correspondence with any representatives of Zapata in the city of Morelos?

Mr. LIND. No; except one rather ludicrous incident which annoyed me quite a little and I think Consul Canada more. That occurred a week or so before I left Vera Cruz.

A gentleman by the name of Hall, who had been at Cuernavaca for a good many years, a New England man originally, but a Mormon, who had gone to Cuernavaca from Utah, brought to me at Vera Cruz a letter from Consul General Shanklin, commending to me in very positive terms a Col. Martinez, who was very much interested in the Zapatista movement and purported to represent Zapata. I asked Mr. Hall about the matter. I said, "I can not see this man if he wants anything that I could not grant him or that would be embarrassing to our Government." He insisted that he was a very, very able man, and very discreet, and that he wanted help for the Zapatistas.

Then Mr. Hall told the most heartrending story about the condition of the poor Zapatistas in the neighborhood of Cuernavaca and west. He said they were starving, many of them had been wounded, they were actually rotting, as he put it. There was the most horrible condition that he had ever seen or that anyone had known, he said.

They had been at war with the Huerta soldiers and I guess with the Madero soldiers earlier for three or four years. They were a helpless, ignorant mass of people.

He told me the most heartrending story that I ever listened to about their condition and said this colonel was coming with a communication from Shanklin for their relief.

Mr. KEARFUL. This was Arnold Shanklin, the consul general at Mexico City?

Mr. LIND. Yes, in whom I had implicit confidence and had known and always have had. Whether the colonel came before I left Vera Cruz I do not recall now. May I ask Consul Canada? I think his recollection is more accurate.

Had he arrived at Vera Cruz before I left or did he arrive the same day?

Mr. CANADA. He arrived in the evening after you had gone on board ship.

Mr. LIND. And did I not come ashore?

Mr. CANADA. He got out there the next morning and saw you on the ship.

Mr. LIND. That was it. He said he brought a power of attorney from Zapata and showed it to me and I think I have it yet. I said, "What do you want?" He wanted help. I said, "What kind of help do you want?" He wanted $50,000. I said, "Sir, that is absurd. Mr. Hall told me about the deplorable condition of these people and if there is anything I can do, especially now since I am going to Washington, I shall call on the Red Cross authorities in Washington just the minute I reach the city, and if any relief can be given you in any way of medicine or supplies, bandages, or food, if it can be conveyed to you, I will do everything in my power."

He wanted money. I said, "It is absurd. If I had it at my disposal I would not give it to you and could not give it to you, and I am very sure that our Government would not pay out a penny. But as a matter of humanity and charity, if these supplies can be conveyed to the unfortunate Zapatistas, that will be done."

Mr. Hall came with me to Washington and then I turned him over to Senator Smoot. I called on Senator Smoot to find out whether Hall was a reputable, reliable man, because if I secured supplies and relief for him it was expected that he might be able to convey it to them. I went to see the Red Cross and got a promise of supplies and medicine and I was told that an order might be issued on one of the ship's commissaries for supplies if we could be satisfied that they would be conveyed to the poor people.

Then this man Col. Martinez commenced to cable for money. I simply cabled to him that it was absurd, and I either wrote or cabled to Consul Canada to get rid of him, and I guess he did and with some trouble, just how I do not recall. That is that incident.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of what was this Col. Martinez, a colonel—in whose army?

Mr. LIND. I do not know what he was colonel of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it not understood that he was a colonel in Huerta's army?

Mr. LIND. No; that was not my understanding. My understanding was, so far as I had any understanding or have any recollection, was that he was a lawyer in Mexico City, who had had some matters for Zapata and had his confidence. Since then or shortly after this incident I came to the conclusion that he was a spy sent by Blanquet to Vera Cruz—I do not know what for, but for some purpose of his. That is simply a supposition on my part. I do not know.

Mr. KEARFUL. If he was an officer in Huerta's army you did not know it?

Mr. LIND. I did not know it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that Arnold Shanklin sent to you a secret code to be used, in which this man Martinez was to be known as Brady, and Hall was to be known as Clark, and Shanklin was to be known as Paz, and Zapata as Dix, and yourself as Juarez?

Mr. LIND. Now that you speak of it, I think that there was a note of that character sent to me. I had forgotten all about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your understanding for the necessity for that secrecy?

Mr. LIND. None of this occurred at my suggestion and with my knowledge, and I could not comprehend it, and of course when a man suggested money then I suspected at once that he was a fake, and I think I told Mr. Canada before I left that that fellow was a fake, but I would look into it and verify it further through Mr. Hall.

What deceived me was that Mr. Hall himself impressed me as a kind-hearted, honest man, and he is certainly a plausible man and I have no reason now to say that he was not all of that, but then Senator Smoot spoke highly of the man. But of course when I found that it was money that he wanted, that ended it.

Mr. KEARFUL. In a letter signed by Arnold Shanklin and sent to you inclosing this code key—

Mr. LIND (interrupting). Let me correct that. I have no memory now whether any code was suggested by Mr. Shanklin, whether that was his suggestion or Hall's suggestion, or what source it came, but your speaking about it reminds me that there was something of that character.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember receiving a letter from Arnold Shanklin inclosing this code or key to the code, and containing this statement:

From most reliable sources I learn that the Zapatistas have taken other principal places in the south, and that they are attacking Cuernavaca almost daily. One day last week they came so close to Cuernavaca and in such numbers that the Federals had to use rapid firing guns and cannon. I might have put it better by saying that they were close enough for the Federals to use to advantage such means of defense.

Mr. LIND. I have no recollection of that letter, not the slightest. I doubt very much whether it came to me. But the coming of this man, whatever may have been the object of Hall's coming, never had any military significance from my standpoint. The only thought that I had in my mind, aside from the desire to alleviate the terrible human suffering that he detailed, was that if we could get in touch with some of those rude warring elements in that section in this manner, perhaps, when the time came it might be possible for our Government to exercise a persuasive influence for peace and reconciliation with the rest of the Mexican people. That did run through my mind, and was a consideration on my part, I think, in addition to the response to the humanitarian call.

Mr. KEARFUL. Perhaps this may refresh your recollection——

Mr. LIND (interrupting). Pardon me for asking the question, but have you anything that I wrote? I think I wrote Shanklin a note in regard to the matter.

Mr. KEARFUL. I have not any communication from you to Shanklin, but I was going to call your attention to another paragraph in Shanklin's letter to you.

Referring to the person who delivered the letter he said:

Further he will bring to you a piece of paper on which I have written the figures 1, 2, 3, 4, and the letters A, B, C, D, the letters being under the figures. I have torn the paper across so that the tear is across the figure 2 and the letter C.

Mr. LIND. I never saw that letter.

Mr. KEARFUL. He says further:

I send herewith the other part of that paper.

Mr. LIND. I never saw that letter. If that letter was written for me, it must have arrived at Vera Cruz after I left. I never saw that. My memory is pretty distinct. If I had ever seen that communication I would recall it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Further he said:

I also inclose a new code prepared by Hall. As it gives a new code name for each, Hall and Zapata, we will hereafter use the names for them as they appear on this new code.

Mr. LIND. That indicates that my recollection is correct. I never saw that letter, and it never came to my knowledge or reached me, but when you spoke about code, I know there was a suggestion from some source about the use of code words.

Mr. KEARFUL. He speaks here of a new code, as if there had been a code in use before.

Mr. LIND. A code had been suggested, and I told you a moment ago, but that communication I never saw.

Mr. KEARFUL. To refresh your recollection in that respect, I will ask if you remember a letter signed by you, directed to Consul Canada, in which you said:

I hand you herewith——

Mr. LIND. May I see it or are you reading the whole of it?

Mr. KEARFUL. I am reading this part of it.

Mr. LIND. I would like to see the whole of it.

Mr. KEARFUL (reading):

I give you herewith the key, of which I have duplicates. In any communications with Mr. Shanklin or myself, use the code words indicated. Mr. S. Brady will——

Mr. LIND. Which was the code name for Col. Martinez—— will leave on the train to-night. He must be received at the consulate as a fugitive if he desires, and it is my wish that he be provided accommodations on one of the warships at the earliest moment so as to relieve the consulate. He desires to go to the United States. If he is short of funds the consul may advance him $150 gold and charge to my account. It is very important that he be kept safely as he would undoubtedly be executed if caught. His identification is given in the letter from Mr. Shanklin, which I have herewith. Also he will present the other half of the slip attached to the key.

Does that indicate to you that the letter previously called to your attention had been received by you?

Mr. LIND. As I said before, I have no recollection of that, but I do recollect—may I see the balance of that letter—I do recollect something about code words suggested by Shanklin. (After examining letter:) That is not what you read before.

Mr. KEARFUL. "I give you herewith the key"?

This is a letter or purports to be a copy of a letter signed by you.

Mr. LIND. But you read us some letter of mine something besides this, did you not?

Mr. KEARFUL. No, sir.

Mr. LIND. I think there is no question but that I wrote a letter like this to Mr. Canada. As I said, the whole thing came up in a hurry and I was leaving. This letter reads:

The Mr. Hall referred to in the key is a Mormon elder, who called on me a week or 10 days ago, and is a thoroughly trustworthy man. I expect that Brady will arrive to-night. If not, these directions will suffice.

Then I add here:

Generally, during my absence or until you hear from me to the contrary, I would suggest the following:

That Consul Canada forward to the State Department, under his signature, such information from time to time as to him seems proper. Any confidential matter that he thinks might be handled through me to better advantage than to go on the files of the State Department he can forward in code to me addressed in care of the Department of State. I will then have the message decoded for my use. This is merely by way of suggestion, as I know Mr. Canada's good judgment will dictate the proper action to be taken in all cases.

Mr. KEARFUL. Governor, you have a distinct recollection, have you, that your own dealings with Hall and Martinez were in reference to supplying food and provisions for suffering Zapatistas?

Mr. LIND. No. I did not know what they wanted. I wanted to learn what they had to suggest. I was willing, the men having come so highly recommended or vouched for rather by Shanklin, and I wanted to find out. You see, when I wrote this I had not seen the man, I had not been in touch with him, and when I did learn what his mission was, that was the end of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any dealings with this gentleman looking to assistance for the Zapatistas to enter Mexico City and overthrow Huerta?

Mr. LIND. No, sir; never.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will call your attention to what purports to be a copy of a telegram sent by you to the State Department on April 6, 1914.

Mr. LIND. I will not discuss any telegram that I may have sent to the State Department. The original of every telegram that I sent to the State Department is undoubtedly there, and I will join with you in calling for any telegrams or communications of mine that you may wish to see.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is very good of you, and we will take advantage of that. But I wish to call your attention to this, in order to refresh your recollection, if possible, in regard to the dealings you had with Arnold Shanklin and Hall and Martinez.

Since cabling last night I have received additional information and feel absolutely certain in my own mind that it is vital to the situation in the South and to the pacification of that section that the gentleman now in the consulate be taken care of. I earnestly urge that it be done and that specific directions be given for the admiral in the premises. The people represented by this man are giving full protection to all foreigners.

There is a fight on at Tampico. An attack in force was made last night. Mr. Hall, whom I mentioned in my last night's telegram and who came down from Mexico City yesterday, reports a regular reign of terror.

Does that bring to your mind any other relationship than that of supplying the Zapatistas with provisions?

Mr. LIND. There was no other, and no other in view. I say there it is for the pacification. There were excesses reported from all sides, Tampico and elsewhere, and of course my hope, in so far as I have reflected upon it, as I said a moment ago, was that if we could get in touch with the Zapatistas and possibly restrain or exercise an influence to restrain their excesses, it would be desirable.

Mr. KEARFUL. You regarded the exercise of something to restrain Huerta as being most desirable, did you not?

Mr. LIND. What do you mean?

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean to put Huerta out of the presidency of Mexico.

Mr. LIND. No, sir—oh, at that time I had become satisfied that it was only a matter of weeks, hardly months, that he would be eliminated, not that I was attempting to do anything to bring it about, but I knew it was inevitable and I did want to take any precautions that we could so that when the collapse came we could exercise some ameliorating influence. I felt that if we could get in touch with the Zapatistas along the lines that I indicated a month ago—and I think I discussed it with Consul Canada—it would be very desirable.

Mr. KEARFUL. You thought that Zapata and his forces would be the important factor in bringing about the downfall of Huerta?

Mr. LIND. Not at all. What I feared was that they would be a firebrand and perhaps when the thing broke indulge in excesses that would be savage and brutal. I confess that I was as much surprised as anyone when I heard about their comparatively peaceful entry into Mexico City. I apprehended more menace to life and property, and everything that calls for possession from the Zapatistas when the break came than from any other source, and it was with that in view that I had discussed the matter with our military attaché and with Consul Canada, and with naval officers, what we might and could do to protect Mexico City in that emergency.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were aware that Martinez was a colonel in Huerta's army, if he was?

Mr. LIND. I was not.

Mr. KEARFUL. In order to refresh your recollection on that point, I will refer to what purports to be a copy of a telegram sent by you to Secretary Bryan in explanation of the previous one to which I have just referred:

The Mexican referred to in my recent letter and telegrams sought asylum in the consulate to-night. He did not come at my suggestion or with my knowledge. He is undoubtedly in imminent danger. Hall came with him. I am informed that he holds an honorary commission of colonel in the army but not under pay. Admiral Fletcher is of opinion that the facts do not justify asylum. What do you direct?

Does that refresh your recollection as to the point about him being a colonel in Huerta's army?

Mr. LIND. No; but I have no recollection that I ever looked upon him as—I knew nothing about the man. That evidently is a copy of a dispatch that I sent because it is my language, but that is absolutely all the recollection that I have. I had never heard of the man until the last day or two that I was in Vera Cruz, when this man Hall came to me and detailed the terrible situation of the Zapatistas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was Hall? What was his mission in Mexico?

Mr. LIND. I have not seen him since that period. My recollection is that he lived in Mexico a great many years. As I said, he was a Mormon elder, and I think there was a Mormon settlement at Cuernavaca at one time, of which he was a member. Anyway, he kept a hotel that had been frequented by Americans and the Mexicans at Cuernavaca for a great many years. He was an honest-looking prepossessing, kindly old man and impressed me as very sincere and very desirous to help the poor Zapatistas.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he present to you any credential from Secretary Bryan?

Mr. LIND. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. He did not claim to be a representative of the State Department?

Mr. LIND. Not at all. The only thing he presented to me was the letter from Shanklin, the letter of introduction. The contents of that letter I do not recall. Oh, no; he never purported to know or represent Mr. Bryan, and I do not recall that he ever spoke of Mr. Bryan as knowing him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. George S. Carothers, whom you know, testified before the committee that this same man Hall claimed to be a representative of the State Department assigned to Zapata in the same manner that he, Carothers, was assigned to Villa and Silliman to Carranza. Do you know anything about that?

Mr. LIND. No; I am free to say that I take any statement that that gentleman makes with a grain of salt.

Mr. KEARFUL. You referred to Mr. Murray as having given you some facts about what has occurred in Mexico. Do you mean Robert H. Murray?

Mr. LIND. I do—no, not detailed facts, but I remember very distinctly asking him about what occurred and he expressed to me great surprise at the excesses and disturbances that were in existence.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that this same Robert H. Murray wrote a series of articles which were published in Harper's Weekly, in which he very bitterly attacked the character and official acts of Ambassador Henry Lane Wilson?

Mr. LIND. I never saw those articles. I saw one of them, I think, but I never read or saw them. You see, I was West at home when they were published. I heard about them later and tried to get a copy at one time, but did not succeed.

Mr. KEARFUL. In those articles Robert H. Murray charged Ambassador Wilson with having been in the conspiracy with Huerta to overthrow Madero and that the assassination of Madero was with his knowledge and approval. That was it in substance. Do you remember something about that?

Mr. LIND. No; I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that immediately after the last installment of this article was printed, Harper's Weekly suspended and that Henry Lane Wilson brought suit for libel against Norman Hapgood?

Mr. LIND. I do not know anything about it. I did hear about that libel suit having been brought.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you hear the result of it?

Mr. LIND. No; I did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never heard that Norman Hapgood confessed judgment?

Mr. LIND. No; I never heard it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have occasion to make similar charges against Ambassador Wilson?

Mr. LIND. No, sir; I never did.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do have knowledge that you were reported in the newspapers to have made such charges against him?

Mr. LIND. No; not similar charges to that. I do not recall what the newspaper report was, but it was not such as you have read. But really, what has that to do with this inquiry, Mr. Kearful. I mean any possible controversy that may have existed between Mr. Wilson and myself? It is not my purpose to comment on anything that he has done, and newspaper reports of what I may have said about him or he may have said about me are really immaterial to this inquiry and I would very much prefer that you would not question me about those things.

Mr. KEARFUL. The charge against our ambassador to Mexico was that he was concerned in the overthrow of the existing Government and had knowledge and consented to the assassination of the president of the country, bears very strongly upon the attitude perhaps of the administration and strongly upon the position taken by the administration toward Ambassador Wilson and his reports of the situation, ultimately bearing upon the policy that was adopted and followed in Mexico.

Mr. LIND. I do not care to discuss Mr. Wilson or his official acts or to pass judgment upon anything that he may have said or done. I must respectfully decline.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was reported in the newspapers of Minneapolis, or a newspaper of Minneapolis, on November 21, 1915, that you had made a speech in which you were quoted as saying that "Madero was murdered by Huerta with the knowledge and consent of Henry Lane Wilson, the United States Ambassador." Do you remember that?

Mr. LIND. I told you I remembered that and that the report was inaccurate. I made no such statement. But I do not care to discuss that question, and out of justice to Mr. Wilson, who is not here, and myself, I must decline, because I do not think it pertinent to anything that the committee is investigating.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Wilson testified before the committee that you were reported to have made such a statement and that you disavowed it, that you gave him a letter of disavowal under threat of a lawsuit.

Mr. LIND. No; I did not disavow the statement that I made, but I disavowed making a statement as reported. Really I do not see how that throws any light upon the subject, what Mr. Wilson may think of me or what views I may have of him or might have had in regard to him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you believe Henry Lane Wilson was in any way concerned with the plot to overthrow Madero or had any knowledge of or consented to his assassination?

Mr. LIND. I prefer not to discuss that.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been reported that that was very firmly fixed as a fact in the mind of President Wilson, and if so it would be a very unfortunate thing, if not true, I therefore ask you whether you believed that report?

Mr. LIND. Would it not be better to ask the President as to his opinions than to try to get at his opinions by asking me?

Mr. KEARFUL. I am asking your opinion because—

Mr. LIND (interrupting). My opinion is utterly immaterial.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are a witness before the committee and President Wilson can not be summoned.

Mr. LIND. I shall decline to discuss Ambassador Wilson or his official acts. They are a matter of record in the State Department. They speak for themselves. I have never made a statement concerning Ambassador Wilson that was not based upon his own language and his own reports, and do not intend to.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the Minneapolis paper of March 10, 1916, you were reported to have declared that the Columbus raid by Villa was "undoubtedly inspired and financed by interests" in the United States. Did you make any such statement as that?

Mr. LIND. When was that statement?

Mr. KEARFUL. March 10, 1916.

Mr. LIND. I have no recollection of it. What paper does it purport to have appeared in?

Mr. KEARFUL. I have only a memorandum of the dispatch from Minneapolis, Minn.

Mr. LIND. I have no recollection of making any such statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. You remember the Columbus raid by Villa?

Mr. LIND. Oh, yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never did think, did you, that it was inspired and financed by interests in the United States?

Mr. LIND. Not the raid as such, but I do think that a great deal of activity hostile to the Mexican Government has been inspired and financed directly and indirectly from this side.

Mr. KEARFUL. The hostility toward the Mexican Government represented by Huerta was inspired also from this side, was it not?

Mr. LIND. Probably.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was assisted from this side, was it not?

Mr. LIND. Not that I have ever heard of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it not officially assisted from this side?

Mr. LIND. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember what is known as the Niagara conference?

Mr. LIND. I knew nothing about that conference.

Mr. KEARFUL. I simply call that to your memory as an historical event.

Mr. LIND. Yes, I remember it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the incident of the ship known as the Antilla, which sailed from this country for Tampico with munitions of war for the constitutionalists at that time?

Mr. LIND. I do not. I never heard of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the circumstance that while the Niagara conference was in progress, which was a conference between representatives of Huerta and representatives of this Government, it was agreed by our administration that no arms or ammunition would be sent or allowed to be sent from this country to the enemies of Huerta while the negotiations were in progress? Do you remember that circumstance?

Mr. LIND. No, sir; I do not. I do not recall that I ever heard of it if it was a fact.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you recall the fact that an embargo was placed upon the shipment of arms and ammunition to Mexico under authority of Congress?

Mr. LIND. There were embargoes placed, but when or for what length of time I have no recollection. I think the document to which I called your attention this morning indicates that the President proposed to take that action, but when that embargo was actually announced and whether or when it went into effect, or whether or when it was vacated, I have no knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the President's address to which you have just referred he said:

I deem it my duty to exercise the authority conferred upon me by the law of March 14, 1912, to see to it that neither side to the struggle now going on in Mexico receive any assistance from this side of the border. I shall follow the best practices of nations in the matter of neutrality by forbidding the exportation of arms or munitions of war of any kind from the United States to any part of the Republic of Mexico, a policy suggested by several interesting precedents. * * *

Do you know whether that declaration was scrupulously followed?

Mr. LIND. I do not. I have no knowledge of the embargo or of its execution.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you personally give any assurance to the constitutionalists or advise them how to evade the embargo that was laid by the President?

Mr. LIND. I did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that this Niagara conference was after June, 1914?

Mr. LIND. About that time. I do not remember the date.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that in June, 1914, the New York Herald published a series of articles beginning with what was known as the Hopkins letters?

Mr. LIND. No; I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the New York Herald of June 30, 1914, was published a facsimile letter addressed to Carranza by Mr. Hopkins, in which he makes this statement, his letter being dated May 8, 1914:

Mr. Lind told me recently, and as he has subsequently intimated to Mr. Villareal, that in case it was found impracticable to permit the exportation of war material that you should arrange to export such as was needed from some port on the Gulf, preferably Mobile or Pensacola, in small vessels to Cuba, which upon their arrival at some port on that island might alter their course to the mouth of the Rio Bravo. I have discussed the matter with Mr. Santiago Winfield, who knows the country in that locality and who informs me that large schooners or steamers of moderate size can approach within half a mile of a place called "Barril," a few miles south of the mouth of the river, where the cargo could be easily landed in launches. Mr. Lind assured me very positively that there would be no interference whatsoever with shipments made in this way, and in case Tampico is not taken I respectfully invite your special attention to the matter.

Mr. LIND. I never had any such conversation with the gentleman. I wish to say further that the first days after my arrival in Washington on my return from Mexico Mr. Bryan cautioned me that I should have no intercourse with this gentleman, that he had been superseded as representing the constitutionalists' cause in the city of Washington, and stating that he had refused to have any intercourse with him and the department, and I scrupulously observed that suggestion.

Mr. KEARFUL. He had been superseded by Mr. Charles A. Douglas ?

Mr. LIND. Yes, that is my understanding.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Bryan was having intercourse with the representative of Carranza and expected you to do the same. Is that true ?

Mr. LIND. No. He suggested to me that if I had any information that could be of service to Mr. Douglas, if I could make any suggestions to Mr. Douglas that would induce the Carrancistas element to participate in the conference, he would be glad if I would cooperate with Douglas in that behalf, and he fixed a time, as I recall it, for Mr. Douglas to call on me and I had several conferences with Mr. Douglas and we strove to induce all the constitutionalists, as they were represented here, to participate in that conference.

Mr. KEARFUL. But Mr. Hopkins's statement in the letter just referred to with reference to your suggestion and advice was absolutely untrue ?

Mr. LIND. It is untrue.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know Mr. W. F. Buckley ?

Mr. LIND. Your former partner in New Mexico ?

Mr. KEARFUL. No. I was associated with him, but he was not my partner.

Mr. LIND. I think I met him once, possibly more times, but I have no distinct recollection of him. I recollect the name.

Mr. KEARFUL. He testified before the committee and related the incident of the boat Antilla that I referred to a moment ago. Do you remember meeting him here at the time of the Niagara conference ?

Mr. LIND. I can not say.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were here at that time ?

Mr. LIND. I was there at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. In consultation with Mr. Douglas and Mr. Bryan ?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. He said on page 793 of his testimony:

Mr. Lind stated generally that while no more Antilla incidents would occur, the revolutionaries had arranged to get all the arms and ammunition they wanted; that this would be accomplished by having ships take out their papers to Habana and then go to Tampico; and that the American Government had consented to the evasion. I immediately called on Mr. Bryan and asked him if this were true, and he stated that it was. Mr. Bryan stated that these ships would take out papers to Habana, and that the American Government would have no official knowledge that they were going to Tampico; that if, after they got out in the Gulf, they diverted their course, the American Government would have nothing to do with it, or, as Mr. Bryan insisted, the American Government would have no official knowledge.

Mr. LIND. Of course I can not say what Mr. Bryan said.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you say about what you said ?

Mr. LIND. I certainly never made any such suggestion myself. I recall that there was talk, whether by Mr. Buckley or some one else, and my attention about that time was called to a scheme of that character. I recall that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether that scheme was carried out ?

Mr. LIND. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Buckley goes on further to testify as follows:

Mr. Lind's and Mr. Bryan's words were made good. On June 6 a million cartridges were shipped on the steamship Sunshine from Galveston to Tampico. Thereafter the schooners Sunshine, Grampus, and Susan made six trips from Galveston to Tampico, each time carrying shipments of war materials to the Carranza revolutionaries; all these boats, according to the speech of Representative Rogers, previously referred to, were consigned to Habana, but "by stress of weather they were blown to Tampico."

Mr. LIND. I have absolutely no knowledge of any of that.

Mr. KEARFUL. No knowledge of any of this matter?

Mr. LIND. No, sir; but I do not deny that I heard rumors, either about that time or afterwards, that some such scheme had been worked or planned by the constitutionalists.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know an attorney who formerly was located in Mexico City named Burton W. Wilson?

Mr. LIND. I know a Wilson, but I do not recall his initials. He is a gentleman who was pretty closely associated with that Jew banker, whose name I do not recall.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean Emil Beck?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. That is the same man. I did not know that Beck was a Jew, however.

Mr. LIND. That is the understanding that I had. It may be that I am mistaken.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember meeting this lawyer, Burton Wilson, in Washington?

Mr. LIND. I remember meeting him, I think, in the Willard Hotel; but the time I can not fix.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it about the time that the question of the recognition of Carranza was being agitated?

Mr. LIND. I should not be surprised.

Mr. KEARFUL. About the time that the Pan-American conference was sitting?

Mr. LIND. I can not say, but I recollect very distinctly meeting Mr. Wilson. I knew him rather pleasantly in Mexico—slightly, of course.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember that there was a conference called by this Government in conjunction with six South American countries, called the A, B, C, and B, U, G, conference?

Mr. LIND. Certainly.

Mr. KEARFUL. That shortly following the close of that conference or at the close of that conference Carranza was recognized as de facto head of the Mexican Government?

Mr. LIND. I do not remember the date now, but I know that he was recognized subsequent to that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do remember having a conversation with Burton Wilson at the Willard Hotel about that time?

Mr. LIND. I remember meeting him. I do not remember the topic of our conversation. I remember very distinctly meeting Wilson because I was glad to see him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you meet Mr. Buckley at the same time that you met Mr. Wilson?

Mr. LIND. I can not say. I do not recall Mr. Buckley at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. He testified further——

Mr. LIND (interrupting). Who, Wilson or Buckley?

Mr. KEARFUL. Buckley, at page 812 of the printed hearings of the committee:

In Washington, in a conversation that took place during the Pan American conference, when it was reported that the United States would not recognize Carranza, Mr. Lind exclaimed to the chairman of the International Committee of Mexico City——

That was Burton Wilson——

My God, poor Mexico will fall back into the clutches of the Catholic Church.

Do you remember any such conversation?

Mr. LIND. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you give expression to any such sentiment?

Mr. LIND. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever give expression to any such sentiment?

Mr. LIND. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you ever at all apprehensive about the influence of the church upon Mexican affairs?

Mr. LIND. Only as I stated this morning. What poor Mexico needs is education, schools, and to the extent that the church in Mexico opposes public schools I think it is very unfortunate policy, and I think the same policy in the United States very unfortunate. I think it is the only salvation of our institutions and our Government, the maintenance and furtherance and the equipment of our public schools.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that the influence of the Catholic Church in Mexico is such as to prevent the establishment of public schools?

Mr. LIND. As to that, I have no opinion as to the extent of its influence, but I think in so far as it can exercise any influence it is not in the direction of either establishing or sustaining public schools. To that extent I differ with the policy of the church, or any other church or any other institution.

Mr. KEARFUL. But you never made that statement?

Mr. LIND. I never made that statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not?

Mr. LIND. I absolutely did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Buckley further testified, on the same page:

In private conversation Mr. Lind attributed all the ills of Mexico to the influence of the Catholic Church and argued that this institution in Mexico must be destroyed.

Is there any truth in that?

Mr. LIND. No, sir; there is not. There is no truth in it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never entertained such sentiments and never expressed them?

Mr. LIND. That the Catholic Church in Mexico or any other place should be destroyed? No; I never entertained any such sentiment and never expressed it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You never attributed the ills of Mexico to the influence of the Catholic Church?

Mr. LIND. No, sir. I have said, and I believe now, that if the church had been better disposed toward popular education, the education of the masses, it would have been better for Mexico and better for the church.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any knowledge of the treatment accorded the priests and nuns and to church property by the victorious Constitutionalists armies?

Mr. LIND. No. I have seen reports in the papers, but I have no knowledge. I have seen the claims and the denials of both sides, but I have no information on which I can express any opinion.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the date of your leaving Vera Cruz the last time?

Mr. LIND. I do not recall the date. It was about this time of the year.

Mr. CANADA. I think it was in May, but I am not sure.

Mr. LIND. It was a little later than this, I think about the 1st of May, but I am not prepared to say.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were not there at any time when refugee priests and nuns came through Vera Cruz?

Mr. LIND. I never saw them that I recall.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were there after the taking of Vera Cruz by our forces, were you not?

Mr. LIND. No, sir. That occurred very shortly after I arrived in Washington.

Mr. CANADA. They took Vera Cruz on the 21st day of April.

Mr. LIND. Then it was earlier than this that I left Vera Cruz. It must have been about the middle of April. I recall that the season was advanced about the same as it is now.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if you know, was the reason for the President's order to take Vera Cruz?

Mr. LIND. I do not know the reason. I do not know that he issued any such order and I can not discuss that question.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were in Washington at the time, were you not?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were called in consultation about it, were you not?

Mr. LIND. Not about the taking of Vera Cruz. I never had heard a suggestion made in regard to taking Vera Cruz until I read it in the press.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever make a report to President Wilson to the effect that the inhabitants of Vera Cruz would welcome the landing of American forces for the purpose of ousting the usurper?

Mr. LIND. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you entertain that feeling or that sentiment?

Mr. LIND. I did not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not believe that the American forces would be welcomed by the Mexicans?

Mr. LIND. I never made any such report. That thing never occurred to me that I have any recollection of, but I do not propose to discuss what I may have reported to the State Department, for two reasons. My reports, so far as I am concerned, were confidential, and, in the second place, they were in writing and the reports speak for themselves. But I answered offhand and said that I have no recollection of ever making any such report to any one.

Mr. KEARFUL. Apart from your reports, did you believe that the Mexicans would welcome the taking of Vera Cruz?

Mr. LIND. I did not. I believed that all Mexicans saw the possibility of intervention, and they do now. If there is any feeling in Mexico against Americans, as it has been suggested here, of which I saw very little, except possibly individual instances, it is because the Mexican people live in the dread and fear of a possibility of intervention and absorbing of their country and blotting out their nationality.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you regard the taking of Vera Cruz as intervention?

Mr. LIND. No, I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why not, since it was the landing of American forces on Mexican soil?

Mr. LIND. How or why Vera Cruz came to be taken, whether there were orders to that effect or what the circumstances were, I do not know. I do know that it was reported and understood that Huerta's officials had insulted the American flag, and I do know that Huerta had refused to make amends. In that situation under the law of nations it was perfectly competent for our Government to take such action as it deemed commensurate with the indignity, the offense.

Mr. KEARFUL. The apology demanded was a salute to the American flag, was it not?

Mr. LIND. I do not recall what the apology was.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not recall whether the taking of Vera Cruz resulted in a salute of the flag, do you?

Mr. LIND. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. It did operate as a very great factor in the elimination of Huerta, did it not?

Mr. LIND. I can not say. I was not there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Vera Cruz was one of the principal ports of Mexico?

Mr. LIND. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. The cut off of receipts from that port and the business flowing through that port would naturally have some effect on Huerta's ability to maintain himself, would it not?

Mr. LIND. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that that had anything to do with the decision to take Vera Cruz?

Mr. LIND. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were in Washington and in frequent consultation with Judge Douglas, the attorney for Carranza, for some time before the recognition of Carranza in October, 1915, were you not?

Mr. LIND. Yes. On several occasions I came down here.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was your interest in the matter of the recognition of Carranza at that time?

Mr. LIND. Not the slightest, except as I told you this morning. I was anxious that the Mexican situation should be settled, as a matter of personal pride for one thing; that is, I would like to see peace in Mexico. Then I was very anxious on account of the pendency of the European war to see that sore spot out of the way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had your relations with President Wilson in reference to your mission to Mexico then terminated?

Mr. LIND. Oh, yes; it had terminated in June, 1914. I continued to stay at Mr. Brvan's request until, I think, about the 18th of June, and then I told him that I could not remain any longer or did not wish to; that I must get back home, and he said he would confer with the President, which he did, and reported to me in a day or two, I think the next day, that it would be all right.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you employed by Carranza to assist in his recognition?

Mr. LIND. Never.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you see Carranza after the termination of your relations with President Wilson?

Mr. LIND. I saw Carranza. Whether it was in the fall of 1914 or 1915 I do not remember—I think it was in the fall of 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. Some time prior to the recognition of Carranza, was it not?

Mr. LIND. I think it was afterwards. It was after the recognition I am very sure.

It was late in the fall, and I can tell you the circumstances and how I came to see him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Very well, will you kindly do so?

Mr. LIND. What was the name of the first Mexican ambassador here?

Mr. KEARFUL. Arredondo?

Mr. LIND. Yes. I met Arredondo and rather liked him. I was up in the northern part of my State shooting with my son in the fall and got a long telegram forwarded to me out in the woods from Mr. Arredondo requesting me without fail to meet him at Piedras Negras on the border. I wired him that I could not come. Then he asked me as a personal favor to come and offered to pay my railroad fare and expenses. He sent a second telegram, so I went on and met him on the American side. He told me in the second telegram that Mr. Carranza was to be there and he was very anxious to meet me.

So I went down and Mr. Arredondo made arrangements for me to go across the river and see Carranza the next day, which I did.

On the way down I had read in the papers in the headlines that there had been trouble between Obregon and Carranza, that one had caused the arrest of the other, and I remember when I was ushered into the room where the two gentlemen were, they were standing at the table, I could not help laughing. I greeted them and asked them laughingly which one of them was under arrest, and they both laughed.

I had a long talk with Mr. Carranza on that occasion, the only time that I have seen him. What he was particularly anxious to see me about was to learn whether the American papers represented the real sentiment of the American people toward Mexico, whether it was true—I am trying to quote his language now—"Whether it was true that the people of the United States were as hostile in fact against Mexico and Mexican matters in general as the press would indicate." I assured them no, that "It is my judgment that on the part of the masses of the people of the United States there is nothing but the friendliest feeling, a feeling of a neighbor and a real disposition if they knew you to be of service to their Mexican neighbors." I deplored the matter of acquaintance and suggested that it would be well for the future of the two nations if there could be better acquaintance, better mingling of the people, business and professional men, international visits back and forth and exchanges of students.

Mr. KEARFUL. In your connection with the Mexican situation, did you ever have occasion to learn anything about the operations in Yucatan?

Mr. LIND. Very little.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you become acquainted with an institution over there called the Reguladora?

Mr. LIND. No.

Mr. KEARFUL. Which was a company formed for the purpose of stabilizing by means of manipulating the market in sisal hemp, which is used by the farmers for binding twine?

Mr. LIND. I had never heard about it while I was in Mexico and knew absolutely nothing about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you had any connection with that company?

Mr. LIND. Never in the slightest degree. My son, who lives in New York, through his acquaintance with a gentleman whose name

I can not recall, did some work for the gentleman in charge of the Reguladora business in New York, but I knew nothing about his undertaking that work until some two or three weeks after he had entered upon it. He collected statistics of consumption of binder twine and where it was manufactured and of the use of sisal in the United States.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know by whom he was employed?

Mr. LIND. He was employed by a doctor——

Mr. KEARFUL. Dr. Rendon?

Mr. LIND. Yes, Dr. Rendon of New York.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was this?

Mr. LIND. I can not give you the date now. It might have been in 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was as late as that?

Mr. LIND. I think so, and possibly in 1916—1916 or 1917.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was while Gen. Salvador Alvarado was operating in Yucatan?

Mr. LIND. That I can not tell you. Dr. Rendon, in some connection, after he had collected statistics here, wanted him to go to the Philippines and make a careful report on the production of manila and fibers of that country, which he did.

Mr. KEARFUL. About the time of the period when you were here in Washington before the recognition of Carranza in 1915, a number of newspapers reported that you were here working for Carranza, and more or less broadly intimated that you were being paid by Carranza. You state you were never employed and never received any pay from him?

Mr. LIND. No, sir. Mr. Douglas asked me to join with him. But I did not think that I would under any circumstances feel justified in accepting a retainer, just the same as scores of people came to me who had claims against the Mexican Government. I refused in every instance to become identified with them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Douglas offered you a retainer and you refused him?

Mr. LIND. No; I can not say that he offered me a retainer, but he wanted me formally to assist them for compensation.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did assist him, but received no compensation?

Mr. LIND. I received no compensation. I assisted him. Later, in 1915 he paid my expenses on some trips when I came down, two or three times, just the same as Mr. Arredondo paid my expenses, or my railroad fare only on my trip to the border.

Mr. KEARFUL. It has also been stated by a member of the United States Senate that a copy of what purported to be a pay roll of the Mexican Embassy, at the time Arredondo was here, was shown to him which contained your name as being on the pay roll.

Mr. LIND. That was an error.

Mr. KEARFUL. If your name did appear on such a pay roll, it was improperly placed there? Is that true?

Mr. LIND. Except as I told you that Mr. Douglas paid my expenses.

Mr. KEARFUL. It may possibly have appeared in that connection?

Mr. LIND. In that connection. I can not say.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not remember the amounts that you received?

Mr. LIND. No; I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. I will ask you if you have any opinion which you care to express in reference to what the policy of this Government ought to be or what ought to be done by this Government in reference to Mexico in the present situation?

Mr. LIND. I do not know what the present situation is. The only well-defined opinion I have is that it behooves us, a great powerful neighbor of a weak nation, to be patient and to not judge them by the same standards or measure that we judge England or France or Canada in regard to not complying with the conditions and demands of international intercourse. As I said, we ought to be patient and aid and assist them wherever we can and as much as possible.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that policy of patience should extend to refraining from insistence upon the rights of Americans in Mexico for protection for their property and for their lives?

Mr. LIND. No; I do not; of course I do not; but I do not think that the best protection can be afforded by intervention nor by warlike action on our part at any time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Suppose that during a series of years—say, five years—acts of atrocity, murders, robbery, arson, persecution in every conceivable form, have gone on to the ruin of 30,000 or more of our citizens in Mexico; that protests have frequently been made in the strongest sort of language and have been disregarded time after time and those things are getting worse; what would you do eventually, and where would you do it?

Mr. LIND. I have not reflected on that. It is not for me——

Mr. KEARFUL. That is what the testimony shows.

Mr. LIND. I think that statement, Mr. Kearful, is exaggerated. While conditions are bad and while many individuals have suffered in life and property, much of that is owing to like conditions of crime and violence in our own country. You can not take up a paper without reading about criminality and bank robbers and hold-ups at night and in broad daylight. These unfortunate incidents are occurring more frequently the world over just at this time than they have within my memory.

Mr. KEARFUL. You do not ever read of those things occurring at the hands of generals in our Army or high officials of the Government, do you?

Mr. LIND. Oh, no; certainly I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. How would you insist upon the protection of American rights in Mexico if your strongest representations were disregarded? What would you then do?

Mr. LIND. It is a very different problem to solve by any hard and fast rule or any theoretical course of conduct. We can defend the people along the border and in the seaport towns without any difficulty, but if the individual American is in the center of Mexico or in the middle of the continent, for us in every instance to send military protection for him and his property means the occupation of that country, and I think that the occupation of Mexico by American troops at this time or at any time, but more particularly at this time, would be as disastrous to us as it would to Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. This committee has been enjoined by resolution of the Senate unanimously adopted to investigate and recommend what should be done to avoid the recurrence of the outrages that have been committed in Mexico, and the testimony shows that these outrages have extended over a period of at least six years, and they have grown; that Americans have no rights at all except what they pay for by way of graft, and that repeated representations by this Government have been entirely disregarded to such an extent that a representation was made now by an official in Mexico with levity. That is the testimony.

Mr. LIND. I believe that testimony is exaggerated. Conditions are bad, but I do not think that testimony is true.

Mr. KEARFUL. Assuming that the testimony is true——

Mr. LIND. That is a condition of affairs that I have not reflected on and would not assume to answer.

Mr. KEARFUL. If this Government is going to insist that the rights of its citizens in Mexico should receive protection and it can not get protection by diplomatic representation and repeatedly during a series of years those representations are disregarded, do you see anything to do but to resort to force?

Mr. LIND. There may come a time that that is inevitable, but I do not think we can afford to ignore the unfortunate situation that has confronted the Mexican people in the last 8 or 10 years that we have been discussing.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you mean when you expressed the alternative that unless Carranza is recognized, intervention is inevitable?

Mr. LIND. I felt that there would be absolute chaos in Mexico, there would be no government, no authority, no organized form of society at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think there is now?

Mr. LIND. Yes; I do. It may be crude, it may be inefficient in places, but people are traveling back and forth.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know how they are traveling on the railways?

Mr. LIND. No; I have not been over the railways, but a friend of mine, an old neighbor of mine, went to Mexico City short time ago with his wife and wrote to his family. I saw the letters. He spoke of it as a very delightful journey. He stopped at Monterey and spent a couple of days there and then went on to Mexico City. Then they planned to go from Mexico City to Vera Cruz and back to New York by steamer.

Mr. KEARFUL. You have not heard any accounts about travel on any other lines except those from Laredo to Mexico and from Mexico City to Vera Cruz?

Mr. LIND. No; I have not. I have not interested myself at all in Mexican matters. All I know about the situation in Mexico is what is common knowledge and what appears in the papers and general conversations.

Mr. KEARFUL. I hope that the testimony that has been taken by this committee may become a matter of common knowledge, so that if there is any general idea that there is a real government in Mexico that is maintaining peaceful conditions, that idea will be corrected, and I hope you will read the testimony.

Mr. LIND. I shall be grateful to you for sending me a copy of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further that you would like to state to the committee?

Mr. LIND. I do not know of anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee is obliged to you.

Mr. LIND. Thank you.

(Thereupon, at 7.30 o'clock p. m. the committee adjourned.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

MONDAY, MAY 10, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to call, at 11 o'clock a. m., in room 128, Senate Office Building, Senator Albert B. Fall, presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

TESTIMONY OF HON. FRANKLIN K. LANE.

(The witness was duly sworn by the chairman.)

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please give your full name to the reporter?

Mr. LANE. Franklin K. Lane.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, what official position with the United States Government have you held during the last few years until a recent date?

Mr. LANE. Recently, until the last couple of months, I was Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. As Secretary of the Interior have you been and are you now familiar with the laws of the United States relating to the public domain?

Mr. LANE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had anything to do with shaping the policy of the United States with reference to its public domain during your incumbency of that office?

Mr. LANE. I have made recommendations to committees of Congress and to the President with respect to that policy.

The CHAIRMAN. Following your recommendations, has legislation been enacted along the lines suggested by you and along other lines?

Mr. LANE. There has been legislation along those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Has your attention at any time been called to the testimony of Mr. John Lind, taken before this committee at a recent hearing?

Mr. LANE. I saw his testimony as stated in the papers.

The CHAIRMAN. In answer to questions Mr. Lind testified as follows, the question leading up to it being:

Do you think that the oil companies have any just ground of complaint on that score?

That is, of the President's decrees with reference to the exploitation of oil lands in Mexico.

To which Mr. Lind answered:

In Mexico, the same as with us, originally the State owned all the minerals. You know, the Government of the United States owned all of the minerals, I think, until in the forties Congress released the minerals. We have recently—

That is, in the United States—

We have recently resumed the oil and coal and minerals of that character in the public lands. The State in Mexico owned the oil until some time during Diaz's administration, when Lord Cowdray discovered oil. Then they secured an act of the Mexican Congress relinquishing the State's claim to the oil and the real property.

The committee wants to direct your attention to Mr. Lind's statement, practically to the effect that the United States in resuming control or ownership of a claim of the oil in the public domain of this country was not only following the example of Mexico but was resuming the control of property which it had theretofore exercised control or ownership of, and apparently which it had not exercised such control of for some period of time. What has been the policy of the United States with reference to oil upon private lands in this country and oil upon public lands?

Mr. LANE. The policy of the United States with respect to oil upon private lands is that the oil goes with the surface. As to public lands, there has been no other policy until recently, when the Congress has seen fit to pass a law under which the Government will directly lease oil lands. It was only within the last month that that law has gone into effect, although it has been advocated for some seven or eight years.

The CHAIRMAN. The United States Government, to your knowledge, has not attempted by legislation, executive or administrative order, or action in any other way, to assume control as against the individual owners of the subsurface products of privately owned land?

Mr. LANE. Never.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Is that true also of the oil on the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The same policy?

Mr. LANE. The same policy. The Indians own the oil. All that the Government does is make leases as trustee for the Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. Even upon the Indian lands, if the United States desired to acquire the subsurface product—that is, the oil—it could only do so as any other purchaser?

Mr. LANE. Precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. Then Mr. Lind's statement is not accurate with reference to the policy or the law, is it?

Mr. LANE. No; Mr. Lind evidently was mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the laws of the United States are concerned or in so far as the policy is concerned?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar with the laws of Mexico and the old Spanish laws?

Mr. LANE. In a very rough and general way.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that we have a witness here who is thoroughly familiar with that subject.

What, in your judgment, Mr. Secretary, would be the effect of allowing to go out to the public unchallenged a statement such as made by Mr. Lind, as to informing or misinforming the people of the United States concerning the oil question, as we generally understand it between this country and Mexico?

Mr. LANE. Oh, I think the people of the United States are so generally familiar with the law as to public lands and private lands that much attention would not be paid to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The people are not generally familiar with Mexican law, though, are they?

Mr. LANE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So that when he undertakes to say that the Mexican creeds or laws are along the lines of the laws and policy of the United States such a statement, if allowed to go unchallenged, would create a false impression, would it not?

Mr. LANE. That statement might have that effect in Mexico, but not in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Might it not affect the public sentiment in the United States, as to feelings with Mexico, by creating an erroneous impression with reference to law, practice, and procedure in Mexico?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It would produce the impression, would it not, that if Mexico, by its decrees in relation to oil, was confiscating American rights that this Government would do the same?

Mr. LANE. Yes; it certainly would. I think this point ought to be clearly understood, Senator, that there never has been any protest made by anybody, so far as I ever heard, against Mexico or any other country following the policy that the United States is now pursuing, which is a policy of leasing its own national lands upon a royalty basis. There is an impression in the United States that the land held by American corporations has been obtained by grants similar to our large railroad grants in this country; that they have been given the lands by Mexico; whereas the fact is that Americans went to Mexico and bought their land from the private owners, and the title that they got carried with it the right to drill for oil. That is exactly as it has been and as it is in the United States.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You say there is a prevalent impression in this country that Americans got their oil rights in Mexico by a grant. The word ordinarily used instead of "grant" is "concession," is it not?

Mr. LANE. Yes; that is a word that has been misconstrued in this country.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. LANE. Because "concession," as we understand it, means something granted by the Government in the way of land, whereas the concessions that are made by the Mexican Government are simply an agreement that for a certain period those who introduced a new industry into Mexico would be relieved of taxation upon what they brought in or took out. That period, so far as we are concerned, long ago expired, and there was no land whatever obtained by concession or grant from the Mexican Government to the oil companies.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I have read quite a number of articles from time to time in magazines and newspapers to the general effect that those American citizens who went into the oil business in Mexico had, by corruption or other improper means, secured from the Mexican Government concessions for these oil rights, which they claimed to own, and that, having secured them corruptly, they are now engaged in an attempt to make the United States Government guarantee them in the peaceful possession of corruptly obtained rights. Have you read articles to that effect?

Mr. LANE. I have.

Senator BRANDEGEE. So the situation is, as you describe it, that Americans engaged in the oil business in Mexico went there and bought their oil rights from individual proprietors, just as they have done in this country, and are simply demanding that their rights as Americans be protected against confiscation by the Mexican Government. That places a different face upon the question with reference to these attacks to which I have referred, it seems to me. Does it not to you?

Mr. LANE. It does. The Americans who have gone into Mexico and have been complained of as you describe have done just as they would have done if they had gone into California; just as if a Pennsylvania oil driller had gone into California and bought a ranch and drilled his well. Under the laws of Mexico he had precisely the same title to the petroleum that is discovered upon that land as he would have in California.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Possibly I was mistaken, but I understood you to say there had been no protest made on account of violations by the Government of Mexico of these American oil rights. Did you mean there had been no protest made by the owners of those rights to the department, or no protest made by the State Department to the Mexican Government? I do not know whether I understood you correctly or not, but you did say something about protests, and I would like to have that made clear?

Mr. LANE. The point I was making was this: That we ought to be consistent in the United States, and that we are thoroughly consistent. We have no objection whatever to a law being enacted in Mexico or any other country by which they would take the lands that are still in public ownership, held by the Government, and lease those upon terms to the citizens or to any others; that that is the policy adopted in the United States as to the lands that still remain in the hands of the Government. And there was no protest whatever on the part of the oil men of the United States against such a policy being adopted by Mexico or any other country, but there was a serious protest against a policy being adopted by which the American owners, who had gone to Mexico, under Mexican laws, and obtained property, for which they had paid cash, from the individuals who owned the land, to having that property taken from them.

You said something a moment or two ago as to certain propaganda being presented to the country on this matter, and one of your points was that it was given out to the public that Americans had gone down there and obtained concessions of land from the Government, and that it was the policy of the Mexican Government itself to resume possession. Now, the fact is that the law under which these lands were obtained—remember always that these lands were purchased from private individuals—was a law passed by Mexico before there had been any discovery of petroleum in Mexico, recognizing the general principle that these lands, such as coal and asphalt and clay lands, were the exclusive property of their private owners. There was a more positive declaration in the Mexican law than there was at that time I believe in our own law that the petroleum lands were the exclusive property of the man who had the title.

Senator BRANDEGEE. My suggestion was also based to a certain extent upon what I had heard had been substantially the statements of Mr. Bryan, when he was Secretary of State, to American citizens who protested to the State Department against the lack of protection accorded to them and their property in Mexico, although it was stated that he had told parties making such protests that they had gone there voluntarily for the purpose of making money, had simply gone there to exploit the resources of Mexico, and as such were entitled to no protection by this Government; if they did not like the treatment, their business was to come back here.

I was trying to get at whether it was your notion that American citizens who went there and bought property, as you have described, as you have stated these oil men have done, from private people, and who are developing their own private property, were entitled to any protection from our Government?

Mr. LANE. Yes; they are entitled to protection; not only because of their own interests but because of our interests and the interests of the world in the development of those resources.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I do not know what line Senator Fall is going to inquire about, but this may be as good a place as any to ask this question:

What importance do you think the development of the Mexican oil fields has to this Government and to the necessities of our people? By that I mean the development of those oil fields by our citizens, and in our interests, rather than the development by some foreign interests.

Mr. LANE. Foreign interests other than Mexican, perhaps you mean?

Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. LANE. Of course, I would not contend for a moment that Mexico did not have the first claim on her own resources. She undoubtedly has, and there is no contention to the contrary so far as this Nation is concerned or our people; but we—who have gone in there and developed that property, discovered the oil there, found that Mexico had a resource of which she had no knowledge herself, and had invested our money in the development of that resource under the smile and approval of the Mexican Government—certainly will contend that she should allow that that product shall be used for the benefit of the United States, if that did not conflict with Mexican interests.

Now, we must have more oil in this country. Last year we produced 1,600,000 automobiles. We have got over 8,000,000 interior-combustion engines upon the lands of the United States. We have got to use oil in our merchant marine. What that demand will be two or three years hence is impossible to say, but an estimate has been made within the Shipping Board of a requirement of 100,000,000 barrels within four years. Our Navy has come to rely upon it. We are using 400,000,000 barrels a year in the United States; increasing rapidly. Last year we used between thirty and forty million barrels more than we produced. All of which means there has got to be an increase in the supply. We do not know where that is coming from within this country, although it is regarded as so serious a matter that Congress has hastened legislation to meet our need. There is a great supply along the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico. It is needed for the industries of this country. It is near to us. The geologists who have made a study of the maps of the world indicate there are two great bodies of oil; one near the eastern end of the Mediterranean, running from the Caucasus to the Persian Gulf and back to the Mediterranean; the other around the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico.

If we are to have a supply of oil immediately, and we have a great need arising immediately, we must get our supply from either one of those two sources. One is at hand, and is one in which American capital is interested. The other is distant, and no American capital, except to a very small extent, is interested. So that, if we are in a petroleum period in our power history, it is essential to us that the flow of oil from Mexico and other countries to the United States shall continue, for the development of our foreign trade and building up of our merchant marine, the upbuilding of our Navy and the development of our industries.

Senator BRANDEGEE. When you say you recognize the right of the first claim by Mexico to her own resources, I do not suppose you mean they have a right to confiscate that American capital that has been invested down there in oil enterprises without compensation?

Mr. LANE. No; hardly.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You mean, of course, that they have that right as to what they own, their public lands?

Mr. LANE. Yes; but I was talking generally of the product. They have undoubtedly the right to that.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Oh, yes.

Mr. LANE. And they have the right, I think, to protect themselves in the matter of seeing that their industries would have a sufficient supply.

The CHAIRMAN. By an embargo, or otherwise, if their national interests demanded.

Mr. LANE. Certainly.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I have seen a statement in the last few weeks, and it has been referred to on the floor of the Senate, as having been made by, I think, some Member of the British House of Commons, stating if not boasting of the fact, in reference to the oil fields that some of their companies had acquired in Mesopotamia and Syria and around the Mediterranean, and stating that we would soon have to call upon them for an enormous quantity of oil, and stating practically that they controlled the oil supply.

Mr. LANE. I have seen that statement.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It made me apprehensive, and upon the floor of the Senate, Senators commented upon the fact. I think Senator Jones, of Washington, in relation to the merchant marine shipping bill, referred to it, calling the attention of the country to the danger of that situation, and unless we get our own supply from the Gulf of Mexico base.

Mr. LANE. Our people in the United States, who are the pioneers in the oil business, who know how to drill oil wells and handle such property better than any other people alive—our people who are capable and who have the money are able and are willing to protect the United States in that respect. We can get the oil we need provided our people can be assured that in going to another country, where they acquire property under the laws of that country and in strict conformity with them, they will be protected. Protection of our rights is all we need. I do not know what statement you refer to, but I have seen various statements made by English authorities on that question of British control of the petroleum supply. I hope those statements are not true. I do not believe there is any reason why they should be true.

They have got possession pretty generally of the whole Persian field and the field extending from Persia to the Mediterranean, but there is a vast amount of territory that can be had to the south of the United States, upon terms perfectly fair to those people and agreeable to them, which will give us all the oil that we need, and we can get it if it is understood that the United States is sufficiently interested to see that no unfair thing is done to those people there, and that no unfair thing is done to us here.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I think the Democratic platform, either four or eight years ago, pledged the protection of the United States to its citizens and their property everywhere, and our platform did also.

Mr. LANE. No oil property has been actually taken from any American citizen that I know of, although efforts have been made in that direction, I believe.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I think the testimony before this committee shows that, whether property has been taken or not, the Government has forbidden those who have obtained the right to drill oil fields from drilling them.

Mr. LANE. That is true.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The use of the property, or the prevention of its proper use, is the equivalent to its confiscation.

Mr. LANE. Very true.

Senator BRANDEGEE. This has been more or less of a diversion. I think Senator Fall desired to examine on another branch.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I had concluded the examination. I have been very much interested in the examination as it proceeded.

You speak of the claims of Great Britain. This oil field, as far as it is developed around the Gulf and the Caribbean Sea, is known to extend to the Island of Trinidad, off the coast of Venezuela in South America, is it not?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the island of Trinidad belong?

Mr. LANE. I understand it belongs to Great Britain.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether any American can acquire oil lands or permits or drilling rights to develop oil in the Island of Trinidad under the British law?

Mr. LANE. I understand not, and I think it goes still further, that the general policy of Great Britain is that no foreigner shall be in possession or control of an oil property that is on their soil.

The CHAIRMAN. As far back as 1882, by order from the council or legislature, or executive order, the Standard Oil Co. of the United States was prohibited from going into India.

Mr. LANE. I am not familiar with that fact, but England undoubtedly has seen for some time that this is a new source of power, and has been forehanded and foresighted.

The CHAIRMAN. England has pursued a policy of encouraging her citizens in every way in the acquisition by such citizens of oil rights all over the world, has she not?

Mr. LANE. Undoubtedly. Of course, we have never recognized ourselves as promoters of commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. No. During this war, within the last few years, have the English gone further than they had before, to this extent: That the English Government itself has acquired a majority interest in a great oil development company or its subsidiaries?

Mr. LANE. I understand that is true. I made a report when I was Secretary of the Interior, which came eventually to the Senate, upon that question.

The CHAIRMAN. That policy is being developed through what is known as the Dutch Shell Co.?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether that company is interested in oil development in Mexico?

Mr. LANE. I understand it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether it is interested in the field in Colombia?

Mr. LANE. I understand it is also there.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the American syndicate, the Tropical Oil Co., and other American companies doing business in South or Latin America?

Mr. LANE. I understand there are two American companies in Colombia doing business of a very large character and having producing wells.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether or not those companies which have acquired that interest have transferred the majority to the Dutch Shell and its subsidiary company?

Mr. LANE. I do not. I think that is not true.

The CHAIRMAN. I am afraid it is true, that a three-fourth interest in a large concession for a tract of oil land obtained by American companies has been transferred recently to the Dutch Shell syndicate.

Mr. LANE. That is a menace to the United States in that we must get an outside supply of oil, and if it continues something like what Senator Brandegee says may come true, that we may be compelled to buy from them.

The CHAIRMAN. And yet there is an enormous amount of ready capital in the United States which could be employed in the development of these American properties. Then there must be some reason to induce American companies to part with majority interests in their property to an English company.

Mr. LANE. I think, perhaps, I can say one of the reasons is the uncertainty as to the security—the sureness or safety of the investment in the other country.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you understand that the English in their developments entertain the same apprehension?

Mr. LANE. They evidently have not to the same extent.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You spoke about the number of barrels of oil. How many gallons are there in a barrel of oil?

Mr. LANE. Forty-two.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I ask permission to put in with my remarks an excerpt read by Senator Jones of Washington describing the statement of this Englishman as to this oil situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, that may go in.

(The exhibit referred to is as follows, being from the Congressional Record of April 28, 1920, pp. 6719, 6720:)

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have here a clipping from the Public Ledger of Philadelphia under date of April 9, dated at London, a special cable dispatch:

"Writing in the Times, Sir E. Mackay Edgar, in explaining Great Britain's control of the oil resources of the world, says that within a few years the United States will be paying British oil interests $1,000,000,000 annually for oil for the American Navy and for American home consumption.

"With the exception of Mexico and to a lesser extent of Central America, the outer world is securely barricaded against an American invasion in force, he said. There may be small, isolated sallies, but there can never be a massed attack. The British position is impregnable."

If our administrative officers, if our State Department, who should know more about this situation than we can know or than anyone else in the country can know, are satisfied that the only way we can protect our interests in the acquirement of oil concessions and in securing oil to meet our future needs, is through a corporation or company, as suggested by the Senator from California, it seems to me that it is the duty of those administrative officers to say so, and to recommend to Congress legislation along those lines. If they will come to Congress and do that, I, for one, will stand by them.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an interruption right there?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; although I had not expected to take so much time.

Mr. KING. I will wait until the Senator concludes the article and then I will propound the question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is rather lengthy, and the Senator can proceed.

Mr. KING. Very well. I have thought for some time, particularly in view of the information which the Senator from California [Mr. Phelan] furnished to the Senate several months ago, that it is the duty of the Navy Department of the Government to acquire oil lands for naval purposes and uses in remote parts of the earth where our fleet will be called, and I should be glad to see an appropriation made, to be placed in the hands of the President, for the purpose of acquiring oil lands in those countries to which our fleet may go and when oil might be needed for our Navy.

I should be very glad if the Committee on Naval Affairs would consider that question, or if some other committee of the Senate would take up the matter. If it is not done I shall offer an amendment to the pending bill or introduce an independent bill, so that the whole subject may be considered by the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would welcome something along that line, but I want to emphasize the statement I made. I am not criticizing the administration or the department, but it seems to me that, they being more familiar with the details of the needs and the difficulties that they face, it is their duty to recommend to Congress what they think ought to be done. We can not know these facts and the details except as we get them in a general way. They run right up against them in the conduct of their affairs.

Just as the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] has said, the Secretary of the Navy and the officials of the Navy know exactly what are the needs of the Navy; they know the difficulties that they have in supplying those needs; they know the facts at the different points of the compass in the world that we do not know, and about the only way that we can get the information is that they call them to our attention and make recommendations to us, based upon their knowledge of the situation and the facts.

Reading further from this article:

"Sir Mackay declares that all known oil fields and all likely or probable oil fields outside the United States are in British hands or under British management or control or financed by British capital.

"We shall have to wait a few years before the full advantages of the situation shall begin to be reaped," he said, but that that harvest eventually will be a great one there can be no manner of doubt. To the tune of many millions of pounds a year America before very long will have to purchase from British companies and to pay for in dollar currency in progressively increasing proportion the oil she can not do without and is no longer able to furnish from her own store. I estimate that, if their present curve of consumption, especially of high-grade products, is maintained, Americans in 10 years will be under the necessity of importing 500,000,000 barrels of oil yearly at $2 a barrel, a very low figure, and that means an annual payment of $1,000,000,000 per annum, most, if not all, of which will find its way into British pockets. If there are pessimists left in the United Kingdom, I confidently invite them to put that in their pipes and smoke it."

And, Mr. President, in this connection I desire to suggest that now is the time for us to begin to lay our plans to meet any such situation as that. There are different ways by which we can meet it.

MR. WATSON. Mr. President, does the Senator understand that the Mexican oil fields are in control of the British?

MR. JONES of Washington. No; I do not understand that they are entirely so.

MR. WATSON. The all-sweeping declaration the Senator has read would lead one to conclude that such was the case.

MR. JONES of Washington. No; just preceding that statement—probably the Senator from Indiana did not notice it—I think he says that, outside of Mexico and one other field, the British practically control the oil of all the world.

However, what I want to suggest is this: This is the time for us to unshackle ourselves so that we can do whatever we think along different lines will be for the protection of our interests. We may in a few years be dependent upon the British Empire for oil, as Sir Mackay Edgar says; but, Mr. President, they are dependent upon us in this country for many things, and we ought to prepare ourselves so that we can use their needs to secure just treatment in the satisfaction of our needs. There ought to be some reciprocity in these matters to our advantage as well as to theirs. Concessions ought not to go always from this country to other people; and we are in a position, in my judgment, to insist that when we make concessions along certain lines, or when our needs must be supplied from other countries, that we shall also get concessions because of needs of theirs which we must meet.

There are treaties now that prevent us from doing what we ought to do for ourselves and for our own interests. Those treaties ought to be abrogated, so that we shall be in a position to look after our own interests. Our administrative officers—and I am not saying that they are not doing it—ought to see to it when advantages and concessions are secured by other countries, especially along commercial lines, that we also get concessions and advantages for our benefit.

MR. PHELAN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

MR. JONES of Washington. I yield.

MR. PHELAN. The Senator has observed that the United States has been asked to take the mandate for Armenia?

MR. JONES of Washington. I hope we shall not get the League of Nations up to-day.

MR. PHELAN. I will spare the Senator, because I was about to observe that if we had a representative in that body we might make terms, but now—

MR. JONES of Washington. We do not have to have such a representative. I can not yield to the Senator for that, because I do not want to go into its discussion. However, Mr. President, we have administrative representatives and diplomatic agents abroad who can look after the interests of this country, and it is not necessary to make the excuse that we need some representative on the council of the League of Nations to deal with mandates or anything like that to look after the interests of this country, and the Senator from California knows that as well as I do.

"UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ON QUI VIVE.

"That this view is not exaggerated is indicated by the fact that four departments of the American Government—War, Navy, State, and Commerce—have instructed their representatives throughout the world to watch all oil developments with the greatest care and report to Washington fully."

Mr. President, I am glad that that has been done. What use is being made of these reports? This is right in line with what I suggested awhile ago, that they get information which we can not get unless they give it to us. If there is information which they have secured or that they shall secure, that shows the need of action by Congress, it is their duty to come to Congress and tell us what they want and then ask us to enact the legislation.

Mr. Smoot. We are locking the stable door after the horse is stolen.

Mr. Jones of Washington. The quotation continues:

"During the last week several important conferences have taken place both in Paris and London, between American officials, when the oil situation was discussed because of the persistent reports that British interests are about to close big oil deals in Mexico and Peru with companies now operating there or owning concessions."

Mr. President, if there are companies and corporations, for instance, in Peru, that hold great oil concessions there, why is not our Government trying to get similar concession or to get an interest in them? If they need authority, if they need legislation that is important to enable them to do so, let them ask Congress and the authority will be granted.

"If this deal goes through, Britain's control of the oil resources of the world will be equal to a strangle hold."

"'Apart from Mexico,' Sir Mackey Edgar continues, 'it is almost a case of the British first and the rest of the world nowhere. I should say that two-thirds of the improved fields of Central and South America are in British hands. In Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia, Venezuela, and Ecuador a decisive and really overwhelming majority of the petroleum concessions are held by British subjects. They will be developed by British capital.'"

Why is it, Mr. President, that American citizens can not get oil concessions in South American countries? In my judgment, they can if our Government will take the proper steps, diplomatic and otherwise, with those countries. Quoting further:

"EXTENT OF BRITISH CONTROL.

"The Alves group, whose holdings encircle practically two-thirds of the Caribbean Sea, is wholly British, working under arrangements which insure that perpetual control of its undertakings shall remain in British hands. No American citizen and no American group has acquired or ever could acquire any such position in Central America as that which enterprise and personality have secured for Mr. Alves."

I believe, Mr. President, that we have men in this country who have just as fine personality and just as much enterprise as has any British subject or citizen, and, with the encouragement that our Government ought to give them, I believe we could accomplish just as much as the British citizens have accomplished.

"Or, take again that greatest of all oil organizations, the Shell group. It owns exclusive or controls interests in every important oil field in the world, including the United States, Russia, Mexico, the Dutch East Indies, Roumania, Egypt, Venezuela, Trinidad, India, Ceylon, the Malay States, North and South China, Siam, the Straits Settlements, and the Philippines."

It looks to me as though we ought to have some little control at least over the Philippines and the interests of the United States there.

Mr. LANE. You will find in the New York World some extracts from those statements. One of them was from Walter Long, I think, and another by Jepson Smith.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you remember what proportion of the oil that is produced in the United States is produced in California?

Mr. LANE. Two or three years ago it was about one-third, about 100,000,000 barrels out of 300,000,000. I think there is a larger yield now from Texas than from California. Probably California yields now about one-quarter.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you not think that, in view of what you have intimated as to the needs of our proposed merchant marine and of our naval vessels, both of which are governmental and both of which may involve the protection of this country and of its outlying possessions, the Government itself has an interest, irrespective of the commercial use of oil in this country, to at least, whether it promotes or not, protect private citizens who are trying to promote an adequate supply of oil to this country?

Mr. LANE. Undoubtedly so, Senator. I made specific recommendations upon that proposition in my last annual report, and in a report which I approved, which was sent to Congress over a year ago.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I am glad to refer to that. That is all I care to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

STATEMENT OF FREDERICK B. KELLOGG.

(The witness was duly sworn by the chairman.)

The CHAIRMAN. Please state your full name.

Mr. KELLOGG. Frederick R. Kellogg.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am a lawyer, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your place of business?

Mr. KELLOGG. In New York City, at 52 Broadway.

The CHAIRMAN. In the practice of your profession have you had reason to investigate and to familiarize yourself with the laws of Mexico, with reference to mineral rights, lands, etc.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have, for the last 15 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you speak the Spanish language?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Has your attention been called to the testimony of Mr. John Lind, to which reference has been made in the examination of Secretary Lane, such testimony having been given before this committee on a recent hearing?

Mr. KELLOGG. It has.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you read the statement of Mr. Lind?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have read several pages of Mr. Lind's testimony, which was directed specifically to the American oil companies and to the laws of Mexico with relation to petroleum.

The CHAIRMAN. In the statement made by Mr. Lind appears a comparison or attempted comparison between the laws of the United States and Mexico, and he uses this language:

In Mexico, the same as with us, originally, the State owned all the minerals.

Is there any difference in the Mexican law and the Spanish laws between their method or treatment of minerals of different classes?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; there is and has been always since the early days after the discovery of this continent by Spain, and of the conquest of Mexico by Cortez.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that difference?

Mr. KELLOGG. They draw a distinction between metalliferous minerals on the one hand, and nonmetalliferous minerals on the other, and that distinction has been very clearly applied in the early decrees, orders, and ordinances, commencing even before the discovery of this continent, but especially clear in the first law decreed by Philip II in 1559, and in the subsequent laws and edicts, which continued until 1793, which is the last I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you prepared a memorandum or brief upon this subject which you are now referring to, with the authorities—you have referred to the edict of Philip the Second and the law of 1793—and the subsequent legislation of the Mexican Government along these lines?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have prepared a partially complete memorandum; but owing to the lateness of my information that I should be called here to-day I have not got it in such shape to be able to hand it to you now, but it can readily be completed if a few days' time can be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it suit you now to refer to that memorandum, or from your memory, to give the specific decrees and orders and laws?

Mr. KELLOGG. Whichever is most agreeable to you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to have you do it now, in as short a way as possible, and take your time then in furnishing the committee with the memorandum or brief which you speak of, which will also be printed by the committee in your testimony.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should be very happy to do so, Mr. Chairman.

The first law to which I refer is that of Philip the Second, dated January 10, 1559, and the object of that law is set forth in the introduction to it—that is, as intending to refer to mines and the mineral deposits of gold, silver, quicksilver, and other metals. The word "metals" is specifically used. The law then proceeds to incorporate into the royal patrimony mines of the description just given, and which are included in the public lands or in private ownership.

It is a curious and interesting feature of that law that even the despotic monarch Philip the Second especially provided for full compensation in the case of any mine thus taken over into the royal patrimony which at the date of that edict had passed into private ownership.

The CHAIRMAN. May I not interrupt you right there to ask you if it is not true that in 1375 Spain had adopted a mineral law with reference to royal or Crown lands by which in each grant thereafter made there was reserved to the Crown the Crown minerals—that is, gold, silver, and quicksilver—and that that edict was for the purpose of assuring the property of the Crown in the particular minerals mentioned, known as metalliferous minerals, within the lands, the surface of which had been granted by the Crown theretofore to private individuals, the Crown being the source of title?

Mr. KELLOGG. It covers that situation, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. After the discovery of minerals in this country, when it was evident that there was a great treasure house here, the Spanish Crown having theretofore made grants in Spanish-America of lands to individuals in reward for services, etc., adopted this law of 1559, restricting the ownership of the minerals within those lands or at least establishing the policy of the Crown with reference to the metalliferous minerals; that is, that it should not be understood by this grant that metalliferous minerals were parted with by the Crown, but that they were retained by the Crown.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think your analysis is entirely correct, Mr. Chairman.

Perhaps it is not wholly out of place to compare the provision which I have just referred to as to compensation to individual owners, in this decree of 1559, with the absolutely confiscatory provisions of Mr. Carranza's convention of 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. I will be glad to have you do so.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have done it in that one sentence. There is no such provision in the constitution of 1917, and there was one 400 years before in the decree I have referred to.

Shall I proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. Continue in your own language.

Mr. KELLOGG. With reference to these various decrees?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. There were subsequent decrees and orders and edicts, which continued until 1793. I do not know of any after that time, although I believe there was one of comparative unimportance after the end of the century. All of these relate to the same general matter and, I take it, must be construed together; because, taken together, they show a complete policy of the Crown of Spain with reference to nonmetalliferous minerals and metalliferous minerals.

At the time of the early decrees hydrocarbons were not generally known or considered to be of commercial importance, but subsequently coal did become of importance, and prior to the independence of Mexico the question arose as to whether this hydrocarbon came within the purport and intent of the preceding decrees and ordinances. That doubt was resolved, as it seems to me, very clearly by, first, the decree or edict of 1789, from which a little quotation can properly be read, I think. That was the 26th of December, 1789. It commences by referring to the difficulties which were said to have occurred in the use of coal, and by a declaration that it is desired to remove these difficulties and simplify the subject, and then the following language is used:

Coal not being a metal or semimetal, or any other of the things comprehended within the laws or ordinances which declare that mines are the property of the royal patrimony.

And then it goes on and makes provision for its free extraction and its free use, even for its exportation to any part of the world. These decrees in various places clearly recognized the point to which I have alluded, that such things as hydrocarbons are the property of the owner of the soil, whether that owner be a municipal council or private individual; and the same principle seems to govern the case of any other hydrocarbon, such as petroleum, which was not then enumerated specifically.

The CHAIRMAN. In reference to that law of 1789, under which difficulties had arisen, was it not your understanding that these questions which had arisen were along this line: That the law having provided, by order of the Crown, that upon public lands these minerals could be acquired, by location or denouncement, that it was found or thought there was no provision by which coal upon such public lands could be denounced or used, and the law of 1789 was passed, making the distinction between the law governing metaliferous minerals and the law governing the ownership of the soil, and establishing the principles not only that the subsoil products of subsoil property, the nonmetalliferous minerals, were the property of the owner of the soil, but also provided that even upon the Crown lands there should be a distinction as to the use of coal, that it must be obtained by direct grant instead of under the ordinary mineral law?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think that is correct. The law to which I have just referred, of 1789, shows the solicitude of the Crown to provide for the extraction and actual dedication to public use of coal that may be on anybody's ground, but wherever that thought is worked out and the plan of getting the coal out is provided for it is always accompanied by a provision recognizing the right of the owner, the private ownership.

The CHAIRMAN. The title?

Mr. KELLOGG. The title, and providing especially for full compensation for the coal thus extracted. It is in effect a provision for just compensation, as in all eminent domain statutes.

Shall I pass now to the law of 1792?

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed in your own way.

Mr. KELLOGG. In 1792 there was another decree relating to this general subject, from which it appears clearly that doubt had arisen as to the interpretation or meaning or effect of the preceding laws, and the Crown legislated upon that subject again as follows:

Despite any interpretation which might have been given or may be given to the laws and ordinances to the effect that every kind of mines, although not expressly named in those laws, belong to the Crown, mines of coal shall be of free availability as are by ancient custom mines of iron and other substances which are extracted from the bosom of the earth.

That is section 1. Section 2 of that law reads as follows:

Nevertheless, the Crown shall preserve the supreme right of incorporating to itself such mine or mines as it may require or as may be convenient for the use of the royal navy, factories, machines, or other objects whatsoever and public service.

The next sentence seems to me to be of distinct importance.

Such mines as may be found in unclaimed or public lands may be thus incorporated without recompense, but if they belong to local council, communities, or individual owners, there shall be paid to them their just value.

The obvious comment is that that establishes the clearest possible express recognition of the private ownership of that particular kind of mineral, to wit, coal, which was then the only important hydrocarbon, by either a public or private owner of the land, and an express provision for just compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. Just exactly as if the Crown needed the surface soil, it would have to compensate, but it could, under the power of the Crown, take the surface?

Mr. KELLOGG. Absolutely analogous. Clause 3 reads as follows:

The direct owners who are the proprietors of the lands where mines of coal exist, whether they are councils, communities, or individuals, may discover them, work them, and enjoy them for themselves alone, or permit others to do so, or may rent them or sell them, as they see fit, without any license or formality other than that which may be required to enjoy, rent, or sell the land which contains them.

The comment being that that seems to emphasize the thought which I have just expressed, Mr. Chairman, that they treat a substance of that nature exactly as they treat the surface, in express language.

That is one of the latest, if not the latest, of the utterances of the Crown of Spain upon the subject, although I think there were decrees after the beginning of the century and before the independence of Mexico was established which related to it, but which certainly did not affect the principle which has been laid down.

The CHAIRMAN. That was embraced in the ordinances governing the sanitation and working of mines, and protection of miners, etc., but did not make a new distinction or undertake to set up a new title or a new claim to the nonmetalliferous minerals.

Mr. KELLOGG. My recollection is that your statement is entirely correct. And it will be observed that these later interpretative decrees, as I might call them, although they are of necessity also constructive decrees, are connected with and must be construed as fixing the meaning of all the preexisting laws upon the general subject, beginning with 1387 and continuing through the laws of 1559, the ordinances of 1783, and the other decrees above mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. Those laws were by general decrees and executive orders continued in force after the Mexican revolution of 1821, as the laws of Mexico, and by the decrees of Bolivar and Pedro in 1826 the law as it was established in Mexico was made the law of the Republic of Colombia, of Venezuela, and Ecuador.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes. I believe there was also a treaty between Mexico and Spain under which whatever rights the Crown had passed to the newly organized Republic of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly.

Mr. KELLOGG. But which did not purport, of course, to change the nature or extent of those rights.

Shall I proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Mr. KELLOGG. After the establishment of the Government of the Mexican Republic, there appears to have been no Federal legislation relating to mining matters—that is, none which related to the title of these particular substances—until after the amendment of the Constitution of 1857. That amendment took place in the early eighties. I have forgotten the exact year, but I think it was 1883. The amendment expressly authorized the Federal Government to establish mining codes. Up to that time there had been no such express authority in the Constitution of 1857. Very shortly following the adoption of this constitutional amendment the first definite mining code of the Republic of Mexico was adopted. I think it is in the code of 1884. Shall I read that part into the record?

The CHAIRMAN. I will be glad to have it in the record.

Mr. KELLOGG. These are excerpts from the mining law of November 22, 1884, reading as follows:

ART. 6. Foreigners may acquire mining property on such terms and with such limitations as the laws of the Republic grant them the capacity to acquire, own, and transfer ordinary property. * * *

ART. 10. The following substances are the exclusive property of the owner of the land, who may therefore develop and enjoy them without the formality of denouncement or special adjudication.

Then follows Subsection IV. which reads as follows:

Salts found on the surface, fresh and salt water, whether surface or subterranean; petroleum and gaseous springs, or springs of warm or medicinal waters.

Mr. Lind, if I may comment on the part I have read of his testimony—

The CHAIRMAN. I will be very glad to have you do so.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Lind referred specifically to this, and commented upon this law as follows:

The State in Mexico owned the oil until some time during Diaz's administration, when Lord Cowdray discovered oil. Then they secured an act of the Mexican Congress relinquishing the State claim to the oil and real property. Of course, Lord Cowdray and his organization in Mexico, under Diaz, were in position to virtually dictate, and they did dictate to the Mexican Government what they wanted, and they got what they wanted.

I was especially struck, Mr. Chairman, by that statement, because it was positive: it is not stated as being on information and belief, and it would give to anyone who reads it the impression that Mr. Lind was testifying from personal knowledge. Now, analyzing it for a moment, it is obvious that the pivotal part of that statement is that Lord Cowdray discovered oil in Mexico and then dictated the kind of law he wanted and got it passed. The fact is, to my personal knowledge, not information and belief, but my personal knowledge is, that Lord Cowdray never entered the oil field until at least 18 years after the passage of this law of 1884. That is, as far as Mexico is concerned. I do not know what he was doing in other parts of the world. There was no commercial exploitation or development of petroleum in Mexico existing at the time this law of 1884 was passed, and it was not until 16 years later, in 1900, that Mr. Doheny and Mr. Canfield first went to Mexico, first discovered what they thought was a commercial proposition in petroleum, and acquired their first interest there. And it was not until at least two and I think three years later that Lord Cowdray, being attracted by the results of Mr. Doheny's and Mr. Canfield's efforts, commenced for the very first time to take an interest in the petroleum proposition in Mexico. He got his first information on the matter from Mr. Doheny and Mr. Canfield; he got his first tools from Mr. Doheny and Mr. Canfield; and they endeavored to assist him as a friendly competitor will endeavor to assist another.

Mr. Doheny and Mr. Canfield never had turned their attention the least degree to Mexico until about 1900, so far as petroleum was concerned, although Mr. Doheny had been prospecting in the early stages of his career. Neither he or Mr. Canfield had the least thing to do, directly or indirectly, with the passage of the law of 1884, and they would not have gone into Mexico in 1900, as they have both frequently told me, except for their reliance on the assurance that the law gave them that the ownership of petroleum would follow the ownership of the land and they would be fully protected by the laws of Mexico in their intended development.

The CHAIRMAN. It is also a fact that in 1883, when that constitutional provision was adopted under which the legislation of 1884 was adopted, Diaz was not President of Mexico, but Gonzales was President of Mexico, is it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Gonzales was president at that time. That statement is entirely correct, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Lind's testimony, therefore, on that point would seem to indicate that he has accepted, with complete trust and confidence, the statements which are so frequently made by certain Carranza propagandists in this country on that subject; that he did not take the time or the trouble to even make a superficial examination as to the facts, for the merest superficial examination would show the facts; and he was willing to go before the American public, with his prestige and reputation, as the father of a statement which is so seriously wrong that it can not be allowed to pass without the most complete demonstration of its inaccuracy.

My attention is called to another development which bears upon the statement of Mr. Lind. He stated that Lord Cowdray wanted the law of 1884 passed, which I have shown to be a very serious error. As a matter of fact, Lord Cowdray in the year 1905 was sponsor for an attempt to have petroleum nationalized in Mexico, which, owing to Mr. Doheny's operations, he must have thought would be more beneficial to Lord Cowdray and his interests than the private ownership of petroleum which then prevailed.

This resulted in a special convocation of the members of the Academy of Jurisprudence in Mexico, which corresponds in a rough way to our American Bar Association here, and at that time was comprised of the leading members of the Mexican bar. The question presented to the academy by the person who represented the interest desiring nationalization of petroleum was as to whether the title to petroleum beneath the surface of privately owned lands then belonged or did not belong to the Mexican Government; and second, whether, if it did not belong to the Mexican Government, that government had the right to take it from the private owners of those lands. A notable discussion followed the announcement of these propositions. The matter was discussed under the leadership of the greatest Mexican lawyer of his time, Don Luis Mendez. The old and new laws were analyzed and traced back to the foundation of the Roman law, which preceded all these royal decrees, and the vote of the academy was unanimous, with the exception of the man who submitted the proposition, to the effect, first, that the Mexican Government did not own the petroleum beneath the surface of privately owned lands; and second, that it had no right whatsoever to take it away from the private owners of the surface.

Mr. Lind also stated in a rather casual way that:

In Mexico, the same as with us originally, the State owned all the minerals.

Mr. Lind is in error in respect to that proposition, as to what we owned, and in Mexico an examination of prior jurisprudence will show he was equally inaccurate in regard to familiar stipulations in the law of that country. I quote from a further statement Mr. Lind made upon the same topic. Counsel asked him:

What do you mean when you say that the oil belonged to the State up to the time of Diaz? Do you mean that where private property had been granted, nevertheless the oil was reserved to the State as its property?

Mr. Lind answered:

Yes; just the same as other minerals. You know, on any land in Mexico, privately owned, anyone can go and condemn—denounce, as they call it—minerals rights. My understanding is that in Mexico to-day, and it always has been the law in Mexico, the owner of real property does not own the minerals.

From that very explicit statement of Mr. Lind's it will be apparent that he has perhaps not been informed about and certainly has given no attention to the well-established distinction in the former laws to which I have already alluded between metalliferous minerals and nonmetalliferous minerals.

The CHAIRMAN. The Spanish word describing metal is "metales."

Mr. KELLOGG. "Metales"; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And "minerals" is generally known as "minerales"?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is correct. Those two words have a perfectly clear distinction of meaning.

Continuing further with Mr. Lind's testimony, as to land ownership and the ownership of minerals, he says:

That was true of oil until Cowdray secured that amendment of the law.

There is no foundation in legal history or in fact for either the conclusion of law which Mr. Lind draws or his statement as to Lord Cowdray's activities.

Continuing, he says:

Now, as I understand the constitutional provision—

The witness, referring to the constitution of 1917—to which you refer simply reinstates the old law with this provision, that it shall not apply to land acquired by foreigners during the period that the law was in operation, or to lands where oil had been developed.

I am particularly anxious to have that quotation noted, Mr. Chairman, because it illustrates again the trust and confidence which Mr. Lind has evidently placed in the statements of others, without giving them his own personal investigation. He says that the constitution of 1917 contains the same provisions as the old law, except that it does not apply in its confiscatory provisions to land acquired by foreigners during the period that the law of 1884 was in operation. As a matter of fact, the constitution of 1917 entirely omits the provision which Mr. Lind is convinced that it contains, and it is owing to its omission that this strenuous conflict has existed for the last two years between the oil companies who did acquire lands under the statutes of 1884, 1892, and 1909, and the Government of Mexico, that has been continually seeking to take away from them the petroleum contained in those lands thus acquired and held; and acquired, I should have said, not from public ownership, but, from private ownership, in every case, as far as our companies—and I mean the Mexican petroleum group—are concerned.

I am also well within the mark when I state that although I have not been counsel of all other oil companies in Mexico, that there never has been a concession granting oil lands in Mexico to any American company since the beginning of the development of the oil industry. There was a concession to the Lord Cowdray Co. of certain rights in respect to certain public lands. That has nothing whatever to do with the position of the American oil companies, and, as a matter of physical fact, I understand there never has been a barrel of oil developed from the lands covered by this concession, even by Lord Cowdray.

Another feature of Mr. Lind's statement to which I have alluded is that he states that the constitution of 1917 does not apply to lands where oil has been developed. Again he is absolutely mistaken, because there is no such provision in the constitution of 1917, and one of the great contentions of the American oil companies has been that such a provision, or one which would be somewhat broader in its scope, should have been inserted into the body of Mexican jurisprudence.

He said, significantly, at the end of that statement :

That is my understanding, but that may be imperfect in detail.

That is the only sentence of his statement which I find myself heartily and sincerely able to agree with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not rather important in foundation, than in detail?

Mr. KELLOGG. In every detail, commencing with the first word to the last word, in substance and detail as well.

Another very definite statement showing the source as well as the inaccuracy of Mr. Lind's information is contained in the following sentence. The question was asked of him :

Where did you get your information that the law of Mexico was that the oil below the surface belonging to private owners belonged to the Government?

Mr. LIND. Why, that is the Latin law.

In other words, Mr. Lind seeks to trace the subject juridically back to the days of the Roman law; but nothing was plainer under the Roman law than that the owner of the surface had everything up to the sky and down to the center of the earth, and the effect of the decree of Philip the Second, in 1559, was simply to take away rights which the Roman law gave to every surface owner—such rights as an absolute monarch desired to reserve for himself, and by reason of his absolutism was able to thus reserve—and even there he did it with the express reservation as to just compensation to any private individual who might be injured by the arbitrary act of the sovereign.

The CHAIRMAN. Reference is made in Mr. Lind's testimony to the Code Napoleon.

Mr. KELLOGG. My attention is just called to that. He says "That is the Code Napoleon." I suppose that might be interpreted as meaning that he takes the Code Napoleon as being in force in Mexico, and as being the last word in the Roman law. In the absence of definite knowledge as to what he really meant, the statement is difficult to criticize, but the Code Napoleon has never been in force in Mexico and it probably never will be.

I have taken the liberty, Mr. Chairman, of indulging in some comments upon Mr. Lind's statement, certainly not because of any desire to enter into a personal controversy with Mr. Lind, but because he has uttered statements which, if generally disseminated, will cause the most serious harm to those of us who for the last two years have been fighting day and night, not for the purpose of getting something from Mexico that we are not entitled to and ought not to have, but for the purpose of protecting the rights which, by the laws of Mexico and the Government of Mexico, we were invited to come in and acquire, and upon the faith of which invitations our companies have expended hundreds of millions of dollars since the beginning of the oil development in 1900.

Before passing to another subject, I would like to comment, while the point is in my mind, on one little matter which should not be lost sight of. I think that one of the statements which have been made was to the effect that Mexico had not yet taken any lands from any of the holders who acquired under these subsequent laws. They actually have deprived one company of the possession of one of its most valuable allotments. That happens to be a company for which I occasionally act as counsel, so I am familiar with the facts. It was organized under the laws of Great Britain, but is controlled by a holding company, the majority of whose stock is held by Americans, so that aside from technicalities it is an American affair, very largely. They have also tried to take an extremely valuable slice, or slices, if I may use that term, from lands which are absolutely privately owned by various other American oil companies, in this particular: That within the last eight months Mr. Carranza's government has granted a number of concessions—and these are real concessions, in which the Carranza government, which has professed to abhor "concessions," purports to turn over titles which it purports to own to private individuals—to develop oil upon the beds of streams navigable and not navigable and located in the oil region.

Inasmuch as the law of Mexico to-day is that the private owner of the bank owns to the center of those streams (subject to the natural right of the water to flow over those beds and subject to an easement which the law of Mexico created many years ago granting landing privileges to those who navigate those waters), with those exceptions, the land underneath those streams and rivers are just as much privately owned by these companies as the lands in the uplands are privately owned by them; and it follows that these drilling concessions actually have taken from the owners of those lands a physical part of the bed thus owned.

The CHAIRMAN. And without compensation?

Mr. KELLOGG. Without any form or pretense, sir, of compensation. Under these concessions thus granted wells are to-day being drilled, or they were before the present revolution assumed form; several wells, one in particular between the two banks of the Panuco River, in what is called the Panuco oil district, and another well, or wells—I am not sure how many there are—just a little above or below the first well, which is already quite well along in its development.

No attention has been paid in any publication or public statement I have read to this very menacing and entirely unwarranted confiscatory act, but it is purely an arbitrary act, as confiscatory in its effect, and perhaps even more so, as results will show, and in its injury and damage to Americans owning land, as it would be if some part of the uplands themselves had been thus granted to favorites of the existing government.

The law of 1884, which has been read into the record, continued in force and without change until June 4, 1892, at which date a revised mining code appears containing these provisions:

ART. 4. The owner of the land—

Meaning the surface of the land—

may freely work without a special franchise in any case whatsoever the following mineral substances: Mineral fuels, oils, and mineral waters.

ART. 5. All mining property legally acquired and such as hereafter may be acquired in pursuance of this law shall be irrevocable and perpetual, so long as the federal property tax be paid in pursuance of the provisions of the law creating the said tax.

That law was revised in 1909 by the mining code of November 25 of that year, which contains the following express provision on that subject:

ART. 2. The following substances are the exclusive property of the owner of the soil:

- I. Ore bodies or deposits of mineral fuels, of whatever form or variety.
- II. Ore bodies or deposits of bituminous substances.

That is the last of the mining codes, and of the provisions of law which purport to regulate title to petroleum or hydrocarbon rights, until the constitution of 1917 was adopted, and the series of Carranza decrees which began in 1918 was promulgated.

One point of special importance, it seems to me, should be noted as to all of these three mining codes which have been quoted. None of them purport to make any grant by the nation of something that was not hitherto the right and property of the individual owner. They declare expressly that the situation is thus and so, and do not purport to change it. They are, therefore, in every way corroborative of the conclusions which I have expressed as to the preexisting laws, and are conclusive interpretations of those laws which were in force up to the time of the first of these codes in 1884, in which petroleum rights were expressly declared to be the property of the owner of the surface; and the same is true in the subsequently enacted codes.

The CHAIRMAN. And are simply declaratory of the old Spanish law dating back to the decree of 1559?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is precisely the point which I should like to emphasize, and which I am very glad you have emphasized.

One further remark in conclusion is as to the inconceivable moral and juridical injury which will exist if foreigners who, in the best of good faith, have gone into that country in reliance upon those specific and express statements in the law, and who have invested several hundred millions of dollars in such reliance, shall be deprived of their property thus acquired by them from private owners by a retroactive interpretation of what purports to be a constitution adopted by the Carranza government.

That completes my statement, I believe, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The provisions of the constitution of 1917 to which you have referred do not exclude the Congress of the Republic of Mexico, provided for under that constitution, from powers of enacting legislation?

Mr. KELLOGG. No. And I should like to make one comment, as an addendum to what I have just said, because a false impression might otherwise be created. The constitution of 1917, despite the language of article 27, when construed in its entirety—and that involves the consideration of other clauses that I have in mind, Mr. Chairman—does not deprive the owner of the surface of the petroleum rights, because it confirms not only article 27 but articles 14 and 126, and article 14 says that no law shall be given a retroactive effect. Primarily that word “law” might be taken to refer to subsequent enactments of Congress, but in article 126 that very constitution was enumerated as being one of the “laws” of Mexico.

Therefore article 14 and article 126, taken together with article 27, lay the ground for what would seem to be an entirely reasonable argument that the constitution itself does not actually deprive the private individual of his subsurface right. But every one of the Carranza decrees, commencing with the decree of February, 1918, interpret the constitution as absolutely eliminating private ownership in petroleum lying beneath the surface of land which has already gone out of the public domain and become the property of individual owners.

The CHAIRMAN. If not only interprets the constitution but declares that the constitution as thus interpreted by Mr. Carranza's decree shall become operative?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is precisely what it does.

The CHAIRMAN. No direct action has been taken by the legislative body, which is supposed to have been created for the purpose of enacting legislation to put the constitution in effect, to enact legislation under the constitution?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is entirely correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Congress has been functioning in Mexico, has it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. It has.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the Congress ever passed any laws with reference to the petroleum industry?

Mr. KELLOGG. No such law has been passed. The Senate passed a bill at the last session, which, however, never was acted upon by the House, and that is the present condition of that legislation, which the constitution doubtless contemplated.

The CHAIRMAN. The so-called laws with reference to the petroleum industry, under the constitution of 1917, are merely decrees of Mr. Carranza, the President of Mexico, are they not?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is what they are, except as to such force which might be sought to have been given to those decrees by the general resolution which Congress always adopts at the end of its session ratifying whatever the President has done.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, Carranza issued the first decree against which we have been protesting two years prior to the decree of the constitution in 1916, with reference to oil lands, etc.?

Mr. KELLOGG. There were a number of regulations that were issued, you know, requiring permits for drilling, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. And under the old constitution, which was then in force?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And which he had organized a revolution against the then existing Government for the purpose of retaining in force, going back to the constitution?

Mr. KELLOGG. That was his declared purpose at the time of his original pronouncement.

The CHAIRMAN. And this Government in 1915 was compelled to protest against his arbitrary decrees affecting the oil industry?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir. In that same connection, the written promise given by Mr. Arredondo, on October 9, 1915, I think it was, contained the most explicit possible pledge of Mr. Carranza for the protection of the rights, lives, and property of foreigners in accordance with international law. That has not been made good by him in any particular, so far as the petroleum industry is concerned.

I should like to add one other point about the extent to which the confiscatory program has actually gone, because these various points should all be taken into consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. I shall be very glad to have you do so.

Mr. KELLOGG. In 1919, in the early summer, Mr. Carranza's government finding that they were not making the progress they had hoped with regard to their dealings with the oil companies pursuant to their decrees, formed a plan of accomplishing indirectly what they had not been able to do directly, and they took advantage of one of those early decrees to which you have just alluded, Mr. Chairman—these so-called preconstitutional decrees—requiring permits to be given to the owners of lands before they were permitted to drill for oil on those lands; and taking advantage of that clause or decree they refused to permit a man from drilling his lands, wholly irrespective of the excellence of his title, unless in his application for the permit, he would agree to accept not merely the laws then existing but all laws that might at any time thereafter be promulgated either by Mr. Carranza himself in his capacity as dictator or by Congress, with reference to petroleum lands, titles, rights, operations, etc.

So that we found ourselves required to give Mr. Carranza a blank check on our future as a condition precedent to exercising the fundamental right of ownership, to enjoy the thing which you own. That campaign was carried on by the Carranza government until the latter part of the year 1919, the companies standing firm and refusing to sign away their rights in any such manner. In the meantime, naturally, some of the older oil districts had ceased to produce, and drilling in new districts became absolutely imperative, not only to keep up the oil supply of the world but to enable Mr. Carranza to collect the volume of taxes which he had been previously accustomed to receive from the industry. Finally, intimations were conveyed to us that if the matter was presented directly to the proper authorities of Mexico the decree as to prohibition of drilling would be loosened and made more practical, and that was done after a hiatus of probably six months, during which time an enormous number of opportunities were lost, and the industry received a very serious temporary setback in Mexico.

Those three things, the actual taking of title from one company, the granting of rights under the beds of streams which he had no power to grant, and the indirect effort at confiscation through the operation of the drilling decrees, include the principal efforts at physical confiscation which Mr. Carranza's government has made since the beginning of its series of decrees.

The CHAIRMAN. Speaking of these so-called preconstitutional decrees of Carranza, Mr. Carranza himself first issued a decree, did he not, vesting in himself the right to issue other decrees, and under that authority given by Carranza to himself he issued these decrees of 1915 to which you have referred?

Mr. KELLOGG. He placed the crown upon his own brow.

The CHAIRMAN. He distinctly vested himself as first chief, with authority to issue decrees, and then proceeded to issue decrees, one among them being this so-called preconstitutional decree, on which he afterwards based that order subsequent to what he called the constitutional development, and he made it constitutional by issuing a decree after the constitution was adopted, based upon his so-called constitutional decree which he himself had vested himself with power to make.

Mr. KELLOGG. And pursued the same system of evolution from his inner consciousness. Every one of the postconstitutional decrees as to petroleum was made by him pursuant to a supposed grant of power by Congress, which grant did not begin to relate to or touch upon the field in which he was then personally legislating.

One of the powers which were given to him by the first Congress of Mexico was a power to legislate in matters relating to the treasury department, finance, to cover possible emergencies existing as to the necessity for money and the means of raising it. He saw fit to interpret that as giving him power to legislate on any subject toward which attention was directed, and it is the unanimous opinion of all Mexican attorneys with whom I have consulted on this matter that no shadow of excuse, from the standpoint of the jurisprudence of Mexico, existed for the twisting of that power granted by Congress relative to financial matters into a power to settle the question of the rights of individual owners to the petroleum underlying the surface of the land.

Is it permissible for me to add another statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Lind made another statement which can not be allowed to pass without comment. The statement is one of those indirect statements which produce the effect or naturally tend to produce the effect of a direct statement in the public mind. It is this:

He always insisted that foreigners operating in Mexico should not seek to avoid taxes and the performance of their duties the same as was required of Mexican citizens.

He was referring to Luis Cabrera, a member of the Carranza Cabinet. The obvious inference is that the oil companies were within the class that had sought to avoid taxation and the proper performance of their duties. I would like to make as emphatically as possible the statement that there never has been a time when any oil company in Mexico of which I have had knowledge, and I have been either directly or indirectly connected with all of them, has tried to avoid the payment of any taxes ever levied upon them by the Government of Mexico.

I would also like to make it plain that, taking advantage of the attitude which the companies have always maintained in that regard, Mr. Carranza's Government has during the last two years adopted a system of evading their own laws by taxing us 200 per cent of the amount which their own laws required us to pay, and they have done it in this way: The tax has been an ad valorem tax on petroleum or petroleum products exported, and the value of the oil or product which was the basis of that tax was fixed every two months by administration officials, who, without the shadow of any pretense of right, fixed the oil valuations at double the actual values. In Tampico, for instance, its valuation was fixed on a basis which represented more than its value after it had been hauled 2,000 miles to north Atlantic ports.

One of the last orders of the Carranza government, issued within the last few days, was to fix a new basis of valuation, which still further increased the tax by doubling the already doubled basis of valuation. So that if we had been compelled or should be compelled at any time to pay a tax pursuant to that new method, we should be paying on oil worth, we will say, a dollar a barrel, but taxed upon a valuation of $2, which, of course, is a mere evasion of the law and is a duplication of taxes. That is an illustration of the difficulties with which we have had to contend and the more than willingness which it seems to me we have displayed to do our duty, as those who are temporarily or permanently in Mexico should do their duty, and to try to avoid the imputation of being tax dodgers in any way, shape, or form.

In this connection it is frequently published in the American papers that the oil contest between the American oil companies and the Carranza government relating to these post-constitutional decrees has been one of taxation. That is absolutely untrue.

It is a fact that we have refused to pay certain sums of money which these post-constitutional decrees sought to make us pay as rentals and royalties. Our refusal was made because by paying those sums under the terms of those decrees we must conclusively admit that somebody other than ourselves owned the property in respect to which the payments were made—for one can not pay rent on property which he owns himself, if he owns it.

That is the entire basis of the allegations that the American oil companies have been and are tax dodgers, and no allegation has been more frequently made by the Carranza propagandists in the United States than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The advice of the State Department of the United States Government had been sought prior to your action in refusing to pay these sums of money, had it not?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is true, and I would like to add that we have tried at every stage of this controversy, and it has had many different phases, to keep in constant touch with the State Department, and do nothing which they thought might be reprehensible to the interests of not only ourselves, but the interests of the United States as a Nation, and we have faithfully and fully carried out that program to the present moment. We have never suborned a rebel chief, never contributed to any rebel fund. We have behaved ourselves as decent men ought to behave themselves, going into a foreign country to attempt to do business. Our record is absolutely that of clean, decent American citizens prosecuting a clean, decent business in a foreign country, endeavoring to conduct their own affairs in a proper way and insisting on being allowed to keep what they bought and paid for and continue to conduct their own affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. In the last protest of the United States Government to Carranza, based upon the oil decrees and his proposed action with reference to oil, the United States Government, through its State Department, has stated definitely that they still maintain the position they have maintained with reference to all the different protests they have theretofore made against the enforcement of these decrees from 1915 down to the present time.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that conclude your statement?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is all I have in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement you have given us has been exceedingly clear and very interesting, and we thank you very much. If you will be kind enough to have that memorandum prepared, I will be very glad.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall be very happy to do so, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be incorporated in the record.

Mr. KELLOGG. Thank you.

(The memorandum referred to will be printed in a subsequent part.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The following testimony was taken at Washington, D. C., Wednesday, April 28, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate:

TESTIMONY OF JAMES D. SHEAHAN.

The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you state your full name?

Mr. SHEAHAN. James D. Sheahan.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your present place of residence?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Richmond, Va.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you a native-born American citizen?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir. I was born in Toronto, Canada.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you an American citizen by naturalization?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir. My parents were American citizens.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what business are you engaged?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Manufacturing farm tractors in Chicago.

Mr. KEARFUL. What business have you had in Mexico?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I was one of four others that became the owners of a large hacienda there in the fall of 1903, consisting of 362,000 acres.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you and your associates buy that tract of land?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How much did you pay for it?

Mr. SHEAHAN. $350,000 gold.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get titles that were regarded as good?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir; up to the present time, so far as we know.

Mr. KEARFUL. What business did you conduct on this plantation?

Mr. SHEAHAN. The valley lands, which are on the Agua Fria River for a distance of about 28 miles passing through our property, are divided about one-third of them for the raising of cereals of various kinds, and we developed the water sufficiently to irrigate those lands. The balance of the land we have fenced for pastures for our blooded, registered stock.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what part of Mexico is this place located?

Mr. SHEAHAN. In Jimenez. Our boundary line comes within 4 miles of Jimenez.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what State?

Mr. SHEAHAN. In the State of Chihuahua, very close to the border of Durango, about 8 miles.

Mr. KEARFUL. What products did you raise on this place?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Wheat, corn, cotton, barley, and beans were the crops, and we had 500 acres of alfalfa. We started with 15 acres that was on the premises of alfalfa when we bought it, which was in bad condition, and we afterwards plowed it up and increased that up to 500 acres.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you do in reference to stock raising?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We increased our stock raising about 150 per cent within six years from the time we purchased the property. When we bought it the water facilities on the range were quite limited. The cattle had to go a long ways for water. In that way there was a great deal of the lands where grazing was good, but there was no water on them; but we developed the water facilities on different parts of the range. In six years we had spent in the neighborhood of $300,000 in development work.

Mr. KEARFUL. In developing the water supply?

Mr. SHEAHAN. The water supply, and for new machinery and increased buildings.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you have to do to develop the water supply?

Mr. SHEAHAN. In a greater portion of it we were able to build dams and operate reservoirs, backing the water up for a long distance.

Mr. KEARFUL. What kind of live stock did you have on the place?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Herefords, principally. We brought in breeding stock by the carload, sometimes as high as five carloads at a shipment, and kept them separately as much as possible from the native cattle that we had on the place when we purchased it. We built fences and cross fences so as to make large pastures and keep the better grade of stock by themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have blooded stock brought from the United States?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In addition to the cattle, did you have horses and jacks and hogs and sheep?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We had Spanish jacks that were imported. We had one German coach that we sent down there from Wisconsin; also a Percheron.

Mr. KEARFUL. Hogs and sheep?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes; and Angora goats. We had a large flock of Angora goats.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you estimate the total amount of money invested in land and improvements and live stock?

Mr. SHEAHAN. In the neighborhood of between $600,000 and $700,000. If I may state it here, we had to build one year 40 miles of boundary-line fence, four barbed wire, shipping in the red cedar posts from the State of Texas. The next year we built 75 miles. Our boundary was a fence of four barbed wires on the entire boundary line with the exception of about 30 miles. That was a sort of mountainous country that very few cattle would attempt to go over or come in and encroach upon us.

Mr. KEARFUL. About how many people did you employ on this plantation?

Mr. SHEAHAN. As an estimate, I would say that we had in the neighborhood of 350, or between that and 400. We had built houses sufficient to house 100 families at headquarters, and I think those would average almost two to the house.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were your employees Mexicans?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Entirely so; peons.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those peons forced to work for you?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you employ them?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We established a system when we first became the owners of this property of letting the peons have a small acreage to work on shares for themselves. If a single man did not care to work his land, we did not bind ourselves to give him steady work, but the men who were working the land, if they were the kind of men that we wanted, we gave them the preference of working the time that they were not required to till their own crops—of working for us. In that way their entire time was well occupied.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you hear John Lind testify yesterday about the American operators of plantations in Mexico?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I did, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you to say about his statement that the operations of Americans on plantations in Mexico were not for the benefit of the natives?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I was surprised to hear such a statement. It certainly did not hold good in our section, not only on our property, but also on the adjoining property which was owned by a Scotch syndicate. It was most as large as our own, and afterwards sold to the Terrazas. It do not think there was an institution or large agricultural interest in this country that was better conducted than the San Isidro, the adjoining property to us.

Mr. KEARFUL. You heard what John Lind said about what he called conscript labor. Did you know anything about that in your locality?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We certainly did not. I do not think it existed in our section of the State or anywhere in the State of Chihuahua, I might say, because I was familiar with conditions there.

Mr. KEARFUL. You employed your workmen by voluntary contract with them?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How did you treat them?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We considered that they were better treated by ourselves after we became owners of that property—in fact, that was their own statement. That was largely on account of housing conditions that we furnished for them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you charge them anything for the houses?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any schools or churches on your place?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir. We had a church there that was in bad condition, the roof had fallen in on it and the walls were in bad condition. We restored that. It was a Catholic church. There had been no services held there for, I would say, perhaps 40 or 50 years before we became owners of the place. We also started a school in one of our buildings and were so well pleased with the attendance that we built a new two-room schoolhouse in a very desirable place right on top of the hill. We leveled it off and made a nice playground for the children there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the children of your employees generally attend this school?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Very fully. In fact, it developed so that we found it was even necessary for us to build an addition to this or build another one at a separate location.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were the Mexicans assessed for the maintenance of the school or the church?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir. We paid that ourselves out of our own funds.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive any aid from the Mexican Government for this school?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We did not ask for it and we did not receive it. We would have been entitled to compensation for them, but it was an experiment with us.

Mr. KEARFUL. What benefits, if any, have you observed to result from the operation of American and other foreign capital in that section of Mexico?

Mr. SHEAHAN. If I could say that from the knowledge that I have of San Isidro and Salaices—San Isidro was the adjoining property and was on the east, and Salaices was on the west, with nearly the same acreage as our own. It was a great benefit, I say.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what ways?

Mr. SHEAHAN. In increasing the wage, not by giving them any less work on our own place. The Mexican peons would say, if they had occasion to express themselves, that they worked harder for us than they ever did previous to the time we became owners of the property, but that they were better treated and better paid. We paid them all once a month.

Mr. KEARFUL. They did not object to working harder, did they?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir. We found this: For the first four years, I might say, there was perhaps 60 per cent of our work that was development work. We made a distinction as to the wage that we paid men for working in the development work as against those who were working on the land in the usual way, because it was much harder work and longer hours in the development work and we made that distinction.

Mr. KEARFUL. In regard to the method of living, did the operations of foreigners result in any improvement for the natives?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Decidedly so, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what respect?

Mr. SHEAHAN. They were better fed. Mexicans that we had on development work we paid 12½ cents more a day and furnished them rations free, while they boarded themselves when they worked on the hacienda in the agricultural part of it. After we were working the first year on that, it became very apparent that the men whom we had on the development work were particularly anxious to be kept there, for the reason that they were better fed, better cared for, while working them harder and longer hours, but they had better pay. We used to pick out the very best class of the help and put it on the development work.

Mr. KEARFUL. What concessions, if any, did you have from the Mexican Government?

Mr. SHEAHAN. None whatever.

Mr. KEARFUL. You had no special privileges over anybody else?

Mr. SHEAHAN. None whatever, sir. We were offered, by the ministro de fomento—they passed a new law by which loans could be made for the purpose of developing water rights, and a larger amount of water retained for irrigating purposes, and also for stock raising. They urged us to become members and take advantage of that. We did not do so at any time. We financed our own proposition all the way through. The ministro de fomento also used to write us letters and comment as to what we were doing there. Other Americans that would go to Mexico City would be referred to us and to our place to show what had been done there in such a short time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is the country in that region of such character that it can be divided up into small tracts and operated advantageously in small tracts under individual ownership?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Possibly there might be parts of the valley land that could be utilized in that way, but the question would be what would be done with the grazing lands when you separated the one from the other.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is irrigation necessary in that region?

Mr. SHEAHAN. It is. We have about 60,000 acres where the Mexican Central Railroad runs for 52 miles through our property. On the east side of the railroad we have 30,000 acres skirting on the base of a low mountain. That land we have tested for sugar beets and we found that it contains of sugar from 3 to 5 per cent greater than the sugar beet that is grown in Colorado and also around Deming, N. Mex., but there was no market for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe among the natives any demand for division of large tracts among them?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir; not at that time. That was not thought of then.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you believe it to be practicable to divide up any large regions of that country into small tracts for individual operations by the peons?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I do not.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions as to security for life and property and protection of business operations from 1903, when you went there, until the fall of Porfirio Diaz, in 1911?

Mr. SHEAHAN. They were good. We never had any trouble. On the other hand, I used to send a peon into Jimenez when I was doing development work out on the ranch. He would bring me out $2,000 or $2,500 of money to pay off at the end of the month. He never had any fear of being held up by bandits or anything of that kind, nor had we.

Mr. KEARFUL. There are no bandits in that region?

Mr. SHEAHAN. There were not at that time; no, sir. There were some cattle thieves in the valley, but they were severely handled by the rurales.

Mr. KEARFUL. The rurales were an organization of mounted police maintained by the Government?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was there a change in that condition of security, if at all?

Mr. SHEAHAN. After the death of Madero.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened then?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Then we began to have our real trouble.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not have any trouble during the time of the revolution of Madero against Diaz?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We lost some live stock, and also they would come and get goods out of our store, and provisions and everything of that kind, and grain, but we got receipts for everything that Madero's forces ever took from us that we knew of. We would find animals killed on the range and the meat partly carried off and the balance of the carcass left on the range. That was very slight.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was Madero's operating general in that region?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I do not remember.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he Pascual Orozco?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes; part of the time. Then there was a change after that, but I have forgotten who it was after that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened then, after the fall of Madero?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Then was about the time that our troubles commenced, and as time went on it was increased all the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who caused the trouble?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Carranza's forces principally, and Villa was operating with the Carranza forces.

Mr. KEARFUL. That began in 1913, shortly after the fall of Madero?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes; 1914 was, perhaps, the beginning of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please describe briefly and in a general way just what happened from that time forth.

Mr. SHEAHAN. They would send out a force, making demand for so many head of steers and so many horses, and we would make a demand for receipts, and they would ignore our demand, and we would send some of our own force out for gathering the live stock that they required. They took at one time from an inclosed pasture that we had, I think, 171 saddle horses. We made a practice of breaking the horses for the range and keeping them in inclosed pastures after they were broken. They cleaned up the whole bunch of them, about 151 of them.

These Percheron stallions that we had, that were absolutely of no value for military service, were taken and ridden away. We had one valuable horse that cost us over $4,000. We found him about 5 miles from our headquarters, lying on the roadside, dead.

Mr. KEARFUL. Ridden to death?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes; ridden to death.

Mr. KEARFUL. What destruction of your property occurred?

Mr. SHEAHAN. About the latter part of 1917 we had asked the American consul here to assist us in getting protection. We had grown crops, gradually getting acreages smaller every year, hoping that by the time that crop would mature and be ready to harvest that the troubles would be over and we would have something to go on to make a start. But every time they would allow us to gather the crop, and after it was gathered they would take it. We got no benefit from it whatever.

This time he interceded for us and got a pledge from the general in charge of the Federal troops in Chihuahua that he would send 50 soldiers out to protect the crops when they were thrashing.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was this general?

Mr. SHEAHAN. That I can not remember. He sent the soldiers out there and they began taking the grain from us almost as fast as it was thrashed, taking it off by wagon loads. Finally they got liquor somewhere and the captain of this force of 50 men that they had out there set fire to the buildings at headquarters of this particular hacienda. We had nine communities, you might say, in the valley from one end to the other. We used to build a warehouse that would accommodate all of the tenants in that community, and they would jointly have a certain space in the warehouse for their crops. The grain was in there and this captain set fire to the buildings and cleaned out the whole community. He gave them an hour to get their stuff out of the buildings. When we protested, the general made a claim that they were aiding Villa, that they were in sympathy with Villa, and that was the reason why the buildings were burned.

Mr. KEARFUL. That who was in sympathy with Villa?

Mr. SHEAHAN. These tenants.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your tenants?

Mr. SHEAHAN. On our place. That has been one thing that occurred all the way through that we had guarded at all times, and that is not to have any man or anybody else show any disposition to aid either side.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there any truth in this pretext, so far as you know, about your men being in sympathy with Villa?

Mr. SHEAHAN. The only thing you might say, I think, in regard to that is that when the Villa forces were in there they were just the same as the Carranza forces, and would come there and make demands for feed or for whatever was on the place, and it was absolutely necessary that it should be given up to them.

Mr. KEARFUL. When that was done, the other side would come in and say they were sympathizers and destroy the property?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir. We had an instance of that kind less than three months ago. Carranza forces came to our headquarters. There was a man that was now nearly 50 years old, born on the place, who has been acting as sort of foreman for us there. They went into his house and gathered up all his blankets and bedclothes and everything that they could find. He protested and they turned to and very nearly killed him. They beat him over the head—the captain or man in charge of the soldiers beat him over the head with his pistol, and if it had not been for a woman that grappled with this captain they would have killed the man.

Mr. KEARFUL. This was a Carranza captain?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes; he was a Carranza captain, and just over the things that were absolutely necessary for them to protect themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there ever any pretense of payment or giving receipts for the property and things taken?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What would they say when they would come and take things?

Mr. SHEAHAN. That it was a demand from such and such a general.

Mr. KEARFUL. What would be the ground of his demand?

Mr. SHEAHAN. That he wanted the property, that he wanted some of the steers, that he wanted so much of the grain, or whatever it might be.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there ever any promise made upon taking these things to pay for them?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Never.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any protest against their being taken?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Nearly every time that we had a serious loss of that kind I reported it to the State Department as a matter of record, but we never got any satisfaction from it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean the American State Department?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any steps having been taken by the American State Department for your protection?

Mr. SHEAHAN. They would make reply to the protest that we entered, saying that the matter had been referred to Mexico City with request that they take action in the matter, and perhaps later on we would get a letter with a copy of the protest that was made in Mexico City, but we never had any satisfaction out of any of the protests that we ever made.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the condition of that hacienda now?

Mr. SHEAHAN. It is a total wreck, you may say.

Mr. KEARFUL. What about any of the fine stock there that you took there?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No; there is no fine stock left there. There may be some scattered cattle on the range which you may term as wild cattle, but no herds, just stray cattle that would be off by themselves, that they would overlook or something like that. We have no record and no means of knowing whether there is one there or whether there are 100.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are the lands being cultivated?

Mr. SHEAHAN. In small acreages by the peons that have lived on the place all their lives.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you get any returns from them?

Mr. SHEAHAN. None whatever. Even the peons that worked this land with the understanding that we would get a share of it, have had the greater portions of their crops taken as well as our own. We have entered protests against that time and again.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have any trouble with your workmen or employees on the place at all?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they loyal to you?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Very much so; that is, up to the time of the revolution beginning. There was quite a number of the younger element that went out principally with Villa.

In explanation of that I might make this statement. We had a man on our property who had leased a couple of thousand acres of land for cash rent. He subleased that to peons on shares and made a very good profit on the transaction. His name was Chavez. The Chavez family was quite a wealthy family at one time. They were freighters and had been for two or three generations. Before the railroads were built through there, they freighted from the City of Mexico or from Vera Cruz clear up to the northern boundary line. This Joe Chavez, from the time he was 15 years old, more of a Spaniard than he was a Mexican, a great big tall man about 6 feet 2 inches, had been what you might call a freight foreman. He had a train of freighters under his charge and he knew the country remarkably well. He went out with Villa along about 1916. He took quite a number of younger men with him, not only on our place, but at Reguladora, which is 18 miles from our quarters, and also from Puebla, which is just across the boundary line from our land on the north. He made up quite a following for Villa in that section. He was afterwards quite noted with Villa. You have no doubt seen his name quite often as Col. Chavez.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe about the motives of the young men who joined the revolution, judging from their acts?

Mr. SHEAHAN. That was after I was unable to go down to the property. Of course I knew but very little about that. Their parents still lived on the property and still live there now. There have been quite a number of young men killed, but the older people have been loyal and are living on the property and have shown no disposition to destroy any portion of the property.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the young men join the revolution because they wanted the lands divided up or because they were oppressed by the land owners?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir; it was more, I think, Chavez's personality that induced them to go with him. He is quite a noted character.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think were his motives?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Simply, I suppose, that he thought—I do not know what inducement was given by Villa. Chavez was a very valuable man to Villa, knowing the country as he did clear down as far south as Torreon, and perhaps farther south than that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think he was actuated by motives of patriotism to establish democracy in Mexico by eliminating the evils that Mr. Lind told about yesterday?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I would not think so from the acquaintance that I had with Chavez. He was one of the best men that we had on the place and gave us every assistance that he possibly could at any time and was very friendly to us. My son lived there three years after I gave up going down there and lived on the place as manager of it, and he always regarded Joe Chavez as one of his reliable friends. He always said that any advice he wanted he felt he could call on Joe Chavez to tell him how to act.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to observe the motives of the Carrancistas with special reference to Mr. Lind's theory that the revolutionists of the north were actuated by high ideals?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Perhaps there was an element of that kind from what they gained from Madero more than anything else, particularly in the Reguladora Valley, because that is where Madero gathered his first forces. What took place south of there was simply an uprising. There were a lot of idle miners. The price of silver and copper was so low that the mines could not operate and left the entire mining force there without work and idle, and many of them without much to eat. They were ready to take up anything again after they got a little stronger. This property, which had been transferred to Terrazas, which adjoined us, San Isidro, was a ground of prey for them. They thought Terrazas was not for Madero's government, and whenever they could get anything off the property of Terrazas they were at liberty to take it, and they immediately commenced plundering that before they commenced doing serious damage to anybody else.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did it appear from their acts that the opportunity to plunder property was one of the moving causes for young men joining the revolution?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I would not think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. You would not?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. You are speaking now about the Madero revolution?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you say about the Carranza revolution, judging from what they did?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I would say that that was quite different. Young men that were born and raised on our place were only too ready to go out and get as much off the premises as they possibly could. They gave information, as nearly as we could find out, of just where the best opportunity was to get herds of cattle. For a couple of years we shifted our stock from one place to another so as to get them as far from the railroad as possible and at the same time keep them within the range where we could get water.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you make any attempts to get your cattle and other live stock out of the country when you saw it was being stolen?

Mr. SHEAHAN. At one time we gathered 600 head of 3-year-old steers for the purpose of shipping them out to Fort Worth, Tex. We fed those steers, after we rounded them up, for six weeks. We were promised at first, intending to ship them in train loads, that we could get cars to move them. Afterwards we were finally denied cars, and they said they could not be shipped out of the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of those cattle?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We turned them loose on the range again, after having herded them in inclosed pastures for that length of time, and we never realized a dollar out of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of them?

Mr. SHEAHAN. They were stolen.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they eventually shipped out by some one?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir. At one time there was a lot of cattle driven off the place, but we never could trace where they came across the border. We had men on the border watching for them. Our view was that they were slaughtered at different points, Torreon, and also upon the border farther north.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was your experience with your cattle a common experience of the people in that region?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. What happened to other plantations in that vicinity? Was it the same thing that happened to yours?

Mr. SHEAHAN. The same thing, yes. There was another very large ranch owned by a Russian Jew, who had a very large store at Jiminez. He had perhaps between 3,000 and 4,000 head of cattle. He lost every one of them in the same manner. He lost his before we did, because he was right on the railroad.

Mr. KEARFUL. How long has it been since you have been able to do anything down on that plantation?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We have not done anything there within the last four years; that is, we have done a little in the way of cropping, but nothing ourselves. We allow the peons to do what they can, because all our work stopped and all our implements were stolen.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your implements were taken, too?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Everything, even to the gasoline engines.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were any of the houses destroyed?

Mr. SHEAHAN. They burned the houses. There were six houses in that group that were destroyed, as well as the large granary or warehouse. They would take the doors and even strip the roof off. The roof is covered with adobe clay over heavy slats. They took the clay off the roof and took those slats and used them for firewood.

Mr. KEARFUL. Why is it that during the last four years you have been unable to operate there?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We have a Scotchman who was manager of the place at one time and afterwards manager of the range of cattle, who has lived in that country for 30 years. Until two months ago he had not been able to get out to our headquarters in the four years. His wife is dead, but he has a family of six small children and lives in Jiminez. They have had him out twice to shoot him. He started on foot from Jiminez to go to Torreon, being a British subject, to put himself under the protection of the British consul at that place, and finally got a lift by freight train or construction train that took him nearly half way. One night they had him out twice during the night, insisting that he had money belonging to the International Land & Live Stock Co., and they made demand upon him for that money. They took him out once and were going to shoot him. Finally that squad decided they would go back to the commanding officer and get further instructions. Another one came out about 1 o'clock in the morning and took him out again.

Mr. KEARFUL. The International Land & Live Stock Co. is the name of your company, is it?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he charged with any crime?

Mr. SHEAHAN. None whatever. He married a Mexican woman and his children were brought up in the Catholic Church, and his wife was a Catholic.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the prevailing religion of the natives in that region?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Roman Catholic, perhaps 98 per cent.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did you observe about the influence of the Catholic Church upon the natives as to being good or bad?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I would say that in our section the natives would be better off if they were not under the control of the church.

Mr. KEARFUL. For what reason do you say that?

Mr. SHEAHAN. For this reason: There seems to be a feeling that if you oppose the church that you will meet with opposition, and serious opposition at that, from the church or from the priests, and that that will have its influence on the peons. We ourselves got along quite well. We had little difficulties at times, but I think they always thought that we had done more than our share to sustain a church at the place, which they had not done for 50 years before that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe whether the priests had any influence in civil affairs?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes; they would try to. We had little experience of that kind, nothing that was very serious, but it showed that they were accustomed to have it.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say they tried to. Did the church control the civil authorities in any way?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No; I would not say that they controlled them.

Mr. KEARFUL. The influence that you observed was the influence of the priests over the peons?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that influence was not for the benefit of the peons?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No; we did not think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the peons would be better off without any religion?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I would not be inclined to think so. I do not think they would.

Mr. KEARFUL. What efforts did you make to get protection from the American Government for your properties in Mexico aside from the protests that you spoke of?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I can not say that we ever made any. I have repeatedly come before the Secretary of State, particularly during Bryan's time when he was Secretary of State, but I never went away from him that I did not feel like pulling my hair after I had had a conversation with Bryan.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did have a conversation with Bryan in regard to the protection of Americans in Mexico, did you?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Mr. Bryan's attitude?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I came to Washington at one time and brought maps and other papers that I had that I thought would be of benefit to show him where our property was and how it was located and what we had done in the way of development. After we got through, he intimated that we belonged to the class that went into Mexico to get rich quick and now we were coming to him and asking to have the Government of this country ask for intervention; that, while we did not ask for it in so many words, we were like all the others that came in the same way. That was about the attitude that he had toward us.

When we bought this property our friends, many of them, said we had been cheated, that we had paid too much for it. It was heavily mortgaged and the mortgage only had six months to run, and perhaps if we had not spent a vast amount of money in developing that, the statement that we had paid too much for our property would have been true; but with the expenditures and with the increase that we could produce, both in the acreage in the valley and also on the range, increasing it 150 per cent, perhaps that statement would have been true—that we paid too much for it. But when we came to Bryan he intimated that we had stolen it from the poor Mexicans; that they were now trying to get it back again; and that we were not really entitled to very much consideration.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he interested in your maps and plans and papers and the story of your development of that region?

Mr. SHEAHAN. To some extent he was interested. It looked as if instead of taking into consideration what we had done in the way of developing property, that he considered it as a property that was worth that amount of money before we put any money into it and that we had gotten it for half what it was worth. That was about the way he looked at it. It did not seem as though he took into consideration that we had spent nearly as much in developing it as we had originally paid for it, and what he was looking at on the map at that time was the property after it had been developed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did it seem to be his attitude that it was the right of the revolutionists to take it away from you?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Along that line; that we were not entitled to any consideration from this Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. You were put into that class that has been spoken of by Mr. Bryan and others as speculators engaged in plundering the Mexican people?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that about his attitude?

Mr. SHEAHAN. We were classed among that class. There was no distinction drawn between the men who had gone there and paid value for any property that they bought, and others. Of course there were people who were speculators, both in mining property and in timber property and perhaps in agriculture, but less in agriculture than any of the others, I think.

I was also instrumental at a later date, myself and Mr. Warren, of Three Oaks, Mich., and Mr. Newman, of El Paso, in getting up a committee of 21 representing the largest interests that there were in the State of Chihuahua, and also in Sonora, and by appointment we had a conference with Secretary Bryan. He immediately opened up along the same line and did not give us an opportunity even to tell what we came there for. He asked why we were not honest in what we came there for; that we came there for the purpose of asking intervention and that we were not honest in saying that we had any other purpose in view but that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that your purpose?

Mr. SHEAHAN. It was not our purpose. We came there as a matter of securing information as to what was best for us to do to protect our property.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the advice he had to give you?

Mr. SHEAHAN. None whatever. It almost ended in a squabble.

Mr. KEARFUL. While you were operating in Mexico did you know of advice that he did give to Americans operating there as to what they should do?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir; not at that time, I did not. I have since learned that.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the advice that he gave them?

Mr. SHEAHAN. It was not very encouraging.

Mr. KEARFUL. I mean as to what they should do while he was Secretary of State?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I did not quite understand your question. Afterwards I had a personal interview with him and he urged me very strongly to bring this Scotchman and his family out of Mexico. At that time we had two other Americans there, and he urged me to bring them out and abandon the property entirely.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know about notices that were given out several times to Americans in Mexico to get out of Mexico?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes. I met some of the Mormons that had come over from the Mormon settlements, coming out of Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the effect upon properties of Americans in Mexico when they were forced to go out?

Mr. SHEAHAN. It was just a question of abandoning them, as it was everybody's property. It was a total loss to them all.

Mr. KEARFUL. You went to Mexico in 1903?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know something about an article published by Mr. Bryan in The Commoner in January, 1903, in regard to Mexico?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir; I did not know it at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. You know it now.

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does the attitude taken by him at that time compare with the attitude taken afterwards when he was Secretary of State?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Entirely the opposite. His statements in 1903, as we found the situation in our section were correct. We found that the Mexican Government was particularly anxious to get us particularly in the agricultural interests, that they wanted the valley lands to be developed and to produce larger crops.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Bryan, in 1903, as shown by his article was enthusiastic about the establishment of centers of American civilization in Mexico, was he not?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir; and we felt the same way for five or six years.

Mr. KEARFUL. Afterwards when he became Secretary of State he was not so enthusiastic about the centers of American civilization?

Mr. SHEAHAN. According to his attitude at that time we had no rights at all, but we had gone there for plunder.

Mr. KEARFUL. If the committee has been instructed by resolution of the Senate unanimously adopted to report to the Senate what, if any, measure should be taken to prevent the recurrence of such outrages; what advice would you give which might enable the committee to make an intelligent report as to what, if any, measures should be taken to prevent a recurrence of such outrages as you have related?

Mr. SHEAHAN. My own idea, and I think it is true of my associates, is that if some action could be taken by the Government of the United States similar to the action that was taken in Cuba, it would be the most pleasurable methods, particularly in northern Mexico, say the five States in northern Mexico; that it could be handled in that way at less loss of life and greater protection of property, and at the same time it would be one of the greatest blessings I think that the Mexican people could possibly have. With the masses I do not believe it would meet any serious objection.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think the Mexicans themselves would welcome such a measure?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I think so, from what I know of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean that great body of people?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir; both rich and poor.

Mr. KEARFUL. Educated and illiterate?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think that would be beneficial to the Mexicans as well as opposing protection to American rights?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I know it. I am absolutely convinced on that point, and that it would be a blessing to them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that the Mexicans generally, after they became convinced that the good intentions of this Government, would cooperate to establish permanent law and order under the supervision of this Government?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I believe they would. Yes; the masses, I think, would do that. They have had some opportunity to learn just what benefits they had when the Americans have gone in there, both in the mining districts, and also in agriculture and other lines. The conditions have been bettered instead of being as politicians in Mexico would have them believe. I know in our own case the masses of our people on our place, perhaps 98 per cent of them, would say they are far better off and fare better in every respect under our management than they ever did before. The greatest protests that we had after we went into Mexico were from adjoining and other haciendas in the district, that we were giving the peon more liberties and better pay than he had been accustomed to getting, and it was going to disturb general conditions in the Agna Fria Valley.

Mr. KEARFUL. This objection was on the part of Mexicans or Mexican landholders?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes; and also we met with protests from managers of the Scotch syndicate, who were most excellent people, but they looked upon it as a bad move, and the only way that we could explain that was that 70 per cent of our work was development work and was not connected with the agricultural part of the work, and did that work that was necessary that we should put in longer hours, and that we were willing to pay for the services of a better class of people that were willing to take with those conditions and that we were also feeding them at our expense instead of them feeding themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think your disposition to treat them better than they had been treated before operated to create disturbances?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. KEARFUL. How could people derive any benefits from the revolution that you had seen?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No. On two different occasions our store has been stripped of everything that was in it in the way of overalls and that class of stock that we kept for the working class of people, and at our own expense we have replenished that, giving it out to the peons on the place, so that they could be protected.

Mr. KEARFUL. They have been in a condition of poverty?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Very much so.

Mr. KEARFUL. And starvation?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Nearly so; many of the older people are quite so. That is the hard part of it, when the Mexican people themselves, poor and old, people who can work a small tract of land and raise beans are robbed, when their own people will come along and deliberately take their stocks of supplies. The strong able-bodied soldier that could work and earn his own living will rob the poor peon who is old and crippled.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I care to ask. Is there anything further you would like to say?

Mr. SHEAHAN. I do not know of anything further that I could give any information about further than that I might say in connection with the schools that the school we have established was, we felt, one of the best moves that we ever made. We established, as I said, a good school there, a two-room school, and hired a teacher at our own expense. That met with some opposition from the Catholic Church when we first started it. They thought that a school ought to be under their control and provision.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the opposition on the part of the Catholic Church sustained by the civil authorities?

Mr. SHEAHAN. To my knowledge, it was never referred to the civil authorities. It was a matter between the priests and ourselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did establish a school under your own supervision?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What became of the school after the revolution got into control?

Mr. SHEAHAN. It went to pieces.

Mr. KEARFUL. There is no school there now?

Mr. SHEAHAN. No; there is no school there now, and there is no church there now—that is, no services.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is there anything further you wish to tell the committee?

Mr. SHEAHAN. Nothing further.

Mr. KEARFUL. The committee are very much obliged to you.
(Thereupon, at 11.20 o'clock a. m., the committee adjourned.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 29, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The following testimony was taken at Washington, D. C., April 29, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF SHERBURNE G. HOPKINS.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state your name?

Mr. HOPKINS. Sherburne G. Hopkins.

Mr. KEARFUL. And your age?

Mr. HOPKINS. Fifty-one.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your occupation?

Mr. HOPKINS. Lawyer.

Mr. KEARFUL. Your office is located where?

Mr. HOPKINS. 723 Fifteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you ever engaged as attorney for Venustiano Carranza, the present President of Mexico?

Mr. HOPKINS. I was consulted by that gentleman, as chief of the revolutionary cause, at various times between April 1, 1913, and September 15, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were you in Washington at the time of what was known as the Niagara conference, in June, 1914?

Mr. HOPKINS. I was.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was a conference between representatives of President Huerta and representatives of this Government, for the purpose of settling the difficulties that then existed between the two governments, was it not?

Mr. HOPKINS. It was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember whether or not, in the course of that conference, there was an understanding that an embargo upon arms and ammunition going to Mexico would be laid by this Government, and that such an embargo was laid?

Mr. HOPKINS. Such is my understanding.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember whether or not it is true, as testified by Mr. Buckley, that, in violation of the terms of that agreement and of that embargo, a shipment of arms and ammunition went on the Antilla from this country to Tampico?

Mr. HOPKINS. My understanding is that subsequent to the arrangement mentioned, a shipment of arms was made on the Cuban steamship Antilla, sailing from New York to Tampico, and the ammunition was there delivered.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any knowledge of the circumstance, as testified to by Mr. Buckley, that that was done with the knowledge and consent of Secretary Bryan?

Mr. HOPKINS. I know that intimations were conveyed to the representatives of the revolutionary party in the United States that they would be permitted to ship munitions of war from ports of the United States to Cuba, and that this Government would close its eyes to the fact that the vessels would not proceed to Cuba, but would proceed to Tampico; that in doing that the vessels would be subject to a nominal fine. As a result, several cargoes were shipped from Texas ports, the vessels were fined, and the fines subsequently remitted by authority of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know John Lind?

Mr. HOPKINS. I know Mr. Lind.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his connection with the American Government at that time?

Mr. HOPKINS. I never met Mr. Lind but twice, on each occasion most casually. On the first occasion I met him in the café at the Willard, when I was introduced to him by some newspaper men, I think, shortly after the embargo to which you refer had been laid. Mr. Lind, upon ascertaining that I occupied the relationship to Mr. Carranza that I did, spoke to me quite freely about the situation in Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Before going into that, Mr. Hopkins, the question was, what connection did Mr. Lind have at that time with this Government?

Mr. HOPKINS. Confidential agent of the Department of State at Mexico City.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was known as the personal representative of President Wilson, was he not?

Mr. HOPKINS. He was popularly so known.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was there at that time in Washington a revolutionary junta in the interest of the Carranza revolution?

Mr. HOPKINS. There was a confidential agency accredited here, the head of which was Mr. Rafael Zubaran, together with one or two secretaries. At the same time Mr. Luis Cabrera was here unofficially, working more or less in harmony with Mr. Zubaran.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Buckley testified, page 793 of the record:

Mr. Lind, personal representative of the President and active Carranza revolutionary agent, was then in Washington, extremely busy as a messenger between the Carranza revolutionary junta and the State Department.

Do you regard that as a correct statement of Mr. Lind's activities?

Mr. HOPKINS. There is no doubt but what Mr. Lind circulated very freely in revolutionary circles, according to my recollection, and my further understanding is that his compensation as a representative of the Department of State did not cease until a subsequent date.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Buckley further testified, on the same page:

On June 6 a million cartridges were shipped on the steamship Sunshine from Galveston to Tampico. Thereafter the schooners Sunshine, Grampus, and Suson made six trips from Galveston to Tampico, each time carrying shipments of war material to the Carranza revolutionaries; all these boats, according to the speech of Representative Rogers, previously referred to, were consigned to Habana, but "by stress of water they were blown to Tampico."

Is that a fair statement of the shipments that you were referring to a moment ago?

Mr. HOPKINS. My understanding is that it is a correct statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. I have here from the Congressional Library a copy of the New York Herald of Tuesday, June 30, 1914, which purports to contain a facsimile letter addressed by you to Mr. Carranza, at that time known as the first chief of the constitutionalists. Will you please state whether or not that is a correct facsimile of a letter that you sent to Mr. Carranza?

Mr. HOPKINS. That is a correct facsimile of the draft of a letter which I made to be sent to Mr. Carranza, and which was subsequently dispatched.

Mr. KEARFUL. The letter is dated May 8, 1914, and in it you make the following statement:

Mr. Lind told me recently, and as he has subsequently intimated to Mr. Villareal that in case it was found impracticable to permit the exportation of war material, that you should arrange to export such as was needed from some port on the Gulf, preferably Mobile or Pensacola, in small vessels to Cuba, which upon arrival at some port on that island might alter their course to the mouth of the Rio Bravo. I have discussed this matter with Mr. Santiago Winfield, who knows the country in that locality and who informs me that large schooners or steamers of moderate size can approach within half a mile of a place called "Barril," a few miles south of the mouth of the river, where the cargo could be easily landed in launches. Mr. Lind assured me very positively that there would be no interference whatsoever with shipments made in this way, and in case Tampico is not taken I respectfully invite your special attention to the matter.

Mr. Lind testified before this committee day before yesterday. The paragraph just read to you was read to him, and he was asked whether he had given the advice and made the assurances stated by you in that paragraph, and he very positively and emphatically denied ever having given such advice or made such assurances. What have you to say in regard to it?

Mr. HOPKINS. I stated in answer to a previous question, I was introduced to Mr. Lind at the Willard Hotel, I think by a newspaper man, a friend of mine, during the lunch hour. In the course of the conversation which followed, which involved ammunition supplies, Mr. Lind advised me that shipments might be made from southern ports to the Mexican coast via Habana, all vessels leaving American ports with ammunition to clear for a port in Cuba, thereafter altering their course and proceeding to the coast of Mexico. That, he stated, would avoid any complications, whereas the embargo was of such a nature that ammunition would not be permitted to go across the frontier; that is to say, across the Rio Grande or Rio Bravo.

Mr. KEARFUL. Then, as I understand you, the statements made by you in the paragraph just quoted, and which Mr. Lind denied, were true?

Mr. HOPKINS. Absolutely correct, written contemporaneously with the assurances given me by Mr. Lind.

Mr. KEARFUL. How would you account for Mr. Lind's denial?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have no idea, unless possibly he has forgotten the conversation.

Mr. KEARFUL. He denied having any knowledge whatever of any arrangement for the shipment of arms or ammunition to the revolutionaries in evasion of the embargo or otherwise, and denied having any knowledge or ever having heard of any such shipments having been made. Do you know whether at that time he was interested in the matter of aiding the revolution under Carranza in this manner?

Mr. HOPKINS. The tone of the conversation was distinctly in favor of the revolutionary cause, and I understood his suggestions to me to have been made for the purpose of having it communicated to the proper authorities, who would make shipments. It was for that reason that I wrote Mr. Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please state whether or not the shipments referred to in your letter as being advised by Mr. Lind were subsequently made.

Mr. HOPKINS. They were.

Mr. KEARFUL. And they were made by ships clearing for a Cuban port and diverted to Mexico?

Mr. HOPKINS. They were.

Mr. KEARFUL. And their cargoes were delivered?

Mr. HOPKINS. They were, except two, which I think were sunk en route, subsequently salvaged, and resold to the Carranza government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember another letter written by you to Mr. Carranza on May 10, 1914, in which you state that President Wilson—has discreetly permitted it to be known that in his opinion why you (Carranza) should not consent to mediation in respect to the internal affairs of Mexico, because in the opinion of the American Government, as in your own opinion, the only way to pacify the country would be the complete triumph of the revolution.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is my understanding.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know it to be the sentiment of President Wilson at that time that the only way to pacify Mexico would be by the complete triumph of the Carranza revolution?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think that impression was general among newspaper men who visited the White House and who gained their impressions from conversations with persons high in authority.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember this statement in a letter written by you at that time to Mr. Carranza:

In respect to the proposition for mediation for a peaceful solution of the present struggle, I trust that you will not permit yourself to be influenced in any way by Mr. Bryan, who in my opinion will be disposed to sacrifice any great principle in the interest of his own political career. That is being demonstrated every day and is well known to the majority of political observers.

Do you remember that?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do; and those were my sentiments then and those are my sentiments now.

Mr. KEARFUL. What reason do you have to believe that Mr. Bryan, with respect to this particular matter, would be disposed to sacrifice principle in the interest of his own political career?

Mr. HOPKINS. My impression was that if Mr. Bryan through negotiations or otherwise might bring about a situation which would compel Carranza to enter into engagements which would limit the objects of the revolution, that he might, if it suited his purpose, compel Carranza to adopt a course by which those ends would be defeated.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember stating further in that letter along the same line as follows:

It is for that reason that I have looked upon the offers of mediation by Argentina, Brazil, and Chile with much apprehension, feeling that Mr. Bryan might in some way so ally himself to their purposes as to neutralize the present dominant position which the revolutionists enjoy. Mr. Bryan pretends to be a great apostle of peace and because of that pretension has invariably indicated a willingness to embark on a peace-at-any-price policy.

Do you remember making that statement?

Mr. HOPKINS. I did make such a statement.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that a true statement as to Mr. Bryan's position?

Mr. HOPKINS. I consider it so, as demonstrated by subsequent events.

Mr. KEARFUL. In the same letter do you remember making this statement:

Mr. Lind is as much opposed to mediation or compromise as you yourself, enjoying the confidence of the President, and can, I believe, speak with more authority than Mr. Bryan.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is the impression I gained at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. You remember making that statement, do you?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that to be a correct statement of the position of confidence enjoyed by Mr. Lind?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you gain that impression by reason of your connection with the revolutionary enterprise of Carranza, as his legal adviser here?

Mr. HOPKINS. I gained that impression through the two conversations that I had with Mr. Lind, through conversations that I had with others who had discussed the matter with Mr. Lind, and through conversations with representatives of Carranza in Washington who had also talked to Mr. Lind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who were those representatives of Carranza?

Mr. HOPKINS. Don Felicitos Villareal, who at that time was acting as secretary of the department of finance of the Carranza Government; Mr. Zubaran, and others whom I can not remember, including many newspaper men.

Mr. KEARFUL. By the way, do you know what became of Felicitos Villareal?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please state what became of him?

Mr. HOPKINS. He died. He was imprisoned by Carranza in the latter part of 1915, if I recall correctly, was kept in the penitentiary in Mexico City for about two years, and upon his release died.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his offense?

Mr. HOPKINS. Hostility to Carranza personally.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did it have any connection with his duty as minister of finance and in refusing to obey the orders of Carranza in connection with the issue of paper money?

Mr. HOPKINS. That is true. He did refuse to permit his name to be used on a certain issue of paper money ordered by Carranza during the year 1915, as a result of which he abandoned Carranza and took sides with what was known as the convention government. Subsequently he was arrested by Carranza's order and confined in the penitentiary until shortly before his death. He was one of the best Mexicans I ever knew, by the way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he belong to that class of young Mexicans who have sometimes been referred to as having joined the Carranza revolution with enthusiastic patriotism for the progress of the country and who subsequently became disillusioned?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir. Villareal was a man of very superior education, a very practical man. He had great hopes in the future of his country. He became disillusioned through the selfishness of Carranza and his great desire to center all power in himself at no matter what cost to the country.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any knowledge of the connection, if any, between John Lind and Carranza?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have no personal knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is it true, as testified to heretofore, that he was very active in procuring the recognition by this Government of the Carranza Government as the Government of Mexico?

Mr. HOPKINS. I have heard of it only. My relation to the Carranza Government ceased in September, 1914.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the circumstances attending the severance of your relation to the Carranza Government?

Mr. HOPKINS. At the City of Mexico one day Mr. Carranza advised me that after serious consideration he had decided that a lengthy preconstitutional period would be essential before reestablishing a real civil government; that is to say, before reestablishing the constitutional order. I had been for a long time very much opposed to any such idea, because I foresaw a looting of the country in the event the constitutional order was not immediately restored upon the triumphant entry of the revolutionary forces into the capital. I had endeavored in every possible way to impress upon Mr. Carranza the absolute necessity for such a course: First, in the interest of good government; second, as a vindication of the revolutionary cause. As a matter of fact, the revolution was initiated because of the overthrow of government and defeat of the constitution by Huerta. Therefore, I maintain it was the duty of the revolutionists, after the overthrow of Huerta, to restore the constitution forthwith, and I frequently told Mr. Carranza that was my opinion; that if he did not follow that course, he would stultify himself. Hence, when he advised me that in his opinion a lengthy preconstitutional period would be essential before restoring the constitution, I asked his permission to retire and immediately returned to Washington. Since that time I have had no correspondence or relationship with him.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it the fundamental basis of the revolution by Carranza that the constitution of 1857, as subsequently amended during the time of Diaz, would be reestablished?

Mr. HOPKINS. It was; it was upon that basis that he gained the adherence of the better classes.

Mr. KEARFUL. And also gained the sympathy of the American people.

Mr. HOPKINS. Most decidedly.

Mr. KEARFUL. The very name of the movement was a catchword, indicating that as the fundamental basis of the revolution, as they understood it, was it not?

Mr. HOPKINS. The very name adopted by the revolutionists indicated its purpose.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was that name?

Mr. HOPKINS. The Constitutionalist Forces, Ejercito Constitucionalista. You will understand, in this connection, from the name adopted, that Carranza evidently as far back as 1914 had the idea of perpetuating himself in power. No one dreamed of it at the time, but now we can see it all. He refused to establish a provisional government, and even the paper money issued by his authority bore no other obligation than that of the Constitutionalist Forces, of which he was the first chief. He adopted that means in order to avoid any semblance of conflict with the principles of "no reelection," which was the symbol of the previous revolution led by Madero.

against President Diaz. He believed that, upon the triumph of the revolution, instead of being provisional president, by continuing his power as first chief, he might seek election, and thereby hold office for a further period of four years. It was with that end in view, that upon the triumph of the cause in August, 1914, he soon thereafter assumed the powers of the government, styling himself "first chief of the Constitutionalist Forces, encharged with the executive power," notwithstanding the plan of Guadalupe, which was the basic plan of the revolution, required him to assume the provisional presidency. Subsequent events have shown his true motive.

Mr. KEARFUL. You mean the provisional presidency under the constitution?

Mr. HOPKINS. The provisional presidency for the purpose of calling an election.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under the constitution?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir; and under the plan of Guadalupe also. Subsequent events have shown why he adopted that policy.

Mr. KEARFUL. To what events do you refer?

Mr. HOPKINS. His actions during the last three years, looking to his continuance in power beyond the constitutional period, and in violation of the spirit of the Mexican constitution, thereby inviting revolution.

Mr. KEARFUL. What acts have you in mind?

Mr. HOPKINS. The removal of constitutionally elected governors of the several States; the use of the military in browbeating the people; the naming of military governors in States where the people were entitled to elect them; the use of the military for electioneering purposes, and the inauguration of a generally unsettled condition from one end of Mexico to the other, hoping thereby to bring about a state of things that would enable him to either declare an election impossible or to nullify such election as might be held, in order that a subservient congress might name him as president ad interim to compose matters.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you regard the government of Carranza as a success in the reestablishment of peace and order throughout Mexico.

Mr. HOPKINS. His government has been a ghastly failure. He had every opportunity possible under the circumstances, but cast every chance to the winds, thinking only of his own political future and ambition for power.

Mr. KEARFUL. In what respect has it been a failure?

Mr. HOPKINS. He has neither complied with his promises, pacified the country, or inaugurated the reforms demanded by the people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Has he complied with any of the governmental international obligations?

Mr. HOPKINS. It is one of the greatest problems in Mexico to-day, one of the problems that has done more to excite the people against him than any other thing. In fact, it is one of the bases of the present revolution against his authority.

Mr. KEARFUL. What has he done, if anything, towards the discharge of the financial obligations of Mexico?

Mr. HOPKINS. Absolutely nothing.

Mr. KEARFUL. It is stated that the revenues under the Carranza rule have been very much larger than they were under the rule of Porfirio Diaz.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have been given to so understand.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if you know, has been done with those receipts, since no international financial obligations have been discharged?

Mr. HOPKINS. No one knows. That is one of the reasons that the people are demanding his exit at the present time.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if you know, has been his attitude toward foreigners and foreign interests in Mexico, especially Americans and American interests during the past three or four years?

Mr. HOPKINS. As a general proposition his attitude has been one of hostility.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know how he has manifested that?

Mr. HOPKINS. He has failed to give adequate protection; he has not permitted development that only foreign capital extends.

Mr. KEARFUL. Have you ever heard Luis Cabrera express his sentiments with respect to Americans operating in Mexico and their property?

Mr. HOPKINS. No, I never have, personally.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if you know, are the fundamental bases of the present revolution in Mexico, which originated in the State of Sonora some time ago?

Mr. HOPKINS. The people of Mexico generally have been in a great state of unrest for a lengthy period, due to the administration of public affairs by the Carranza government, which has complied with none of its promises or obligations and which apparently has had for its only object the vesting of power in Carranza himself and his continuation in office. The climax came when Carranza sent for Ignacio Bonillas, his ambassador to Washington, and named him as the candidate of the Civilista party for the presidency, that party being without membership or support of any kind, save by three or four gentlemen of Carranza's political family.

There never was such a thing heard of in Mexico City. That aroused a greater ill feeling than ever. And when Carranza, in order to rivet his hold upon the situation, initiated a movement looking to the military occupation of the State of Sonora, in order to do away with the authority of the State government, and remove the constitutional governor, the people of the State as a body rose up in arms, with the result that the legislature adopted a resolution suspending relations with the Federal Government until such time as their sovereign rights might be restored and respected.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, if you know, is the attitude of the leaders of that revolution toward foreign operators in Mexico, especially Americans?

Mr. HOPKINS. The leader of that revolution against the Carranza government is Gen. Alvaro Obregon, of the State of Sonora, who was Carranza's principal military chief during the revolution in 1913 and 1914. He formerly commanded the army corps in the northwest, and participated in the taking of Mexico City in August, 1914. Since he announced his candidacy in numerous speeches he has denounced the Carranza government because of its attitude toward foreign governments and toward foreigners, claiming that it is the duty of Mexico to accord that same treatment to foreigners which Mexico receives in other countries; also that it was the duty of the Mexican Government to respect all vested rights, and that if he were elected president he would guarantee that all rights acquired previous to the adoption of the 1917 constitution would be in every way respected. In numerous other respects Gen. Obregon has shown an absolutely sane appreciation of the duties of the country, as well as its international obligations, asserting that it was absolutely essential that Mexico cultivate by all means the friendliest relations with her neighbors, and not to be constantly annoying them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are the followers of Obregon in full accord with him in those sentiments?

Mr. HOPKINS. Absolutely; in every respect.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you believe that Obregon and his followers in the new revolution are sincere in the expression of their sentiments?

Mr. HOPKINS. I most assuredly do.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you arrive at that opinion from personal contact with them?

Mr. HOPKINS. I did; and I may add that Gen. Obregon's entire career shows him to be a man of singular consistency and tenacity of purpose. He himself can not be described as a politician. He is a farmer, who has never been engaged in politics until comparatively recently. He is supported by the best elements in the country, a good many of whom have been either educated in the United States or who have spent a good deal of time here and have been afforded opportunity to study the science of government and industrial development. These men are solidly behind Obregon.

Mr. KEARFUL. Are you familiar with Mexican history?

Mr. HOPKINS. Reasonably so.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you recall any instance in the history of Mexico where a military leader has achieved a signal victory and turned over the results of his victory to a civilian chief?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; Obregon himself achieved a victory in 1914, and turned the results over to Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any other instance in Mexican history where that has occurred?

Mr. HOPKINS. Unless we refer to Gen. Diaz turning over the government to Gonzalez.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was generally understood to be under the hand of Diaz, notwithstanding the four years of Gonzalez.

Mr. HOPKINS. Quite true. Nevertheless, he turned the government over to Gonzalez.

Mr. KEARFUL. And after four years took it himself.

Mr. HOPKINS. Again.

Mr. KEARFUL. Apart from that, is it your understanding that the only instance in the history of Mexico where a military chief turned over the fruits of a signal victory has been that of Obregon when he defeated Villa in 1915?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes. At that time Gen. Obregon returned to his farm in Sonora and remained there continuously until he began to campaign for the presidency.

Mr. KEARFUL. I believe that is all I care to ask. Is there anything further you would like to state?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not think so, Judge.

Mr. KEARFUL. I am very much obliged to you.

(Thereupon, the committee adjourned for the noon recess.)

INVESTIGATION OF MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

FRIDAY, APRIL 30, 1920.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The following testimony was taken at Washington, D. C., April 30, 1920, by Francis J. Kearful, Esq., in pursuance of an order of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM WESLEY CANADA.

(The witness was duly sworn by Mr. Kearful.)

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you please give your full name?

Mr. CANADA. William Wesley Canada.

Mr. KEARFUL. Where do you live now?

Mr. CANADA. My home is at Winchester, Ind.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your age?

Mr. CANADA. Seventy.

Mr. KEARFUL. What experience have you had in the American Consular Service in Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. I was in the American Consular Service in Mexico 20 years, 10 months and a few days.

Mr. KEARFUL. Between what dates?

Mr. CANADA. 1897 and 1918.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that service continuous?

Mr. CANADA. It was continuous from the time I was first appointed up to the time I resigned.

Mr. KEARFUL. How does that length of service compare with the service of other American consuls in Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. I served longer than any other man in Mexico, as consul.

Mr. KEARFUL. How, if you know, does that length of service compare with the length of service of other American consuls in the whole world?

Mr. CANADA. In examining the record, I think there was one who probably served a few days longer than I did or I served a few days longer than he did, I do not now just remember which. The list of consuls will show.

Mr. KEARFUL. At what point in Mexico were you located?

Mr. CANADA. Vera Cruz, Mexico, the city of Vera Cruz, in the State of Vera Cruz. I also had for a while Fronteras, Salina Cruz, Coatzacoalcos, now the Port of Mexico, Tlacotalpam, and a short time I had Tuxpan, as agent, all reporting to the Vera Cruz consul. Part of that time I was Cuban consul, if that has anything to do with it. I served as Cuban consul until they appointed their own consul, at the request of the Cuban Government and by the consent of the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was in addition to your duties as American consul?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; in addition to my duties as American consul, the first Cuban consul they ever had there.

Mr. KEARFUL. While you were consul at Vera Cruz did you come in contact constantly with the officials of the Mexican Government?

Mr. CANADA. Daily, almost.

Mr. KEARFUL. State your relations with them in the beginning of your work there, as to cordiality.

Mr. CANADA. Very good. There was no friction. I was able to procure for Americans or Cubans protection in all the complaints that would come in that were proper. Those that were not proper, we usually settled them ourselves before we went to any officials. I was able to get any American out of jail. If he was put in late at night, I would get him out, on my own word. Those that were not bailable I was able to go to the jefe politico or judge and borrow them. I don't know just what that means. They said they would loan them to me, and I borrowed them, in a number of cases that were not bailable.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under your promise to be responsible for their appearance?

Mr. CANADA. I always promised to be responsible for them.

Mr. KEARFUL. And you never failed?

Mr. CANADA. I never failed during the first 15 or 16 years.

Mr. KEARFUL. When, if ever, did those relations change between you and the Mexican officials?

Mr. CANADA. Not until after the first chief, Carranza, had put Huerta out, as we called it. In the last days of Huerta I had some trouble to have my requests complied with, in releasing one or two prisoners whom I had asked for. Then I was told by my Government to take my own plans for it, and I went over the heads of all officials and went direct to Gen. Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. John Lind testified the other day that the only hostility he found in Mexico against Americans was on the part of the supporters of Gen. Huerta. What have you to say in regard to that?

Mr. CANADA. I have a great deal of respect for John Lind, but my experience was different.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it precisely contrary?

Mr. CANADA. Huerta granted all my requests.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Huerta's attitude toward Americans prior to the landing of the American forces at Vera Cruz?

Mr. CANADA. Friendly.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he afford them lawful protection and security?

Mr. CANADA. So far as my jurisdiction was concerned, he did. I could not speak for others.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude after the taking of Vera Cruz?

Mr. CANADA. Up to the day he left his attitude toward me was correct, but rumor had it that he was very hostile against Americans; not so much against Americans, I think, as it was against the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. In particular, against President Wilson, was it not?
Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Samuel Guy Inman, who testified before the committee, made the statement that at the time of the taking of Vera Cruz Gen. Huerta issued an order for the imprisonment of Americans, and that many Americans, including American consuls in Mexico, were imprisoned and were not released until the places where they were imprisoned were taken by the Constitutionalist forces. Is that correct?

Mr. CANADA. I never saw that order. I had heard that some of them were imprisoned. I used my influence for some of them, Jeff Bruce, to get him out. That was in the northern part of Mexico, and I don't know the details or facts in the cases. In the State of Vera Cruz there were no consuls arrested, no consuls molested. The consul at Tlaxotalpan and one or two others were held a few hours, but upon my request they were turned loose and came on down to the consulate.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the circumstance that it was reported at Mexico City to Gen. Huerta that the American forces at Vera Cruz were holding Mexicans there, and that the order which he gave for detaining Americans was by way of reprisal for the detention of Mexicans in Vera Cruz, and that when he found out that Mexicans were not detained in Vera Cruz, he freely allowed the Americans to depart?

Mr. CANADA. I heard of that order, but if he held anybody in reprisal, it was people that were on the road from their homes to Vera Cruz. There were some down on the railroad that were taken off the train at Cordoba, but I wired direct and they were turned loose and allowed to come down. They claimed there was some abuse. They claimed they were abused some. But Americans went and came freely in a short time afterwards. I am speaking of the last days of Huerta.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember the circumstance of the imprisonment of an American physician, named Dr. Ryan, in the interior of Mexico, and his release by Huerta?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was that?

Mr. CANADA. I got a cablegram from the State Department that Dr. Ryan was in prison in some town in the northern part of Mexico; I don't remember the name of it, and was to be shot the next morning at 5 o'clock; to procure his release if possible, using my own methods. I went over the heads of everybody and sent a telegram direct to Gen. Huerta. He answered back that he knew nothing about it now, but would investigate and have it prevented, and have Dr. Ryan brought to him and then send him to Vera Cruz. I sent that to the State Department, which seemed to please them, as Mr. Bryan, the Secretary, said Ryan was his personal friend. Dr. Ryan was brought to Mexico City; was sent down to Cordoba, then over to Tlaxotalpan, and up to Vera Cruz on a boat, and reported to the consul's office.

Mr. KEARFUL. To your knowledge, did Gen. Huerta, even after the taking of Vera Cruz, show any hostility toward individual Americans or to their property interests in Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Mr. KEARFUL. What circumstances attended the beginning of that change of relations between yourself as American consul and the Mexican officials under First Chief Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. What was the first circumstance that happened?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes.

Mr. CANADA. Well, Americans were complaining that they had left their property and it was being destroyed; and I would go down and make a protest, and he would promise to send protection and never did so. That was repeated every day or two for months. I would go down and ask that some protection be extended, and he would promise it, but would not give it. If Americans got locked up I would go down and try to get them out of jail or prison, and they would promise me that to-morrow they would see to it. I had his promises, but very few I got out. He would cause newspaper men to be arrested and locked up, as well as individuals. His conduct was that of a person that hated the Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember a banquet that was given in Vera Cruz to First Chief Carranza on October 26, 1914?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you and other foreign consuls attend that banquet?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Carranza present throughout the proceedings?

Mr. CANADA. He was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was the principal speaker at that banquet?

Mr. CANADA. Luis Cabrera.

Mr. KEARFUL. What positions has Luis Cabrera held with the Carranza Government?

Mr. CANADA. I am unable to name the different positions which he held, but he was one of the cabinet officers.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you recollect the speech that Cabrera made at that banquet?

Mr. CANADA. I recollect a part of it. I never will forget a part of it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you give the substance of what he said in reference to his attitude and the attitude of the Carranza Government toward the Americans and their property interests in Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. My recollection is that he said the Carranza Government—he was speaking for the Carranza Government and Carranza's attitude. I don't remember that he said it was his personal attitude, but he said that they were going to drive the Americans out, take their property, were not going to allow them to buy any more, and wanted me to tell my Government. He said something similar to the English and Cubans, but not quite so strong, as I remember it, which annoyed the consuls very much. The English and Cuban consuls wanted to leave the banquet, which was about over. The Spanish consul wanted to leave. I whispered to them to remain there until it was over. They remained until the banquet was over and went outside and waited for me. I shook hands with Carranza and Luis Cabrera and congratulated him on his speech, that it was pretty clear and we understood it, and I would tell my Government, as he requested, to the best of my ability, what the policies of the Carranza Government were going to be. I went out and the consuls were waiting for me outside, and we went across to the corner just around by the Mexican hotel. In substance we agreed to write out each one for himself what he understood the speech to be. Then we would get together and blue-pencil it until we got down to what we thought were the facts. About that time somebody shot a gun off right close to us, and the German consul adjourned. The balance of us walked away. However, we talked the matter over the next day, and it was printed in the papers. My recollection now is they claimed the papers gave the substance of the speech, as well as they could. They had reporters over there. It was the next day, or the next day but one.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the papers contain a report of the speech as you now have stated it?

Mr. CANADA. In substance.

Mr. KEARFUL. From your observation of the acts of the Carranza Government since that time, have the sentiments expressed by Luis Cabrera at that banquet been carried out?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; and then some, I think; but they were carried out.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you, subsequent to that time, have any transactions directly concerning Luis Cabrera, in reference to a shipment of gold and silver to the United States?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was that?

Mr. CANADA. I received a telegram from the State Department to look out for gold and silver bars. An American came to me and reported that he had come all the way from Salina Cruz on a train that was bringing silver bars to Vera Cruz that had been stolen from an American mining company on the west side; I don't remember that place; that a great number of the bars were on the train. I followed them up and watched them put them in a certain bodega. Thinking that might be the same, I kept watch of it and tried to secure it, but could not. Luis Cabrera sent in an invoice in triplicate—a consular invoice, we called it—which described, as far as weight was concerned, the same weight, but not the exact number of bars. After the ship left I wired the number of the invoice to the United States Government. About two hours after the ship had left and just after I had sent the wire an American came in and claimed that he was hunting for gold bars taken from that same mine. I don't remember the name, but I remember it was at the same place. It was bars he claimed had been stolen by the Carranza people. Not knowing him, and knowing that spies were on the track of me all the time, I hesitated to give him any information until he about halfway convinced me he was who he said he was. All I did for him was, I went and got the original invoice and laid it on the table where he could see it. He took the number of it—standing off to one side, I saw what he was doing—and some other figures from it, looked at it, and did some writing on a piece of paper. I guess it was the numbers, and so on. He was excited and wanted to know how he could get to New York before that ship did. I told him I didn't know; I had no flying machine. Finally I happened to think there was a ship going to New Orleans, and I told him about it. He went out, and I never saw him any more, for that boat was sailing in about two or three hours. Afterwards I learned indirectly that the gold bars were attached in New York on the same number of invoice.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive any complaint from Luis Cabrera with respect to that transaction?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; after the gold bars had been attached in New York Luis Cabrera wrote me a letter wanting to know why I had given out such information. His letter to me will speak better for itself. He told me then who the gold bars belonged to. I think he said they belonged to his Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have that original letter?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. And a translation of it?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; February 15, 1915; that is when it was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you have any objection to putting the translation in the record?

Mr. CANADA. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. It may be inserted at this point.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

[Translation.]

VERA CRUZ, February 3, 1915.

Mr. WILLIAM W. CANADA,
Consul of the United States, Vera Cruz, Mexico.

SIR: Some time ago the department of the treasury, which is under my direction, sent to the United States some silver and gold bars which had been cast by the Mexican Government in the State of Sinaloa.

The companies who said that they were the proprietors of the mines from which the metal came were interested in knowing the date that said bars left Mexico for the United States, to the end of taking judicial action in that country.

As a matter of fact, upon the arrival of the metal in the city of New York we found that an action of replevin had been entered by the interested parties. This action, which we have reason to believe will not win in the long run, was taken, nevertheless, with the deliberate object of politically aiding our enemies, interfering with the use of the values which we had remitted.

Upon our making investigation as to how it was known beforehand in New York about the shipment of the bars, we have found, through private information first, and later through notices published in the press, that it was the American consulate who gave notice of the shipment of the merchandise to New York.

As this notice has caused grievous damage to this Government, I have seen fit to lay same before you, to the end that you will kindly inform me as to what reason the consulate had for giving the telegraphic advice to which I refer. I am,

Respectfully, yours,

LUIS CABRERA.

Mr. CANADA. I think I have a copy of my answer to it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is this a copy of your answer to Mr. Luis Cabrera?

Mr. CANADA. That is a carbon copy of my answer to Mr. Luis Cabrera.

Mr. KEARFUL. Will you read it into the record?

Mr. CANADA (reads):

VERA CRUZ, MEXICO, February 5, 1915.

Lic. LUIS CABRERA, Vera Cruz.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your valued letter of February 4, in which you make inquiries regarding information said to have been given out relative to certain shipments, I have the honor to inform you that, while I should be pleased to give you any information, whether positive or negative, with regard to transactions taking place in this consulate, however, as you no doubt understand, I must first be authorized by my Government to do so.

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. W. CANADA.

Such actions as that made me persona non grata with Carranza officials.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you report the matter of Luis Cabrera's request to Washington?

Mr. CANADA. I did, and sent a copy of the letter.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive any instructions in regard to giving him any information?

Mr. CANADA. I did not, and I never gave him the information he asked for.

Mr. KEARFUL. And the matter was closed then, so far as you were concerned?

Mr. CANADA. I considered the matter closed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know John R. Silliman?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was he, and what was his position?

Mr. CANADA. John R. Silliman was the consular agent up in a northern town called Saltillo. He was locked up, and we used our good offices to get him out. However, he got out; I do not know through what influence, but I believe that the Carranza forces let him out.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was at the time of the taking of Vera Cruz, was it?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. He came down to Vera Cruz, and I sent him home; gave him money to go home on.

Mr. KEARFUL. Saltillo was the home of Venustiano Carranza, the then governor of Coahuila, was it not?

Mr. CANADA. I believe it was. They say that Mr. Silliman used to sell him milk. He ran a dairy farm there, and was well acquainted with him before the revolution. He came to Vera Cruz, and went to the United States, and finally he came back, claiming the President had suspended all civil service arrangements and appointed him consul of the first class, $2,000 grade. He went back up in the interior some place. Carranza came to Vera Cruz and left him behind.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was appointed as representative to negotiate with Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. That was before Carranza came to Vera Cruz, and before he ever came to Vera Cruz. Carranza came to Vera Cruz and left him behind. I saw one or two letters through which he wanted the United States Government to get him back down to Carranza, that he thought he still had influence with him; and I saw one letter where he told Carranza to watch me, that he did not think I was a very good Carranza man—words to that effect. The Government appointed me as a go-between between the Government and Carranza. You can call it a messenger boy or ambassador, or what you please. I received the dispatches and presented them to Carranza under instructions. Silliman finally got down there, and then he received those dispatches. He was the special representative to Carranza.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was Silliman's attitude toward Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. Very friendly. He always spoke in the highest terms of him. He told me one day that Carranza started his revolution—got on his horse and told him it was going to be the bloodiest revolution that country had ever seen. About that time he was notified—while he was still on a horse—in the start-out it was a revolution against Madero, and he said he got a telegram showing Madero was assassinated, and he said he would start out to avenge the death of Madero. Whether Mr. Carranza ever said that to Silliman or not I don't know, but Silliman told me that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Silliman a strong advocate of the success of Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. Verv.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he appear to have a personal interest in the success of Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. Well, I thought so. He told me one day that if Carranza did not succeed he would lose his beautiful home up in Saltillo. I think that was the town. Anyhow, he built him a fine house up on a little hill up there, and it was mortgaged. He said if Carranza succeeded, he would have no trouble in keeping that fine home.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any information that led you to believe that Silliman was being paid by Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. Mr. Kelly, a clerk of mine, was detailed to get what information he could about him, and to get the facts. He was a brother-in-law to one of Carranza's men. He was a wireless man, I believe. He told me, "You might go out and talk yourself black in the face, and you could not make my brother-in-law or anyone else believe but what he is getting more pay from Carranza than from the United States Government." Then again, after a while he saw dispatches and reports I was going to send in. He would say, "Don't send that in now. That will displease Carranza." And all such talk as that he would get off frequently. Finally, I didn't allow him into my room. I would allow him in the room, but I would not let him see anything that was going on or show him anything.

Mr. KEARFUL. What information, if any, did you have as to whether Silliman was conveying to Carranza confidential matters occurring in your office?

Mr. CANADA. He was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that a common proceeding?

Mr. CANADA. Toward the last it was very common; that is, up to the time I quit showing him anything, and up to the time I would not talk to any of the men that was around him all the time, Mr. Weeks, and Mr. Tupper.

Mr. KEARFUL. Henry Allen Tupper?

Mr. CANADA. Henry Allen Tupper. They would come in and try to get me to talk.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you mean George F. Weeks?

Mr. CANADA. I am not sure of the initials. He was a large man.

Mr. KEARFUL. The testimony before the committee shows he was a Carranza propagandist.

Mr. CANADA. That is what he was.

Mr. KEARFUL. The testimony also shows as to Henry Allen Tupper, that he was being paid by Carranza.

Mr. CANADA. I so considered him, and did not trust him.

Mr. KEARFUL. They were the men with whom Silliman was advising, were they?

Mr. CANADA. Every morning they were the first people in his office. I gave him an office in the building the consulate was in, rooms that I had control over. Mr. Silliman and I got to be very unfriendly. I would not follow his instructions and it seemed to peeve him.

Mr. KEARFUL. About that time did you receive an anonymous letter threatening your life?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have any reason to believe that Mr. Silliman knew of the sending of that letter before it was sent?

Mr. CANADA. It might be some reason to me, but I doubt whether it would be a reason to any one else. It occurred on the patio. I said, "Mr. Silliman, I have got a love letter here." He said, "I have been looking for you to get love letters." He said, "Let me see it." I showed it to him. He said, "I have been looking for you to get love letters like that. I am not surprised at it." There were some other words said. I don't remember just what they were now. I didn't show him any more.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know Charles A. Douglass, who was employed by Carranza as his legal adviser?

Mr. CANADA. I am not personally acquainted with him. I think I have seen Charles A. Douglass. He was there on one or two trips.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive a letter from Mr. Bryan introducing Douglass to you and commending him to-you?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; if that is the Charles A. Douglass; I got a letter from Mr. Bryan introducing Mr. Douglass to me, and Mr. Douglass called once or twice at the office.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is this the letter?

Mr. CANADA. That is the letter.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is the date of it?

Mr. CANADA. February 16, 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. When was it received at the consulate?

Mr. CANADA. March 4, 1915.

Mr. KEARFUL. Please read it to the reporter.

Mr. CANADA (reading):

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1915.

DEAR MR. CANADA: This will introduce to you Judge Charles A. Douglass, of this city, the local attorney for Carranza representatives in this city. He is visiting Gen. Carranza, and I am glad to make you acquainted with him. If, while he is there, we have any matters to take up with Gen. Carranza, he will be willing, as he is anxious to assist in smoothing out difficulties. I commend him to your confidence and courtesy.

Very truly,

W. J. BRYAN.

That was addressed to "W. W. Canada, American consul, Vera Cruz," at the bottom.

I don't think Mr. Douglass ever came into my private office after presenting that letter.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he have anything to do with the conduct of affairs by Silliman?

Mr. CANADA. He asked me some questions, and from the fact that he was attorney for Carranza I didn't answer his questions or show him anything. Whether or not that conversation chilled him a little or not I don't know. He didn't come back, but he would go directly to Mr. Silliman.

Mr. KEARFUL. What, apparently, were the relations between him and Silliman?

Mr. CANADA. Seeing them on the street, in an automobile together, all that I saw was very friendly. They consulted frequently in his office. At least I have seen him go in the office frequently.

Mr. KEARFUL. Could you give some instances of the futility of protests made against injurious acts committed toward Americans during the time of Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. By Carranza forces?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANADA. I don't believe any of the protests we entered were ever considered. They brought no results. I would notify the department, and they would wire me a dispatch to deliver to Carranza, and he would excuse it in some way. He never complied, never granted any relief.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know John Lind?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; very well, while he was there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you recollect the time when he was sent to Mexico by President Wilson to deal with Gen. Huerta?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; I went with him at the request of the department.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you recollect the circumstance, which is a matter of common knowledge, that he presented certain representations to Huerta to the effect that Huerta should eliminate himself by holding an election, at which Huerta would not stand as a candidate, and that Huerta rejected those representations, and then John Lind returned to Vera Cruz?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; I remember that was common conversation.

Mr. KEARFUL. And was reported in the newspapers at the time?

Mr. CANADA. It was reported in the newspapers at the time. I know he came back to Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he have his office in the consulate?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; most of the time. He stopped at the hotel a little while, but had his office there all the time. Then he and his wife and family lived in the consulate with me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to confer with him frequently in regard to the Mexican situation?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. We talked frequently about it in an offhand way, and I heard him talk frequently to others.

Mr. KEARFUL. From your conversations with him what did you conclude as to his conception of his mission to Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. Well, while I have got a lot of confidence in Gov. Lind, I didn't understand it quite as he did the other day. I understood at the time, from the conversations and what printed matter I saw, and what dispatches I read and sent in, that his mission there was—I think I can express best my thought by telling what I heard him say, when he threw his arm up, "Huerta must get out or another revolution." I know it was talked that he must call an election, at which he would not be a candidate. I don't remember that he was to resign and remain there to call an election, but I got it in my head that he was to call an election while he was acting as President, but he should not be a candidate; that he must call an election at once. That was the impression I got from what I heard and read. I never had any other until the other day. I may be wrong about it, but that was the impression it made upon me.

Mr. KEARFUL. After Lind's negotiations with Huerta were broken off, and he was in Vera Cruz with you, what then was his attitude with regard to what should be done in Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. Well, I think his attitude was that of Gen. Huerta getting out or intervention.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was his attitude with respect to Carranza's success?

Mr. CANADA. He believed that Carranza would succeed.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was he a strong advocate of Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; as I understood it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember whether he took the position that it was "Carranza or American intervention?"

Mr. CANADA. I think I heard him say that. If he would deny it, I would be in doubt about it, but I think I heard him say it.

Mr. KEARFUL. He admitted on the witness stand here the other day that he had often said that.

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. It was said so often I think I could not forget it. I think that is correct.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he ever state to you the reasons that induced him to believe that the only salvation for Mexico was in the success of Carranza?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; I think he did. I think he was trying to put representatives along with Villa and Carranza, so they would work in harmony.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were his reasons for believing that the salvation of Mexico depended upon the success of the Carranza revolution?

Mr. CANADA. I never knew what his reason were, what he based his reasons on, unless it was instructions for him to do certain things and he was going to do it without any particular reason.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you get the impression that he went there with instructions to do certain things regardless of conditions?

Mr. CANADA. I got that impression.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he ever expound to you his theories in regard to the good Mexicans of the north and the bad Mexicans of the south, and that it was desirable that the good Mexicans of the north should conquer the bad ones in the south?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. What is your own opinion about that theory?

Mr. CANADA. Well, my opinion was that the better Mexicans were in the south, a good many of them. They were not all in the north. Probably there were some bad ones there and some good ones in the north, but the good ones in the south predominated, and in the north the bad ones predominated, to my mind.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you come in contact very largely with the Mexican people in the southern part of Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; naturally.

Mr. KEARFUL. What opinion did you gain as to the character and quality of those people?

Mr. CANADA. The men in the south that I came in contact with were very peaceable and submissive, industrious, trying to cultivate a little corn, tobacco, and such as they needed, but not very ambitious to accumulate; but they were law-abiding and there was very little crime. Up to the time Carranza came in, I am speaking of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Up to the time he came in with his men from the north?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. John Lind testified the other day that, in his opinion, the influence of American operations in the southern part of Mexico was not beneficial to the natives of the country. What were your observations during your 20 years there?

Mr. CANADA. I could not agree with him. My observation was and I believe that the Americans had a beneficial influence over those of the South; that every time an American came in, it was a benefit to some of the Mexicans; that every plantation they opened up, it was a benefit to the Mexicans; and some of them up to the time they were destroyed were very beneficial to the owners. Some of those plantations might have been a detriment to the people of the North, but every American that went in there benefited the Mexicans in the South. Those stock companies in the United States, selling their stock to school ma'ams, barbers, clerks, poor people up here, some of them lost it all, but the Mexicans got the benefit of it. And the American colonists would come down. They would come down there with their small colonies. There was one between there and Tierra Blanca. I forget the name of it. They opened up a big tract of land in small ranches and commenced to grow vegetables and use scientific methods, use American implements for agriculture. I know in many cases, especially the one next to Tierra Blanca, the Mexicans followed suit, and would go to them for advice. They would raise their stuff and then some one of the colonists would come to town and sell it for all of them and divide up the money.

I know Mexicans were very well pleased that lived in those little places. I was out there a short time; stayed one day on account of a train being late. What was true there, I think, was true of everyone.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were there many such settlements in the southern part of Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. I only know two like that, but there were many settlements where there were small ranches and where they raised cattle and sugar cane. I think the Americans taught the Mexicans how to use tools; taught them how to work; but there was very little ambition in them to save something. I think everyone of those Americans that came down there benefited the Mexicans, especially in that neighborhood, even the tourists.

Mr. KEARFUL. Notwithstanding some of those tourists were very uncouth in their manners?

Mr. CANADA. Some of them would do things I couldn't understand. For instance, they would take their kodak, walk into the governor's house, and kodak his dining table. They wouldn't think of doing that at home. I talked to some of them about it. "Oh, well, we are out for a good time. You fellows pay 25 cents to move a trunk, and we give them a dollar. We got our money changed on the border, and what is it?" They would do things like that; things they would never think of doing at home; people who were perfect ladies and gentlemen at home. There was a few like that, not many.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of any instances of Americans mistreating Mexicans, or oppressing them, or exploiting them?

Mr. CANADA. I never heard of anything of that kind. The only case I was ever called on to investigate by the Government was what they called the La Junta Plantation, Sanborn's plantation. I think Sanborn lived in Chicago. They probably mistreated some Americans there. They came in there and brought some American colored people and took them down there, and that was the only mistreatment I was ever called on to investigate, and the only complaint that was ever made to me, that I remember.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was that the only mistreatment you ever saw by Americans?

Mr. CANADA. Well, where Americans would mistreat Americans there; that was the only mistreatment I ever saw by Americans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever see any mistreatment of Mexicans by Americans?

Mr. CANADA. No, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Lind related the other day an instance of the method of getting volunteers which was employed by Huerta, and stated that you called his attention to it at the time. What was that?

Mr. CANADA. The first day he was over there he saw some prisoners on a flatboat, taking them over to San Juan de Uloa. He asked me who they were, and I said they were "volunteers." That was a general expression down there. When a man was arrested for stealing a chicken, or something of that kind, they called them "volunteers." I think I have a recollection of what he was speaking about. Probably he stated it correctly, and probably I used the term "volunteers," but I was not talking seriously about it, and my recollection is they were Yaqui Indians that had been taken over to Yucatan in the henequen fields, and were bringing some of them back. I don't know who was bringing them back, whether it was Madero or whether it was Huerta, but I remember that transaction.

Mr. KEARFUL. He stated that the prisoners passed through at the time he was there, and you called his attention to them.

Mr. CANADA. I don't remember anything about that, only what he said, and I couldn't remember it just as he put it, but I have seen them come through more or less under such circumstances.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether or not it has always been a common custom in Mexico to draft men who have been convicted of crime into the army?

Mr. CANADA. I understood when they were convicted of stealing something that they gave them their choice, whether they would go to prison or join the army. But that was under Porfirio Diaz's time. After that and under Carranza's time, it seems as though any excuse they could find they would draft them and put them into the army.

Mr. KEARFUL. That same system was employed by Huerta, was it not?

Mr. CANADA. I believe it was.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was the incident that Mr. Lind mentioned an illustration of that system?

Mr. CANADA. I kind of think so.

Mr. KEARFUL. And that term "volunteer" was used by Americans as a sort of witticism?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. I never saw them with a rope around their neck. I have seen them where I think they were tied by the arms, one to another, but I never saw them go through unless it was that party Gov. Lind saw, and I don't remember any rope around their necks. But they were taken through very frequently in the streets under guard, without any manacles of any kind.

Mr. KEARFUL. What methods were employed by Carranza and his people to get recruits?

Mr. CANADA. Just wherever they could pick them up. They would find out somebody that didn't have anybody to defend him very much, any parents or father, and accuse him of crime, whether he was guilty or not, and put him in prison and start to drilling him, drill him in prison two days, and then send him out, and put him in a uniform and give him a gun. I have heard fellows claim they would even start some kind of a racket to get them together in a bunch, and then Carranza soldiers would get a pot shot at them and take charge of the bunch.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever hear of the system of going onto the plantations and gathering up the young men, promising them opportunities to loot and rob if they would join the army?

Mr. CANADA. The manager of the Forman plantation came to me frequently with that kind of a complaint, and I have no doubt but what that was true. The manager of the Yale plantation, when Dennis left it, said they come and took all of his help. That was close to Tierra Blanca. He couldn't do anything, and he wanted to know what I could do. I said, "I am helpless. I can't do anything with this Government. I try to do all I can, but I am powerless to do anything."

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you mean the Yale plantation?

Mr. CANADA. I don't mean the Yale plantation; I mean the Joliet plantation, from Joliet, Ill. Old man Dennis was the manager. They drove him out. He come in the office. He took a kodak picture of it. I have got it some place. His daughter took it, I believe.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Yale plantation was the one described by Mr. Bryan in his article in the Commoner in 1903 as one of the centers of American civilization in Mexico.

Mr. CANADA. He described it pretty well. I read that, but I didn't see why he didn't describe the Joliet, why he didn't describe the Emery, the Gould, and the plantation of a man from California. They were more or less the same kind of plantations, but they were ruined just the same as the Yale. In fact, I don't know of but two plantations that are doing any good. One of them is the McLane sugar plantation close to Vera Cruz. He is going on and making money. But he had to pay graft every Saturday night to the bandits outside, on the north and on the south. He told me that sometimes he believed they were some of the Carranza soldiers, but he went on and made money. Another was the Candelaria plantation close to Tlacotalpam.

Mr. KEARFUL. Those places you think were well described by Mr. Bryan as centers of American civilization in Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. I think the description would have fitted many other plantations.

Mr. KEARFUL. And your information is, as I understand you, that the only ones that are still in operation are so by reason of the payment of graft to the officials?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. From your observation up to the time you left there in 1918 was it possible for any business enterprise to continue operation without paying graft to the officials?

Mr. CANADA. No, sir. If you had freight to move, you had to pay graft to get the cars, and then you had to pay graft to these men to move the car somewhere else, and then you had to pay graft again to get the car to come on in. They would always have some excuse why they couldn't go, but a little graft would make the car run all right. In trying to get supplies for the Red Cross, I tried and tried and tried, and finally I found out if we didn't pay the graft we wouldn't get them, and I didn't pay the graft and I didn't get them.

Mr. KEARFUL. The Red Cross supplies were intended for the suffering Mexicans, were they not?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. We had 40 tons of beans and 40 tons of corn. I tried to distribute it in Vera Cruz, and got a booth ready to distribute it the next morning. I had two sacks of beans and two sacks of corn for each one, and Aguilar sent word around not to do it, that they didn't need them. I let it lay in the bodega until it spoiled. I give it out on the sly to women that would come and children. I sneaked it out to them after night, but they only got away with probably 100 bushels of each.

Mr. KEARFUL. This distribution you say you made of that, was it to very needy persons?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. I would see them following carts around and picking up grains of corn and oats and rice off of the street.

Mr. KEARFUL. While Mr. Lind was in Vera Cruz, did you observe as to whether or not he was engaged in dealing with the Carranza revolutionists?

Mr. CANADA. I thought he was. That is, there were people coming there that we understood were coming in the interest of Carranza, and they would hold conversations in the room. They were the class of people that visited him, and that was one of the reasons why I believed that.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was during the time that Huerta was still in power at Mexico City, and while Lind was living in Vera Cruz, under the protection of Huerta, was it?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. I think Mr. Lind left before Huerta was put out.

Mr. KEARFUL. He left before the taking of Vera Cruz, did he not?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. Since he testified, I think he left in March, and the taking of Vera Cruz was on the 21st of April. I happened to see a document that refreshed my memory.

Mr. KEARFUL. There was a letter referred to in his testimony with respect to his transactions with Hall, written by him about the time he left Vera Cruz, I think April 7. Does that indicate to you about when he left?

Mr. CANADA. The letter was dated April 7?

Mr. KEARFUL. April 5 or 7.

Mr. CANADA. He left the next day. He was aboard the ship then, aboard the yacht Mayflower. So that indicates the date.

Mr. KEARFUL. He was examined at some length with reference to his dealings with this man Hall and a Mexican colonel named Martinez, in conjunction with Consul General Arnold Shanklin, Mexico City, and he testified in substance that all he knew about it was that they were there to get some supplies to relieve the sufferings of the Zapatistas in Morales. What do you know about that transaction?

Mr. CANADA. The first I knew there was anything of that kind, I got a telegram from Shanklin in code, to have the consular door open, I think he said at 9 o'clock, to receive Hall and the colonel. That is the first I knew there was any arrangement of that kind. I made the remark to the clerk, asking him how he thought they had a right to order me to keep the office open; which was something I didn't know anything about. Mr. Lind was standing back of me. I didn't know it. He spoke up and said, "I know all about it. I will explain it to you. That is the only thing I ever kept away from you." That is the first knowledge I had. When they arrived they were much peeved because Lind had left the consulate and went aboard the ship and would not come ashore to see them. They sent out that night for him but he wouldn't come. All I know about it was what Hall told me the few days he stayed there, except one letter from Lind after he had reached Washington, probably in answer to one of mine, he told me something about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What did Hall tell you in reference to the matter?

Mr. CANADA. May I state that Lind said they had a code, and the letter that probably you have got explaining the code. That was all that Lind said, as I recall, personally, except in writing. Hall told me that Lind had promised to take him on the boat with him to Washington. I am only repeating what Hall said. I am not saying I believe it, but I am repeating what Hall said. He said they were going there to get $50,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he say that Lind had promised to get $50,000?

Mr. CANADA. He said "they." He said Lind was going to take them to Washington and "they" were going to arrange to get $50,000.

Mr. KEARFUL. For whom and for what purpose?

Mr. CANADA. It was for Zapata brothers. The purpose of it I never come to any definite conclusion on, what they meant to do with it. He told me they were offered from the State Department $50,000 worth of Red Cross supplies.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of supplies?

Mr. CANADA. I don't know what they were, but I suppose it was bandages and medicines. That is what I understood it to be at the time.

Mr. KEARFUL. Medical supplies?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; provided they could be gotten to Zapata.

Mr. KEARFUL. At that time a portion of the railroad was torn up outside of Vera Cruz, was it not?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. I got most of that information in a letter Mr. Hall had from Lind. He stayed there quite a while, and they wrote back and forth. He left Hall and the colonel there, and Hall had confirmed what I had found in that letter, where they would send him the supplies, which didn't suit him very well.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they get the supplies?

Mr. CANADA. Not that I know of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did they refuse to take the supplies in lieu of the money?

Mr. CANADA. They told me that they were not satisfactory, that they needed the money. The colonel grew very abusive and offensive. He was inclined to blame me for Lind not being there, and wanted me to get him aboard the battleship, claiming he was in imminent danger. I was very suspicious again, and thought they were both spies, as far as I was concerned, and didn't treat with him, and told him he would have to get out of the consulate or I would call the officers and let them take him. I allowed him to stay until the correspondence went back and forth from the department, and they wrote Mr. Hall a letter and told him he was embarrassing the consul and might embarrass our Government, and that he had better come on to the States, and they would pay the way of the colonel to the States, but would not do anything for him after he got there, but the colonel didn't want to go.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Lind say anything to you about having an arrangement with Mr. Shanklin regarding this matter?

Mr. CANADA. Except what he said in the letter.

Mr. KEARFUL. This Col. Martinez, was he supposed to be a colonel in Huerta's army?

Mr. CANADA. He told me he was and opened his trunk and showed me his uniform. He convinced me that he had been, and was now off of the pay roll and was working for Zapata. He told me he had a power of attorney from Zapata and could do anything with Zapata he wanted to.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did he show you the power of attorney?

Mr. CANADA. I don't remember that he did. I gave him until dark to get out one day, and told him I could do anything I wanted to with him after he got through there. That was 2 or 3 or, rather, 23 times, or something like that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you gain an understanding as to what Zapata was going to do; what they were arranging for Zapata to do?

Mr. CANADA. Mr. Hall gave me one kind of an understanding and when I got through with the colonel he would give me another. I never come to a definite conclusion as to what they did intend to do. I wrote Gov. Lind that I thought the colonel was a spy. He answered back that when we both come to the same conclusion it was usually correct. Now, I don't know what he meant by that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know anything about the continuance of the arrangement, whatever it was, after Lind left, between the colonel and Arnold Shanklin?

Mr. CANADA. No, sir. I know that Hall got to the States and came back. Before he landed I received a telegram telling him to remain in Vera Cruz; that it was reported to the department that it would not be safe for him to go to Zapata. I sent word to Mr. Hall about that, and he wouldn't come after it, but sent a man after it, who got very abusive because I hadn't treated him as well as he thought I ought to. He got it, and he remained there a while and finally went up to Mexico.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mexico City?

Mr. CANADA. Mexico City, and there I understood he was on the pay roll of the United States Government as a representative to Zapata.

Mr. KEARFUL. What circumstance led you to believe that he was employed by our Government as a representative to Zapata?

Mr. CANADA. He told me so himself when he came back. The first I heard of it some one was speaking about him, and told me they had seen him have a Government draft and cash it in Mexico City. Then when he was up there, after that, he said Zapata wanted him to go over to Oaxaca, and he said I had been right and he wanted to apologize for what he had said and the way he treated me when he was first there. I said, "Mr. Hall, forget that. I was doing my duty, and I guess you thought you were doing yours." He wrote some letters to some man in the Treasury Department. I had a copy of them. He said, "I am out of money." I said, "There is a table back there where they put stuff on to eat three times a day, and a bed." I asked permission to send him home. I told what he had said. I was instructed to send him home. I had instructions to buy a ticket as far as I could and to give him no more money than would buy a ticket to his home. I talked of some place in the western part of the country. I made all arrangements for him to go, and he said that wouldn't take him to Washington. I said, "I am sending you home. I have no orders to send you to Washington." But he got to Washington. He wanted to know why I didn't send him there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know anything about secret messages between Shanklin and Lind and between Lind and Hall at the time Lind was in Vera Cruz?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. Some one brought letters. I didn't know who they were. They said they were secret messages by Shanklin to Lind, and I think one come in there after Shanklin had gone back. Several letters passed back and forth by special messengers. When Shanklin was up there he wanted to be sending secret messages, and he did it, and we sent them for him. I don't remember who they were to.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mr. Lind presented the committee with an address by the President, delivered to Congress on August 27, 1913, in which the President dealt with the negotiations between Lind and Huerta, after they had been broken off, and used this language:

We should earnestly urge all Americans to leave Mexico at once, and should assist them to get away in every way possible, not because we would mean to slacken in the least our efforts to safeguard their lives and their interests, but because it is imperative that they should take no unnecessary risks when it is physically possible for them to leave the country. We should let everyone who assumes to exercise authority on the part of Mexico know in the most unequivocal way that we shall vigorously watch the fortunes of those Americans who can not get away and shall hold those responsible for their suffering and loss to a definite reckoning. That can and will be made plain beyond the possibility of a misunderstanding.

Following that address of the President did you receive a message from the State Department to give a notice in substantially those terms?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; that they were to be held personally responsible. I was to deliver that to all officials, military or civil officials. If they changed their officials, I was to go and tell the new ones. I presented copies of the telegram verbatim that was sent to me to the officials.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know whether similar instructions were given to other consuls in Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. I understood it was given to all. It gave a lot of hope to a lot of people there and caused them to hang on until they lost everything. It caused a lot of people that had little homes to remain there and try to hang on to them.

Mr. KEARFUL. That sentiment was made plain beyond the possibility of misunderstanding, was it?

Mr. CANADA. To me it was, and I thought it was made plain to everybody. Lots of them understood it that way.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you know of any reckoning, definite or otherwise, to which any of the Mexican officials, civil or military, have been held for the sufferings of those Americans who did not or could not get away?

Mr. CANADA. Not one. There were one or two aggravated cases, which was reported, and the result was a protest from the department to be delivered to the officials.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the advice given by Lind to Americans who had suffered from the acts of the Mexican authorities?

Mr. CANADA. I never heard him give any definite advice. I heard of it. He would usually pacify them by telling them such things happened in time of war, could not be prevented, there had to be somebody suffer. Silliman justified it on the ground that in the South the Yankee soldiers did the same thing to the Southern people, and on those lines they seemed to justify it, both of them. I think I heard Lind say once, "It is better to give a little graft. Probably you will get what you want. If it will pay you to do it, you had better give a little money than to have your property destroyed." I remember hearing that once, I think.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you remember any notice, subsequent to the one just mentioned, that was sent out to Americans in Mexico to get out of the country?

Mr. CANADA. We got orders two or three times. The last one was a stampede. I think I have got it written up there.

Mr. KEARFUL. What arrangements was made by the American Government for the passage of Americans out of the country?

Mr. CANADA. They told me to pay their way, and draw on the department to reimburse myself. They sent a transport on one occasion upon which seven hundred or more people went. Then they sent a transport on another occasion. I suppose two or three thousand people went all told, but they just kept going out on the boats. One boat, I think, took eight hundred or more to New Orleans. Then they filled up another one, I don't remember, I have a record of it somewhere. Then we would get track of another boat. I think I sent out three or four thousand people.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did those people, as a rule, have to leave their places hurriedly and without provision for their passage?

Mr. CANADA. Nearly all of them had to leave hurriedly and lost all they had. The rich people got along and made money and staid, but the poor people lost everything they had.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was the rich man able to make money?

Mr. CANADA. Like the Lawrence sugar plantation. They were always in operation making sugar. They could pay graft and still go on. I presume it was more or less that way with a great many others, they could go on and make money; by paying graft they were permitted to operate, but the little farmer could not do it.

Mr. KEARFUL. How was it in the case of the members of the American colonies? You were speaking about the ability of the rich concerns to carry on business?

Mr. CANADA. They were carrying on business, and that is the only way they could do it. But as to the American colonies, the small man lost everything he had and was driven out, feather beds ripped open, furniture broken up, houses torn down, and everything they had was destroyed. I think there were six or seven hundred of them reported in there, and they got them out.

Mr. KEARFUL. What sort of transportation were you instructed to provide for these people who were ordered out without the means of travel?

Mr. CANADA. My instructions were to give them steerage passage or cheaper, give them the cheapest passage possible.

Mr. KEARFUL. What class of people were these Americans for whom that provision was made?

Mr. CANADA. Just as good people as we have, as far as I know, only they were poor, and I guess that is no disgrace.

Mr. KEARFUL. As a rule, were they poor until they were forced to get out of Mexico in a hurry?

Mr. CANADA. Well, they were poor when they came there, because all they had they put in a few acres of ground and some implements and household goods, and they didn't have much money left. They were living from crop to crop. A man went down there with five or ten or fifteen thousand dollars, and he would put most of that into the agricultural business, and he has been ruined.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you consider it a just and humane proceeding to force those people out of Mexico without previous notice, with their families and children, and not provide them anything more than the class of transportation which you said was to be "steerage or cheaper"?

Mr. CANADA. I will have to confess that I did not. I would rather have spent a hundred times the money than to have seen them go out in the way they did.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the attitude of Gen. Huerta toward sending out American in those cases?

Mr. CANADA. I was embarrassed quite a good deal by his attitude. The Americans were generally complaining about taking the treatment they had to, when they had been in the habit of riding on first-class passage. Gen. Huerta sent an order down there to get them first-class passage. The collector of the port down there offered it to them, and some of them took it. I talked to a good many and told them it humiliated me to see the Mexican Government paying their way out, and I couldn't help it, and if I was them I would walk out before I would accept it. One or two fellows didn't go. They got a little patriotic themselves.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you consider that they had much inducement to feel patriotic toward the administration of the American Government?

Mr. CANADA. Well, as a member of the Government, and as they made it, I thought they had; that is, in the past. I was not holding any brief for the present one at that time.

Mr. KEARFUL. You did not, yourself, give expression to any criticism of the Government.

Mr. CANADA. Oh, no. When a man holds a public office he is nothing but a public servant, and I never criticised anybody holding a public office until I know what circumstances prompted them to act. Under the circumstances I might do the same thing myself.

Mr. KEARFUL. When did you quit your post in Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. I resigned in November, and I got up here in April, the 1st of April, a year ago.

Mr. KEARFUL. 1919?

Mr. CANADA. 1918.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was the reason for your resignation?

Mr. CANADA. Well, the humiliation. I was being asked to accomplish what I used to do there, and I couldn't get relief for Americans like I had in the past. I couldn't get the relief under the Carranza administration, through Col. Aguilar, that I had in the past, and I couldn't accomplish anything. And then Silliman came down and made it worse for me; and others came down, and it got so humiliating I had to resign. I believed that the State Department knew of the troubles there, especially after I had seen Mr. Lansing's indictment, some time in 1915 or 1916.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was June 20, 1916.

Mr. CANADA. That gave me to understand that our Government knew at least a part of what was going on, and the dispatches we would get and telegrams to look after Americans, and we couldn't do anything, and there was nothing left for me to do but get out, because I believe I built up—I may be mistaken about it—but I believe I built up a fair reputation, and I could see where it was only a question of time until I would be trapped in some way and spoiled.

Mr. KEARFUL. Trapped by whom?

Mr. CANADA. The Carranza people. I know that Silliman tried to have me removed two or three times; but I will have to say that Lansing and the State Department—I never was treated better from McKinley on down than I was by this State Department personally. They never reprimanded me for anything, but sent me bouquets sometimes. I tried to get Carranza and his government and officials to comply with the requests made by the State Department, and when I was unable to do it, I resigned.

Mr. KEARFUL. What traps were laid for you that you knew about?

Mr. CANADA. Well, they were trying to get into my personal files, and they did succeed in getting into them sometimes; they sent people up there that I happened to know, on account of my long acquaintance, that were against me. They talked for me and wanted to get me to talk. I was told by one party or another about that. And I even heard it reported that Bonillas complained to the State Department that I tried to blow up a battleship. That is one of the things the State Department defended me for very strongly. Lansing told Mr. Bonillas to furnish the proof or quit knocking Canada. They tried many things. I was told by one man, and I believed him, that a woman was to come to me with counterfeit money and good money, and get me to change the good money, and go back and tell them I gave her the counterfeit money. That I would have done if she had come with the money. There are lots of ways they can trap you. They are pretty slick at that. Then I suppose they would have made a real charge against me.

Mr. KEARFUL. Passing counterfeit money?

Mr. CANADA. Passing counterfeit money.

Mr. KEARFUL. Is the man who told you that present in this room at this time?

Mr. CANADA. I don't know. I don't see him. I am rather inclined to think he is.

Mr. KEARFUL. If you will look around, perhaps, you will see him.

Mr. CANADA. He was here. The man that told me that never told me a lie in his life that I ever caught him in, or misrepresented anything that I ever found out, and I believed him.

I have many others on the same line. Some detectives tried to get me to go out to another place and spend 10 days' vacation; said I needed it, and I did. One of them was pretty honest. There were three of them. He said, "Don't go. They are going to rob you and get your files and show what you have been sending in against Carranza." I had a great many friends among the Mexicans. They wouldn't hang together. Sometimes they would tell on one another. That was told me, and I didn't go.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were those men in the employ of Carranza, or were they employed by the American Government?

Mr. CANADA. Two of them were employed by the American Government.

Mr. KEARFUL. Under whom were they operating?

Mr. CANADA. I suppose under the authority of the American Government. I always thought so. I don't know personally.

Mr. KEARFUL. What department?

Mr. CANADA. I thought probably the Department of Justice.

Mr. KEARFUL. Were they accredited as secret-service men?

Mr. CANADA. Not that I know of. I suspected they were secret-service men, and afterwards I believe they said they were. My Government never notified me anything about it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What have you had occasion to observe with respect to the influence of the Catholic Church upon the Mexican people?

Mr. CANADA. It had a good influence in Vera Cruz and the surrounding vicinity. I am not acquainted beyond that.

Mr. KEARFUL. Can you elaborate that a little with respect to what you observed?

Mr. CANADA. Well, I think it had more effect on the women than on the men. It seemed to make the women pretty good citizens, and they were very devoted to the church.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe whether the church had any influence in political affairs?

Mr. CANADA. Not that I ever saw or knew of.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you observe as to whether the peons were mistreated by the church dignitaries?

Mr. CANADA. I never knew of a case.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever know of their being oppressed by the priests?

Mr. CANADA. Not down in Vera Cruz, I didn't. I didn't have any personal knowledge of it anywhere. I know the Carranza soldiers took the churches in Vera Cruz and made barracks of them. The Catholic sisters finally some way got them to move out after a few weeks.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have occasion to observe the attitude of the Carranza soldiers toward the priests and the nuns?

Mr. CANADA. I didn't observe anything. I saw some priest there I think as waiter in one of the hotels in disguise. I was told he was a priest, and I believed it. Several of the nuns were down there. I usually turned them over to Father Joyce.

Mr. KEARFUL. Who was Father Joyce?

Mr. CANADA. He was a chaplain in the Army or Navy.

Mr. KEARFUL. Of the American forces?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; as I understood it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the nuns you say you turned over to Chaplain Joyce?

Mr. CANADA. I didn't see them. They were sent in, and I would write a letter and tell them to take it back and go to Father Joyce with it.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were they doing that for?

Mr. CANADA. I understood they were in hiding, but that was only my understanding.

Mr. KEARFUL. Had they come from other parts of the country?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. As refugees?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you know or notice the condition of any of them at the time?

Mr. CANADA. Only one. I am not sure she was a nun. She told me she was.

Mr. KEARFUL. What was that?

Mr. CANADA. Well, I think she was in the family way. I think I saw one here yesterday that went through Vera Cruz. I was so impressed with the fact that I asked her, and she said, yes, she did.

Mr. KEARFUL. That was Mother Elias, who testified yesterday?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. She went out through Vera Cruz.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think is the trouble with Mexico?

Mr. CANADA. Well, the trouble with Mexico is rather serious. We can't do anything to try to bring about peace. They won't hold together. The trouble is they all want to be jefes, or bosses. They hang together a while, and then separate and start another revolution. But I like the people of Mexico, those that were not in the army as volunteers, and those that were not natural born thieves and can't help it—kleptomaniacs.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does that embrace a large majority of the people.

Mr. CANADA. I think about 80 per cent more or less are good people. I think Mexico is being controlled by about 2 per cent, and probably that is what is the matter with her.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think a large majority have the potentialities of good citizenship if they had a chance?

Mr. CANADA. I think they have. You take the children, they are bright as a whip, until they get to be 12 or 14. Some of them I know that have been sent to the States, that got good educations here and it made good citizens of them.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think a large majority of the Mexican people are industrious and peacefully inclined?

Mr. CANADA. In the southern part. I don't know anything about them in the north.

Mr. KEARFUL. What do you think ought to be done to give those Mexicans an opportunity to become good citizens?

Mr. CANADA. Well, I don't think my opinion would be very popular. I had better not express it. There are two or three plans that have been proposed. Mr. Wilson had a pretty good plan.

Mr. KEARFUL. Henry Lane Wilson.

Mr. CANADA. Henry Lane Wilson. That is one step in the right direction, but I fear you will have to take another step.

Mr. KEARFUL. His plan was to go in and pacify the northern part of Mexico, and make an arrangement with the Mexicans whereby a protectorate might be established?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; that was his plan, to make a buffer State there, but that reminds me of the story of a Dutchman who had a fine dog, and he thought the world of it, and he wanted a short-tailed dog, and didn't want to hurt him, so he cut off an inch every morning. I think if you take that step you will have to take another one and another one. Armed intervention is the only remedy that I can see. There may be others, but I don't claim to be able to see through a brick wall. I don't want to see our country take Mexico and keep it, but treat it something similar to the way we treated Cuba, and I think that would be a Godsend to Mexico, and I think 80 per cent of them are praying for it.

Mr. KEARFUL. Do you think they would cooperate with us in establishing good government?

Mr. CANADA. They were coming to me in Vera Cruz, because they had confidence in me. They wanted to know why we didn't do anything, wanted to know if we were afraid to fight. "Come on in and we will help you." One man, who had been a commander under Porfirio Diaz, told me they would flop to us quicker than they ever did to Gen. Scott. All such expressions as that. It was the class of Mexicans that want to go on and do business and have peace, that was not in the army, what I call the better class of Mexicans.

Mr. KEARFUL. Mexicans of any particular blood?

Mr. CANADA. Very few of them were Indians. I only remember one case of Indian. It was mixed blood, white Spanish blood mixed with Indian, school ma'ams, professors in colleges. One was the mayor of the town. He told me after the troops had gone out that when they came in he would have killed them all if he could. The expression he used to me was "I would pull off my toe nails and finger nails to try to hold them here, if I could do it by such a thing. It is the first time we have ever had in Vera Cruz clean streets or felt safe, where men who had their business would not be robbed."

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you have such expressions of sentiment from all classes of Mexicans?

Mr. CANADA. I couldn't say that. They didn't all trust me, didn't know me well enough, but pretty near all classes. That was the expression I got from at least 80 per cent of them. One man had been a congressman. He lived across from the Diligencia Hotel. He told me that he thought 90 per cent of the Mexicans would submit right away and would not fight us; that he thought they would fight us in the mountains, bushwack a little, some of them. He was a man I had a lot of confidence in. Then there was a Mexican gunboat captain told me the same thing, some time when he was in the office.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you receive that expression of sentiment from the intellectual class, the middle class, and the laboring class?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; and even from one that was in the army—Carranza's army.

Mr. KEARFUL. An officer in the army?

Mr. CANADA. He was holding some kind of a position. He said, "We can't do anything down here. The States have got to do it; and for God's sake why don't you come and do it, and be done with it?" Those were the words he used.

Mr. KEARFUL. What were the conditions in Vera Cruz as to sanitation at the time of the landing of the American forces there?

Mr. CANADA. It was not as good as it was shortly afterward. The streets were filthy and in dirty condition, and outside the hotels were in very bad condition, flies swarming all around. Our troops came in and cleaned it up, and put it in sanitary condition. It was equal, I think, to any city in the United States, and especially more so than Chicago.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was Vera Cruz before that infested with mosquitoes?

Mr. CANADA. Mosquitoes and buzzards were the scavengers, and after the Yankees came in you would have to get a search warrant to find a buzzard, unless he came in trying to roost. They soon starved them out.

Mr. KEARFUL. Was it generally understood that the buzzards were the scavengers of the streets?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did you ever have occasion to observe a fight between buzzards and dogs in the street over garbage?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; and I have seen buzzards go up and examine a live mule, thinking he was dead, to see whether it was time to commence. I saw a cat thrown out of the second story of one building. It wasn't quite dead, but the buzzards came and waited until it quit kicking, and then they got busy.

Mr. KEARFUL. You say the streets were cleaned up to such an extent by the Americans that the buzzards had to leave?

Mr. CANADA. They were scarce. They would come back to roost on top of the church sometimes.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did Vera Cruz revert to its former unsanitary condition after the Americans left?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir. They took all the screens down from the meat market, they didn't clean out the hotels any more, they didn't clean the streets, they destroyed the tin cans the Americans had to put the garbage in, and box cars and troop trains that came in there would drive a dog off of a garbage wagon; in fact, it went back to a worse condition than it was when old Huerta was there.

Mr. KEARFUL. Did the buzzards come back?

Mr. CANADA. Yes, sir; a few saluted me when I left.

Mr. KEARFUL. Does anything further occur to you that might be of interest to the committee?

Mr. CANADA. No, sir; I have no story to tell. If there are any further questions I will try to answer them.

Mr. KEARFUL. We are very much obliged to you.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned until 2 p. m.)

REPORT OF S. D. LESTER.

APRIL 28, 1920.

Senator ALBERT B. FALL,
Chairman Subcommittee on Foreign Relations to Investigate Mexican Affairs.

GENTLEMEN: Pursuant to instructions from the committee, I began my investigation of affairs in Mexico about the 1st of October, 1919, continuing the same until leaving Mexico on the 19th of April, 1920. In taking up the matter of the relation of American citizens to the present Government of Mexico it seems that invariably the conversation with individuals would lead back to the Tampico incident about which very much has already been said to the committee. Perhaps not the Tampico incident proper, which was the so-called insult to the flag, but rather the mistreatment of Americans which occurred in consequence and immediately after the so-called flag insult. However, as that seemed upmost in the minds of nearly all the individuals whom I interviewed, it will be necessary to go into the Tampico incident in detail as the same was presented to me by various citizens in Tampico and vicinity.

I will refer to these individuals anonymously and will furnish the committee with a separate key which will identify each individual referred to which will be sufficient guaranty of the authenticity of such interviews. It is needless to explain to you that the reason for taking this course is, that the individuals could not afford to have their names mentioned in reference to the testimony given for reasons which are obvious. That is, that they fully understand that reprisals would be visited on them by the Carranza Government should they be identified as having furnished information for the committee.

The first matter will be the petition addressed to the President of the United States and signed by a committee appointed by various American citizens in Tampico at the time of the crisis known as the "Tampico incident" beginning about April 19, 1914. This was given me by a prominent American (whom I shall refer to as Mr. A), who was connected with its presentation to the proper authorities in Washington about the 1st of May, 1914.

To His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

(Through the honorable the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy.)

SIR: Your petitioners, protesting their loyalty as taxpaying citizens of the United States while residents of Tampico, Republic of Mexico, respectfully beg to present on their own behalf and on behalf of those they represent the subjoined petition, based upon and due to the following facts, to wit:

I. The Government of the United States, for more than 10 months last past, has maintained American war vessels at the mouth of the Panuco River in the Gulf of Mexico, or in the Panuco River fronting the city of Tampico, or in both places;

II. In December, 1913, and again on the 1st or 3d of April, 1914, American residents in Tampico were invited to take refuge aboard these war vessels during battles in Tampico between opposing Mexican armies, such citizens being returned to their homes in Tampico when said battles terminated;

III. On or about April 9, 1914, Admiral Mayo, of the United States Navy, demanded that the Mexican Federal forces in Tampico salute the American flag in the manner and form specified in his demand;

IV. From and after making this demand the three United States war vessels then lying in the Panuco River in front of Tampico were held in a visible and threatening readiness to enforce compliance with the demand named;

V. On or about April 19, 1914, Gen. Huerta, commander in chief of the Mexican Federal forces, refused to comply with said demand; and

VI. April 20, 1914, it was stated in Tampico that the President of the United States had referred the fact of such refusal to Congress, which in turn was said to have referred the said fact back to the President.

VII. At 9.30 o'clock a. m., April 21, 1914, the said three United States war vessels, theretofore lying in readiness for action in the Panuco River facing Tampico, sailed down said river and disappeared beyond Mexican waters in the Gulf of Mexico, depriving Americans in Tampico of the last vestige of the ample protection up to that hour accorded them; nor did these vessels ever return or communicate again with the Americans on shore.

VIII. At 10 o'clock a. m., April 21, 1914, Gen. Zaragoza, commanding the Mexican Federal forces in Tampico, ordered all cantinas and saloons in Tampico closed.

IX. At some hour prior to 2 o'clock p. m., April 21, 1914, the Mexican Federal authorities in Tampico began to take away from Americans such arms as they carried or could be made to disclose.

X. At or about 4.15 o'clock p. m., April 21, 1914, bulletins were published by the Mexican authorities that American marines had been landed in Vera Cruz, which was the first intimation your petitioners had received from any quarter touching the said event.

XI. At or about 4.30 o'clock p. m., April 21, 1914, mobs began to form in the streets of Tampico; these mobs were dispersed about 9 o'clock p. m.; they formed again, and about 11 p. m. began the riotous destruction of American property; they were again dispersed about 11.30 p. m., only to re-form later and again to threaten the lives of Americans.

XII. Between the hours of midnight, April 21, and 2 o'clock a. m., April 22, 1914, officers from the German war ship Dresden, lying in the Panuco River in front of Tampico, came ashore and conveyed the American women and children aboard the Dresden; the commander of the Dresden advised the Mexican authorities that if any further mob violence occurred or if mobs formed again he would land his marines and restore order. Tampico was thereafter quiet.

XIII. At 9.30 o'clock a. m., April 22, 1914, the vice consul of the United States in Tampico made, orally, the following statement:

"Admiral Mayo has ordered all Americans aboard the American battleships immediately; a second order has been issued, joined by Gen. Zaragoza, for all noncombatants to withdraw from Tampico."

Vessels flying the German or the English flag took the Americans who obeyed the admiral's order out to the American battleships.

XIV. Once aboard the battleships your petitioners, against their protest in many cases, without their foreknowledge in any case, and without being permitted to go back after clothing, money, or valuables, were carried to Galveston, Tex., and put ashore there.

XV. Your petitioners, as stated above, were carried from Tampico out to the American battleships at anchor in the Gulf, on the 22d of April, and not permitted to return for their personal effects; the process of thus carrying out Americans from Tampico to American ships, all in vessels flying a German or an English flag, was kept up until April 29; it would seem to have been practicable to allow your petitioners to go back for their clothing, if for nothing else.

XVI. Since April 22, 1914, the property of the English, German, and Dutch residents in Tampico is said to have been unmolesed, England, Germany, and Holland having each one war vessel in the Panuco River in front of Tampico. Since April 22, 1914, such American effects as clothing and personal property, as well as realty and buildings, have been subject to constant pillage and destruction, the United States having no war ships or other protection in Mexico waters near Tampico since such date.

In view of the foregoing facts, your petitioners respectfully request that the Americans recently carried out from Tampico be returned by the United States to their homes in that city with the least delay practicable, and that, upon their return, they be accorded suitable protection such as shall seem to your Excellency adequate for existing conditions; from personal knowledge of the existing conditions your petitioners presume to suggest that this protection include the presence in the Panuco River of a sufficient number of war ships, under instructions which will authorize those in command to meet any emergencies that may arise, instructions similar to those which your petitioners have reason to believe are given to the commanders of the war vessels of other nations who have successfully protected the lives and property of their citizens resident in Tampico and its environs and include such other means of protection as to your Excellency shall seem best. Your petitioners respectfully protest that the recent withdrawal of protection before ordering out the American citizens seems a reversal of the program best calculated to protect life, in that the Americans might have been removed first, and no battle having been contemplated, removed without undue haste, and the protection withdrawn afterwards. Their hasty removal, after protection was withdrawn, not only precluded your petitioners from taking any steps whatever to arrange for the security of their property and valuables but did not even permit them to bring out such things as necessary wearing apparel.

Finally, and as an additional and imperative reason for the prompt return of your petitioners to their homes in Tampico, they urge attention to the oil situation; in their profound conviction, the impending danger is most grave that the oil wells around Tampico may be destroyed by malice, or, if not properly cared for at once by those experienced in such work, may overflow and destroy themselves, not only to the damage of property between such wells and the Gulf, but to the almost certain loss of human life. Under the proper and adequate protection requested, this invaluable product so essential to the modern commercial life of the world at large will be saved from the wanton waste otherwise certain to ensue. Agricultural crops lost may be replaced by succeeding crops; lands may withstand wars without material damage; but oil once lost and oil fields once destroyed are never replaced or replaceable.

For more complete particulars as to the oil situation, attention is respectfully directed to the detailed statement made at his request by your petitioners to the honorable the Secretary of War under even date.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1914.

As a result of the above petition the Navy Department issued the following bulletin on May 23, 1914:

"While neither the State Department nor the naval officers on the spot feel justified in advising Americans who have left Mexico to return until conditions in that country are settled, the exceptional circumstances of the case have led the Secretary of the Navy to grant permission to those refugees from Tampico, who claim that they were brought to Galveston on April 22 and 23 against their will, to take passage on the transport Hancock, which will leave Galveston for Tampico next Saturday. This action was taken after conference with the Secretary of State at the request of several of the refugees who claim that when they left Tampico they supposed they were being taken on ships to remain only during the fighting between the Federals and the Constitutionalists and that after the fighting was over they were to be returned to the city. The captain of the Hancock will be notified that only men and trained nurses can be accommodated on the return trip to Tampico."

I think it will be no breach of faith since the names of these Americans have often been quoted as being members of the committee referred to above, to say that the committee consisted of W. M. Hanson, L. M. Phelps, jr., Dr. W. M. Turner, W. E. Lucas, J. B. Wood, and was assisted by other Americans by names of A. R. Bushnell, H. W. Dickson, Hugh G. Curran, A. H. Gibson, W. H. Zahnizer, Col. Timothy Spellacy, Thomas A. O'Donnell, S. B. Cochran, George Davidson.

I will insert here the personal account of one of the members of the said committee of the reception given them by the officials in Washington, D. C. and of the results obtained for the relief of the Americans in whose behalf they presented the petition above referred to:

"Beginning while President Taft was in office, Americans had been repeatedly warned by the Washington authorities to leave places in Mexico supposed to be dangerous. The Americans in Mexico could not understand the why of such warnings; they did not heed them, chiefly because they could not: leaving places deemed unsafe meant abandoning their property which, in many instances, represented all they had in the world, and in practically all instances represented their means of earning and getting a living; where could they go?

"On those Americans who were in and near Tampico on the 22d day of April, 1914—Vera Cruz had been taken by the United States Navy April 21, 1914—the impression was produced that they as noncombatants were requested to withdraw temporarily from Tampico during the battle to be fought that day. Except for this belief, this interpretation of the positive statements made by the American consul, who quoted Admiral Mayo and quoted Gen. Zaragoza, not 25 per cent of those who withdrew from Tampico would have withdrawn.

"Americans went aboard the lighters that took them out to the fleet with merely a change or two of clothing, often with only what they had on, and with no more money than they happened casually to have at the moment in their pockets.

"Once aboard the United States warships they were not permitted to return to Tampico, but were taken without their foreknowledge or consent to Galveston. Arrived in Galveston, about 20 per cent obtained funds from their connections in the United States, bought themselves clothes, and made themselves comfortable; about 80 per cent had no United States connections and, having left all they had behind them in Mexico, were without clothes, without money, without resources of any sort. Meetings were held evenings: those who had, or who had obtained, shared with those who had not and could not obtain; 20 per cent could not support the other 80 per cent very long. Finally two committees were appointed, one a committee that was to stay and help those needier than themselves, and the other a delegation that was to go to Washington and try to have undone the wrong inflicted on all. The committee went straight to Washington, arriving about May 1, 1914. This committee was instructed: (1) To ask for food and clothing for the stranded needy, whose all had been left behind in Mexico. (2) To ask to be taken back to their homes, where they could resume the occupations that yielded them a living. (3) To ask that the presence of warships off the Tampico customhouse in the Panuco River be restored, inasmuch as the taking of Vera Cruz would make protection necessary.

"It must be recalled that a couple of warships had been kept in the Tampico Harbor for 10 months or more; they were withdrawn April 21, the day Vera Cruz was taken; thereafter and until events detailed further along took place, United States warships were absent from the Tampico Harbor.

"So much as preliminary seems necessary to the understanding of what follows.

"Once in Washington, the committee organized, and made appointments to meet, first, Secretary Daniels, head of the department directly concerned in deporting the Americans from Tampico, in taking from Tampico the protection of American ships, and undoubtedly able to carry the Americans back to their homes.

"Secretary Daniels received not merely the committee, but received at the same time a number of Americans who had associated themselves with the committee in order to lend assistance. The first interview, this with Secretary Daniels, was distressing and unfortunate. The Secretary gave his callers his opinion of them, in terms that were neither kind nor just; this angered his callers who resented his remarks, and who, in consequence, behaved somewhat discourteously in that they interrupted the Secretary, interrupted each other, and tried to talk all at once, showing little control of temper or tongue. The Secretary was initially to blame in that, without waiting to hear what his callers had to say, he gave them his uncomplimentary opinion of them, spoke of them as 'refugees,' called them adventurers who had gone to Mexico with buccaneering intent, and said that they should have come to him with grateful thanks for having rescued them. The rejoinders the Americans made were explicable, natural but lacking in the respectful dignity essential to the success of the committee's mission. The words used by the Secretary and by his callers displayed much heat and some anger. One incident was particularly regrettable, the facts about which have seldom been accurately stated. In the course of his remarks the Secretary stated that, prior to the execution of his orders to withdraw the United States warships from the Tampico 'Harbor,' Admiral Mayo had made arrangements with the commanders of English vessels lying off the Tampico customhouse to care for the Americans in Tampico and carry them, when the time came, out to the American battleships then riding at anchor in the Gulf beyond the 3-mile limit. The Secretary had scarcely said these words when one of the Americans present, not a member of the committee, brought the umbrella he had in his hand down on the floor with a whack and said, 'That is not so.' The incident was passed over, though it will be believed that the interview thereafter dragged, and was soon ended.

"As an aftermath, the Secretary that same day gave to the press his account of the interview. The reporters requested the committee to reply, calling attention to the one-sided nature of what the Secretary had said. The committee declined to rejoin, alleging that any answer however justified would widen a breach the committee desired above all things to see healed.

"Further along will be given an account of the action the Secretary of the Navy took in the direction of the committee's petition.

"By appointment the committee the next day met Secretary Garrison, accompanied as before by a number of associated Americans not members of the committee, but equally interested in the committee's mission. Secretary Garrison's manner and method were judicial, patient, inquiring. He invited his callers to state the object of their call, and he listened with increasing attention to the very end. He then said, in substance, that what he had heard was, as to much of it, entirely new to him and, as to all of it, interesting; he said he would have to think out how he could help, promising help to the extent of his ability; he invited his callers to name two or three representatives—there were over a dozen of his callers though the committee numbered only five—and he invited these representatives to call again the next day, when he would be able better to give them his views. Representatives, two in number, did call the next day, and the day after, and on sundry occasions, later, always at Secretary Garrison's invitation; while the action to be taken, and finally taken, did not come within his department's province, the aid he lent was of much importance to the committee.

"On the third day, by appointment, the committee met Secretary Bryan. The committee was again accompanied by their associates who, while undoubtedly desirous of lending aid if they could, didn't want to miss anything. Their presence, helpful in one sense, made an unwieldy group and it was thus less helpful than they meant. Secretary Bryan promised the committee 15 minutes; he gave the committee more than an hour. He showed great tact in getting at the concrete facts, and the questions he directed now to one and now to another of his callers showed an active and intelligent interest.

"At this first interview the Secretary of State did two things that must be set down:

"In the committee's presence he dictated and ordered sent a telegram to the State Department's representative in Galveston, instructing such representative to honor at once any request made upon him by Frank Hamerick (chairman of the committee left in Galveston) for money, food, clothing, or other necessities, such as medicines or medical attention. This afforded the immediate relief the committee asked for.

"The other thing Secretary Bryan did was, again asking his group of callers to name a couple of representatives whom he invited to call again, to ask that the committee reduce to writing, in as orderly a manner as possible, the various statements made to him by his callers at this first and general interview.

"Except the three interviews above described, one on each of the Secretaries of Navy, War, and State, the committee as a body made no more calls, nor did the committee's associates. But the chairman of the committee, accompanied sometimes by one sometimes by another of his fellow committeemen, was at one or the other of the departments almost daily; he was always received promptly, was welcomed, and could ask no courtesy because every courtesy was extended before he could ask it.

"Meanwhile the written statement asked for by the Secretary of State was undergoing preparation. Every alleged fact, every statement, every date, every name, was checked, compared, established, before it was admitted into the petition. When done, the whole was submitted to an officer of the War Department, whose suggestions were helpful, and it was at length ready for presentation.

"As to the statement requested by Secretary Bryan, it was really a 'petition.' Courtesy seemed to demand that it be presented to the President. Senator Gore, a friend of one of the committeemen, offered to take the chairman and one other member of the committee to the President; Secretary Garrison made the same offer. Senator Gore arranged for the call. Courtesy seemed to demand that Senator Gore, as sponsor for those whom he introduced, should know what the committee intended to do when introduced. The petition was shown to him—read to him—and received his approval.

"Just why he did it is unknown, but when he went to fix the hour for the call he handed to Mr. Tumulty a copy of the petition. The President was evidently displeased with the petition, because on no other hypothesis can his cancellation of the appointment be explained: within an hour of Mr. Tumulty's receipt of the petition from Senator Gore the President canceled his consent to receive the committee. The petition was then handed, one copy to Secretary Daniels, one to Secretary Garrison, and one to Secretary Bryan.

"That the matter came up at the next meeting of the Cabinet is probable.

"The calls by the chairman at the departments continued.

"Secretary Bryan continued to send aid to the Americans stranded in Galveston. In point of fact, he continued such aid for months, and in July he was instrumental in returning the remaining women and children back to their homes in Mexico—back to what was then left of their homes and possessions and means of earning a living. The first of the three objects the committee had in view in going to Washington was satisfactorily accomplished.

"One day in May, perhaps a fortnight after the first interview with him related above, Secretary Daniels sent for the committee; not all could attend, though a majority hastened to obey the summons. The Secretary stated that he had decided to send back to Tampico, without expense to them, such of the men as desired to return; he put the transport Hancock at the committee's disposition, the date was fixed for May 30, and word was dispatched for all to be on hand that day. The Secretary stated that he was unwilling to send back—at least for the time being—any women or children; he made exception as to a group of nurses who were returning to their places in an American hospital situated in Tampico.

"As to the return of protective United States war ships to the River Pánuco, near the customhouse in what is usually designated as the Tampico 'harbor,' Secretary Daniels stated that two war ships were being returned; he declined to agree to keep them there or to indicate for how long they would be maintained there; he limited himself to saying that 'two vessels were being sent there, and that there was at the moment no intention to take them away.'

"Taking men away from their homes and business, under a pretext that was disingenuous, and then dubbing them 'refugees' did much to dull the keen edge of their loyalty.

"May 30, as the returning Americans were going aboard the Hancock, the execution by each one so returned of an affidavit was demanded, setting forth that affiant was an American citizen, that he had been brought out of Mexico against his wish, that he was returning 'at his own suggestion, on his own responsibility, and at his own risk'; seemed, all of this, uncalled for—unless it was a notification that the United States intended to give him no protection or recognition while in Mexico. This further dulled the keen edge of the loyalty Americans like to feel toward their country. Add to this that, under date December 31, 1914, the American consul then in Tampico, on the 1st of January, 1915, dunned every American for his income tax on money earned in 1914 in Mexico, which tax the United States Government demanded, seemed to the Americans in Mexico like exacting bricks without straw. A still further dulling of the edge of loyalty.

"The Americans in Mexico, however, are still loyal. They are not buccaneers. The vast majority of them are law-abiding, industrious, and worthy of the recognition they ask and the protection they need. They keep loyal, and they pay taxes to the United States Government. Has the United States Government, accepting the taxes, met its obligations to them?"

Mr. B., of Tampico, Mex., relates the Tampico incident as follows:

"The launch bearing the paymaster and crew from the United States man-of-war at Tampico, in April, 1914, had not entered the prohibited zone as defined by Gen. Zaragoza, but was en route to the Pierce Oil terminal for supplies when arrested by Mexican Federal troops. The Marines were marched through the streets of Tampico to the comandancia de policia, but were not incarcerated. They were only detained about a half hour by the authorities, as the news of their arrest had been communicated to the American consul and he was interesting himself in regard to their case, so that they were soon released and allowed to return to their ship with the excuse that their arrest was a mistake in orders by the officer who arrested them—that there was no intention to give the United States an affront.

"In the meantime, Admiral Mayo contended that the flag of the United States had been insulted by this arrest and detention of the Marines and demanded an immediate apology of Gen. Zaragoza and the salute of the United States flag. Gen. Zaragoza said that he could not render the salute nor the apology without authority from Mexico City; that is, from President Huerta: and that owing to the interruption of the telegraph service he had no means of getting such instructions. Therefore, he refused to render either the apology or the salute requested in the ultimatum of Admiral Mayo. This explanation was given to Admiral Mayo by Gen. Zaragoza at the suggestion of Consul Clarence Miller, who offered the suggestion to save Admiral Mayo from having to back down, as he had already issued a positive demand on Gen. Zaragoza to render the apology and salute within a prescribed time. Gen. Zaragoza had no intention of saluting the flag or apologizing more than he had verbally at the time of the release of the Marines, when it was stated that their arrest had been a mistake and not due to intent.

"Admiral Mayo had sent several notes to Gen. Zaragoza regarding the incident and each time had received an evasive or indirect answer. Finally, Admiral Mayo said to Mr. B., 'My God, can't I get this man to answer a direct question?' Mr. B. asked him in turn if he expected any such thing, saying that if he did he would be sadly disappointed. Finally, Admiral Mayo gave up hope of receiving the desired apology from Gen. Zaragoza and communicated his conviction that none was to be expected to the State Department at Washington, and was later directed to withdraw his fleet from the harbor at Tampico to the Gulf of Mexico, as the Mexican inhabitants had become very much aroused in their animosity toward Americans by the concentration in Tampico of many of the colonists from interior points, who came there seeking protection from the violence which threatened them in their homes.

"There seemed to be a mistaken idea on the part of Secretary of the Navy Daniels that Tampico was located on the shore of the Gulf instead of being, as it is, some 6 miles up the Panuco River from the Gulf of Mexico. Secretary Daniels's idea seems to have been that the boats were merely withdrawing outside the 3-mile limit and would still be in touch with the situation. Such idea was entirely wrong in that when the ships were located outside the 3-mile limit, as prescribed by international law, they were over 9 miles from the city of Tampico, and the only communication which the American consul had with Admiral Mayo was by communicating through the British or German gunboats which remained in the harbor, and which communication was very unsatisfactory because of the unfriendly attitude of the British at this time toward Americans.

"At the time of the capture of Vera Cruz by the United States troops, when the situation became so critical that Consul Miller wished to obtain shelter for the American women and children aboard the United States ships which had withdrawn to the Gulf of Mexico, the commander of the British ship Hermione, Capt. Doughty, offered his assistance in the following words: 'We can take care of part of your women and children if you have no other place in the world to put them.' Consul Miller thanked him, but at that time refused to avail himself of the offer because of the fact that assistance had already been offered by the German commander of the Dresden and also had been accepted. Later, however, the British did render considerable assistance in rescuing American citizens and transporting them from Tampico to the American boats lying outside the harbor in the Gulf of Mexico, but throughout all they maintained such an attitude of unfriendliness that it was very insulting to the Americans who received such assistance.

"The American employees of the Aguila Co. were prevented from entering the Aguila Building by a guard of British marines who told them that the Aguila Building was neutral property and that they could not jeopardize the British interests by sheltering the Americans from the wrath of the Mexicans, who were threatening to injure them on the day of the riot at Tampico. April 21, 1914.

"On the night of April 21, 1914, when the Americans were being besieged in the Southern Hotel and the Hotel Victoria by mobs of infuriated Mexicans, a lieutenant from the German cruiser Dresden came to the Southern Hotel and asked if the Americans thought the situation sufficiently serious to demand the landing of assistance from the cruiser Dresden. On being informed that the Americans did not feel the need of this assistance at that time, the lieutenant told them that in case they wished assistance to hoist a lantern on the flagstaff above the hotel building and that the commander of the Dresden would send a landing party to rescue them. The Americans replied that they did not deem it necessary at this time, which was about 11 p. m. The German lieutenant then proceeded to the Hotel Victoria, where a number of other Americans had taken refuge, and then started on his return to the Dresden.

"The lieutenant had proceeded only a few blocks when he became convinced that the mob would soon attack the Americans unless help was furnished from some source. This he communicated to the commander of the Dresden, who sent a messenger to Gen. Zaragoza, the Mexican Federal commander at Tampico, informing him that unless the rioting was stopped in 15 minutes that he, the commander of the Dresden, would take such steps as were necessary to restore peace and quiet and protect the foreigners. Upon receipt of this message from the German commander, Gen Zaragoza dispatched a guard of Federal soldiers to disperse the mobs and quell the rioting, which was done in a few minutes' time, and for the balance of the night the guard of Federal soldiers remained on duty at the hotels mentioned and no further disturbances were experienced other than insulting epithets which were given to Americans when they withdrew to the shelter of the ships the following day."

Mr. C, a witness in Tampico on the 20th and 21st days of April, gives the following facts relating to the withdrawal of the Government gunboats from the Panuco River:

"On the afternoon of April 20th Admiral Mayo received a dispatch from Washington ordering the removal of the three gunboats that lay in the Panuco River, within 500 feet of the city of Tampico, out into the Gulf and to send all but the Des Moines to Vera Cruz. The admiral protested against such action vigorously, sending at least three dispatches to Washington before the order was obeyed. Consul Miller, when advised during the night of April 20 that the boats were ordered from the river, sent a long dispatch to Washington protesting, in the name of the hundreds of men, women, and children against such action, stating that their lives would be fearfully endangered by the removal of the boats, and that the Americans had become dependent upon these boats for their safety, having been given refuge on them during two rebel attacks upon the town, the one in December and the other in the forepart of April.

"The Mayo telegrams of protest were along the same lines, but neither were of any avail and the gunboats finally left their strategic position for the defense of Americans at about 9.30 o'clock on the morning of April 21.

"In spite of Secretary Daniels' statement to the contrary, no arrangement was made with the German or English to care for Americans at the time that the battleships left the Panuco River. At 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 21st day of April the Mexican officials published placards in Spanish throughout Tampico saying that the Americans had landed forces at Vera Cruz, and calling upon all patriotic Mexicans to arm for the defense of their country, and arms and ammunition were furnished freely by the Mexican authorities to every one who applied for same. Mobs were formed in different parts of the city during the hours of daylight, but not to any great numbers. These mobs were formed as a result of the removal of what protection the Americans had when the warships were in the river. When the lives of American men, women, and children were menaced by a large mob of Mexicans in the middle of the night, the commander of the German gunboat Dresden voluntarily offered the protection of his Government to these Americans, and sent a naval officer to the hotel to signal from the roof of the same to his flagship in case his services were needed. Positively this was not done as a result of previous arrangement with Admiral Mayo. Later Admiral Mayo did enter into an arrangement with the German and British ships for the handling of refugees.

"It is only necessary to say that the Americans were saved by two small gunboats belonging to the German and English Governments, which proves that if our own three gunboats had been allowed to remain in the river, the lives of the Americans would have been thoroughly safeguarded. We rejoice with Secretary Daniels over the fact that no American lives were lost, but we give glory to God and the German and English Governments, and not Secretary Daniels in this matter.

"No blame can be attached to Admiral Mayo or the officers and men of the American boats who have cried with shame over the fact that they were not permitted to rescue their own countrymen, and that this duty was entrusted, in their very presence, to the battleships of other nations. The English naval officer in charge of one of the boats used for refugees, in making a speech apologizing for having served only hard-tack and corn beef to the refugees, stated that it was not his duty to care for us and that he did it because humanity demanded it, and that he only did so when we had been absolutely abandoned by our own Government."

This concluded the testimony in direct connection with the Tampico incident.

I will now proceed to the matter of the mistreatment of American colonists by the Carranza Government:

An American, whom I shall designate as Mr. D., gave me a statement, of which the following is a synopsis: He was asked by a general in command of the Carranza forces at Victoria if he would not like to go into a very paying business: the general stated that he had a friend with $1,000,000 to invest in a well-paying business which they would put Mr. D. in charge of and give him half interest in the business for operating it. This Mr. D. declined to do. Subsequently the same general asked him to appear before the Subcommittee of the United States Senate Investigating Mexican Affairs for the purpose of presenting certain facts favorable to the Carranza Government. Mr. D. laughingly replied that he could not do the Mexican Government any good by appearing. The general asked: "Well, there are some good Mexicans; are there not?" to which Mr. D. answered: "Of course there are, but I would not make a good witness for the Carranza Government before the Fall committee."

Mr. D. also stated that sometime previous to this conversation bandits had stolen 100 head of cattle from him and told him he could recover the same by bringing 1,000 pesos to a certain place in the mountains. He told the Carranza officer in charge of a garrison near his place that the bandits had stolen his cattle and of their offer to let him have them back for the sum mentioned, and he asked the officer to take his troops and recover the cattle from the bandits. This the officer declined to do. Mr. D. then offered him 1,000 pesos to go and recover the cattle, but the officer again refused, saying that he did not care to take any part in the case and advised Mr. D. to pay the bandits the $1,000 and secure the return of his cattle by that method. Mr. D. finally arranged for the payment of the ransom as demanded by the bandit leader and recovered his cattle. He further stated that he has positive knowledge that there is a working agreement between the bandits in that section and Gen. Manuel Larraga of the Carrancista forces as is evidenced by the facts that the bandits will steal cattle, horses, and mules and drive them to the vicinity of Gen. Larraga's headquarters and when the bandits have accumulated considerable numbers of stock Gen. Larraga's men will make an attack on the bandit forces who flee and leave the booty which is immediately confiscated by Gen. Larraga who disposes of the stock and applies the proceeds to his own account. In no case where the Carrancistas capture property by the above methods from bandits do they restore it to the rightful owner unless he is willing to repay a large ransom for return of the property, their contention being that everything taken from the bandits is theirs as the spoils of war.

Mr. D.'s experiences with regard to having to ransom his stock from the bandits and being unable to secure protection from the Carrancista forces in that neighborhood is typical of many instances happening to the American colonists in the vicinity of Tampico.

Mr. E. made the following statement:

"I was informed by an American, living in the vicinity of the property in question, in the month of October, 1919, that a certain house, owned and located on land belonging to an American citizen, was being torn down and the material being carried away by Federal soldiers. I immediately wrote a letter to Gen. Osuna, who is in command of the forces at this port, calling his attention to the matter and after waiting 15 days and failing to receive a reply called on him personally.

"Gen. Osuna informed me that he had failed to receive my letter and offered to send a man to make an investigation. He first went to the place where a squad of Federal soldiers had used the material taken from the house, consisting of lumber and corrugated roofing iron, for the purpose of constructing temporary quarters in which they were living. He then went to the place where the house had been located where we found only the foundation remaining and the frame of the roof which was lying on the ground. The house had been occupied by a Mexican family until the soldiers put them out and took possession and destroyed it.

"On our return to the office of Gen. Osuna, the man informed him in my presence that the house had been completely destroyed. Gen. Osuna said he was very sorry this thing had occurred and that he would either have the house restored or pay for same, but that he would require a little time to collect the money from the wages of the soldiers who had destroyed the house.

"After calling at the office of Gen. Osuna a number of times and being informed each time that they were not yet prepared to pay for the house, I was advised by Gen. Osuna on the first of this month that he could not make any settlement and that I would have to file my claim against the Government and let it take the usual course.

"The value of the house which was destroyed is about $1,000."

Mr. F., a small-fruit grower near Tampico, made the following statement to me:

"I am an American citizen, born in Whitley County, Ky., January, 1850. Lived in Oklahoma until February, 1912. Since that time I have been a resident in the vicinity of Tampico, Mexico, where I had a small orange orchard and raised garden truck for sale on the Tampico market. The first year and a half immediately following my arrival in Mexico in 1912, I was well treated by all the Mexican people and prospered financially. The latter part of 1913 the revolutionary forces of Carranza and the Federal army comprising Huerta's troops, fought a battle in which my farm and orange grove were immediately between the two contending forces, one army using my south fence for breastworks, and the other army using my north fence, the fighting continuing from morning of the 10th of December until the morning of the 13th of December. My family and myself were compelled to dig a hole in the ground under the house and lay there for three days and nights, with very little food or water. Our buildings, furniture, and household goods were riddled with bullets and everything destroyed.

"Gen. Aguilar, commanding the Carranzista forces took my stock, consisting of work horses, and refused to return them to me. On the 18th of January, 1913, Carranzista soldiers dug trenches and threw up breastworks in what remained of my orange orchard. At this time two of the soldiers met me in the road en route to town with a load of fruit. One of them abused me and struck me with his gun, and I only escaped from them by running for my life. One of my neighbors, a Mexican, interceded for me and tried to convince the soldier that I was a good man, and finally he went away and left me alone.

"In 1914, myself and family left our place and proceeded to Tampico, when we were warned by the American consul that it was unsafe for us to remain on our farm. This was about the 18th of April, 1914. Crowds of Mexicans on the street shouted insults to us and hollered 'Kill the Gringos.'

"About 8 a. m. on April 21, we were notified by the American consul that he had made arrangements for us to get on oil boats that would take us out about 11 miles to the American fleet. There we met Admiral Mayo, who expressed himself as being very sorry that we had been so badly treated, and we were well taken care of on board the United States battleships.

"I returned to Tampico the latter part of May and found that the Federal soldiers of Gen. Huerta had been defeated and driven away from Tampico, and the Carranza soldiers were in possession of that territory. They were impudent and abusive and one group of Carranza's soldiers came to my house in November, 1914, and arrested me and put me in jail with 500 or 600 Mexican prisoners. I was held in jail three days and then turned loose and told to go home. I was never tried and don't know what they charged me with or why I was arrested, but I paid a Mexican lawyer 200 pesos to get me out of jail.

"In June, 1915, Gen. Nafarrate, in command of the troops at Tampico, instructed his soldiers to arrest all Americans and compel them to leave their property, and a bunch of them came to my place and cut down my orange trees and destroyed my pineapples, and also some of my buildings. I then went to Tampico and was again assisted by the American Government to reach Galveston, hoping that the trouble in the vicinity of Tampico would quiet down and I then would be able to return to my place. I have made a claim against the Mexican Government, through the Secretary of State of the United States Government, and am now returning to the United States to wait until peaceable conditions are established in Mexico. We do not feel that our lives are safe even within a few miles of Tampico and so will have to leave our property to the possession of the natives in that vicinity until conditions are safe for our return.

Mr. G. made the following statement to me:

"In connection with the hardships encountered by American citizens in Mexico, especially the difficulties encountered by colonists there, it is pertinent to mention the railroad situation.

"In the fall of 1917 the farmers dealing in agricultural products and shipping their products from points on the railroad between Tampico and Monterrey found it very difficult to obtain cars. After one period of waiting for three months, after having ordered cars to ship their products in, I went to Monterrey and interviewed the chief clerk in the railroad dispatcher's office and managed to have 100 cars placed at points designated by me by agreeing to pay the clerk 10 pesos each for every car they would furnish for the shipment of my products. I experienced no more difficulty in obtaining cars for nearly two years, as their agreement with the chief clerk in the dispatcher's office held good until Gen. Murgía commandeered all the freight cars on this branch of the National Railways to ship out corn and other products which he was purchasing, either directly or through his agents, in the State of Tamaulipas.

"The farmers were unable to secure cars to ship the corn to the market because Gen. Murgía had commandeered the cars for his own use, under the pretext that it was a Government necessity. This compelled those having agricultural products for sale to sell them to Gen. Murgía's representatives at ruinous prices.

"I again proceeded to Monterrey and tried to make another contract with the chief clerk in the dispatcher's office, but found that the chief clerk was unable to deliver me any more cars because Gen. Murgía controlled that division of the railroad; but I found that I was able to arrange for some cars through an agent in Tampico on payment of the sum of 10 pesos per car and putting up a bond of 4,000 pesos per car to guarantee against loss of the car through any acts of bandits, as it was of frequent occurrence that bandits raided trains and burned up the cars along this branch of the railroad. Thus, it will be easily seen that the farmer or colonist of small means had enormous difficulty in getting his products to the market.

"In addition to this the railroad officials forced the payment of express rates on carloads of freight wherever possible, and where the product is valued enough that the shipper will pay such rate, which is very much higher than the commodity freight rate on car lots.

"I also told of an incident happening to another American, which statement is verified, in which the general in command of the garrison at Tampico proposed to a man who had hay to ship that if the man having the hay would give the general 1 car of hay, he would furnish the cars and haul 10 cars of freight free of charge to whatever market this man desired his hay moved, and would also furnish an armed train to see that the hay was not molested in transit. This arrangement was made and the hay delivered according to agreement, the general being able to move 10 cars of freight as a military necessity because he could gain 1 car of hay for his personal profit.

"The members of one freight train crew told me that they had been engaged for almost two months in hauling corn for Gen. Murgía, during which time they had hauled six trainloads of corn over the railroad between Tampico and Monterrey, which was exclusively for Gen. Murgía's account, but which was handled as Government business in the railroad office.

Mr. H. is an American citizen owning a small farm in the vicinity of Tampico, Mexico. On July 13th he received a letter from a bandit leader who signed himself Col. Fabian Aguilar. This letter was in Spanish; a copy follows, also the English translation.

LOS MEZQUITEZ, VER., Julio 27 de 1919.

SEÑOR H, Columbus, Tamps.

MUY SEÑOR MIO: Refiriéndome a la oferta que se sirve Ud. hacerme por conducto del Sargento Mateo Haro, me permito suplicarle enviarme $3,000.00 tres mil pesos, que me son muy necesarios para el sostenimiento de la fuerza de mi mando. En caso de que no le sea a Ud. posible ayudarme con todo el dinero, le estimaré avisarme por escrito la cantidad que mande. Adjunto le remito el salvo conducto que solicita para que no vuelva Ud. a ser molestado en sus intereses. Así mismo le suplico enviarme aviso del comportamiento de mis soldados de ahora en adelante para corregir cualquier irregularidad. Sin otro particular soy su afmo amigo y S. S.

(Firmado)

CORONEL F. AGUILAR.

[Translation of the above letter.]

LOS MEZQUITES, VER., July 27, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the offer you so kindly made through Sergt. Mateo Haro, I take the liberty to ask you to send me $3,000 (pesos), which I very much need for the maintenance of the forces at my command. In case you should not be able to help me out for the full amount, I will thank you to advise me by letter the sum you are sending.

Inclosed find the safe-conduct you requested in order that you may not be further troubled. I will also ask you to report the behavior of my soldiers in the future, in order to enable me to correct any irregularity on their part.

Yours, very truly,

COLONEL F. AGUILAR.

Mr. H. had made the colonel no offer. The letter is written in a very smooth and courteous manner, the rough demands being left to the armed band who delivered the message.

Mr. H. continues:

"In response to this demand for 3,000 pesos, I told the bearer of the note which demanded the payment to say to his leader that I could not pay them that amount, and ask him to tell me in writing the least amount that he would exact from me, and in response he sent me another demand in which he doubled the amount requested in the first letter. There were three men in the party demanding this payment of ransom, and they said I could have until the 15th of August to make the payment, that I had a carload of corn I could ship in the meantime and get the money out of that with which to pay them. They said that if I did not pay them by that time they would take and destroy everything that they could not move from the place and burn the rest of it, and that they also had authority from the leader to kill me as a part of the penalty for not making the payment.

"My farm is located near a town where there is a garrison of 30 Carrancista soldiers. I immediately notified the commander of the Carrancista garrison of the visit of these bandits to my place and of the demand they had made, and told them the direction in which the men had gone and asked him to arrest them, but they said they could do nothing as their orders were to guard the town at which they were stationed.

"The bandits who demanded the 3,000 pesos from me also told me that they were going to compel every foreigner in that part of the country to pay according to the property that he had, and they named a number of Americans whom they had listed to force indemnities from.

"I informed the general in command of the Carrancista forces at Tampico of the first visit of these bandits and he promised to give me protection, but he has made no move to fulfill his promise. I also made a statement to the American consul, and his advice was for me to leave my farm and seek safety elsewhere, unless I could afford to pay the ransom demanded, and, as I do not have the means to pay this ransom, I have decided to abandon my property rather than to pay the penalty threatened me if I remained on it."

It is interesting to note in connection with this statement that the letter demanding 3,000 pesos from Mr. H. was delivered to him by one Sergt. Mateo Haro and that the demand was signed Col. F. Aguilar, and that on August 24 this bandit leader, who signs himself Col. F. Aguilar, surrendered to the general in command of the Carrancista garrison at Tampico and was guaranteed full amnesty for himself and his forces for all unlawful acts committed by them, and he was then commissioned colonel in the Carrancista forces.

It is also of interest to note that the Sergt. Mateo Haro has since been arrested and charged with the crime of assassinating Mr. John H. Correll and of being the leader of the assault on Mrs. Correll. It is also true that Mateo Haro confessed to his part in the crime, but if he or any of his accomplices have suffered any penalty for the commission of their crimes I have been unable to discover that fact.

The following is a brief statement of the hardships encountered by an American colonist in Mexico, whom I shall designate as Mr. I.:

"You ask me to tell you of the hardships and trials that we had in Mexico, and to repeat all of them would make a nice sized book. After one trip, I went back again to look after my property in November, 1913, and then the Carrancistas took Victoria and took some of my cattle and horses when they were battling around Victoria and destroyed my henequen plantation and cut all my fences around my land and took a lot of my corn and fodder, and I only had one mule left, and a crowd of us decided that it would be a good plan to come to the States, so we bundled up what little stuff we could carry and started and it took us over 10 days to come out by horseback and wagon, as the road was bad at times. When we got to the bridge I let a Mexican ride my mule, and when he got to the bridge they took the mule, Mexican, and all, and that was the last I ever saw of the mule. I complained to Gen. Pablo Gonzales, and he told me to get the mule, and had given an order. But when I took the order down to the jefe, they took the order, but I did not get my mule.

"After I was out of Mexico the Mexicans used the fiber plantation to graze goats and burros, and I was offered $22,000 in gold for the plantation in 1912; they run fire through the plantation several times and burned nearly all of the plants, and as the Mexicans stole the fiber and young plants, and also cut the hearts out of the old plants, and could not protect the same, so I sold the plantation and all for $8,000 to get rid of the same. The plantation was worth not less than $30,000, and I would not have sold for less than that when I was offered the $22,000. I put 16 head of thoroughbred cattle over the mountains, pure-bred Holsteins and Jerseys, and put these on the Hausacana ranch, and they took all of these cattle.

"When Caballero was governor of Tamaulipas he offered us some fiber for sale, Mr. Jones and myself, and we bought two cars from him and he was to load the same at a certain time and turn over this fiber to us; but the price went up to such a high value that he took it away from us and sold the same himself, and when the price of fiber dropped to the normal times, then he gave us what fiber was due us, and we lost not less than $2,500 in the transaction, and I have the papers of the same and also his receipts of the purchase and the offer of the firm wanting to buy at the time when he took it away from us. I have paid taxes time after time on land and have sold some land since the Carranza Government is in and have had to pay more taxes than what I should have paid. I also bought some money when the fiat money came out and sold some and took 20,000 pesos over across the river, and the jefe across the river here informed me that the money was good, and to buy all of it at the price I wanted, and I sold the same, and then about a week after they stated that the money was no good and I had to make all the money good and lost over $5,000 in gold in this transaction. Then they barred me from Mexico, and I had all the receipts of the people that I bought from, and then to get a permit to return into Mexico I had to send all of these in and they canceled all charges that they had against me and notified all the judges not to molest me.

"I also had two mines denounced up at Charcos and spent about $4,000 in gold on these and the denouncements, and the Carranza Government canceled these titles, as they were given to us during the Huerta régime. The property was denounced during the Madero times."

The following is a statement of a mining engineer residing at San Luis Potosi, Mexico, of 20 years experience in Mexico, regarding general conditions there:

"I have spent the greater portion of the last 20 years in the mountains of Mexico, because I am free from rheumatism here; consequently, I believe I know the country as a whole, and the people better than most other Americans. I have traveled over every county in the Republic, and have come in contact with every grade of people from pure-blood Indians to the Presidents. I will state at the beginning that I am a friend of the Mexican people, that is, the law abiding class, and the country in general. If possible to adjust conditions here without armed intervention, I certainly would prefer it, but how it is or can be done I am unable to say. Maybe you people can work it out some way. I have suffered the loss of property which I assure you has hurt me a great deal, but I have not made any claims for damages, and do not intend to, because if I had not found this country when I did I would not be on earth to write you this letter. In my opinion Mexico has arrived at the point where it can not save itself for the following reasons:

"At the present time the government holds the larger towns and the greater portion of the railroads. The bandits, so-called, control about all of the country between the railroads, which is 90 per cent of it, and practically all the small towns. Every passenger train carries an armed escort of soldiers, from 20 to 75; they go ahead of the trains in armed cars, and when some important persons are on the trains they generally run an escort train both behind and ahead.

"Carranza is dominated by his generals. They in turn do not wish to end the banditism because they are allowed to do as they please, have all become wealthy, and are growing richer all the time. It is well known that they draw pay for paying from two to five times the soldiers they have under arms. Besides this they commandeer horse feed, horses, and other supplies from the citizens and never pay for them. Yet they draw money from the Government for the purpose. It is believed by the majority of Mexicans that Carranza is letting his generals do as they please, and rob the government for the purpose of keeping in with them, so that when the election comes on he can claim that a lawful one can not be held, which will allow him to stay in. Personally, I believe this is true. It is well known that not one of the several generals had anything when the Carranza revolution started, but at the present time they are trying and have bought large tracts of land, and stocked them, and keep a guard of government soldiers on them for the protection of their individual interest. Some months ago Pablo Gonzales gave one of his friends, Antonio Acosta, $50,000 for buying a mine.

"He has publicly stated that he would spend $2,000,000 to defeat Obregon for the presidency. It is known that he did not have 5,000 pesos when he became general. Francisco Murgua has recently bought a large ranch in Coahuila and has property in San Antonio that brings him over $6,000 rental per month. A few months ago Gen. Hasso took $2,200 worth of merchandise from a mercantile company of this place, and refused to even give them a voucher for it. He also took 20 of the best horses there were from the San Jose ranch, about 20 miles south of here, and refused a voucher. Both have written time and again to the government about it, but have never received any reply.

"Gen. Isidro Cardona took over a mine belonging to a widow woman, worked it, taking out 35 carloads of ore, sold it, leaving the mine in very bad condition—never gave her one cent. He killed a Spaniard who had several houses here, took possession of the houses, and is collecting rent on them to this day."

"This thing is going on all over the country and is well known, but I am giving you facts that came under my personal observation."

"Carranza is robbing the people by high taxation in order to get money for his generals. He knows they are robbing, but is helpless to prevent it if he so desires. Taxes to-day on low-grade ores are about 20 per cent of their value, consequently the mine owners can not work them at a profit, and they are shut down while thousands of men are idle, almost starving for the want of work. The mercantile houses are being taxed so high that they must sell at high prices in order to pay them. The people, in turn, have to pay the prices, which in the majority of cases they are not able to do, and are in a semistarving condition."

"When Felipe Pescador was general manager of railroads, he gave the management of all divisions to some of his personal friends. At every division point the friend had his private supply store in the town, in which he carried a general supply of railroad supplies—supplies that were taken from the railroad shops. When a mechanic applied at the shops for something to repair the cars, he was told it was not in stock, but he might find it at a certain store up town. He would go and get it, give a voucher for same. The voucher would be sent to Mexico City. Pescador would honor it and remit his friend, the owner, one half and kept the other half. Pescador was a second-rate operator (telegraph) before he was made general manager."

"People wonder where the bandits get their arms and ammunition. They get them in two ways, one by attacking trains, killing the escorts, taking their arms and ammunition. Another means of getting them is: The Carranza soldiers. And I may say some of the petty officers sell Government ammunition to the smaller stores, and they, in turn, sell it to rebel agents. The more ammunition the Government gets the more the rebels will get. The following facts I took from Mexican newspapers; some came under my personal knowledge. During the 20 months I have been here, 52 trains have been dynamited, robbed, all the passengers robbed, the escorts killed, and the young girls in most instances taken away to the mountains to live worse than death. In most instances those girls were of the better families, because the poorer class were not able to travel on railroads."

"Within 30 miles of ———, which is garrisoned, there are five separate bunches of bandits. Benito Zapeda, with 40 men, has been camped 12 miles east of ——— for three months, yet no effort has been made to get rid of him. On the 26th of July Ygancio Gonzalez, Francisco Trevino, and three other men of the town went for a ride about 6 miles out. All were captured by the Zapeda bunch, their horses taken, part of their clothing, four of them were held, and Ygnacio Gonzalez was sent back for a ransom of $500 each, with a threat that if the money was not forthcoming by the next morning the four would be shot, and he would be shot as soon as they could get their hands on him. During a conversation with him I asked him if he had reported it. He said no; that they had no guaranties, and that if they reported it they would be killed. Two weeks ago a bunch took the manager of the Agua Dulce ranch to the mountains for $30,000 ransom, and he is still there, not being able to raise the money."

"About a month ago one Gen. Garcia captured a town 12 miles west, killed the colonel and his aid, robbed several stores, and left without being molested."

"On the 22d of August a band robbed all four stores at the ranch of Santa Tirbucio."

"An old man, and a good one, by the name of Feliciano Gonzales, who had 6 cows, about 50 goats, and 5 horses. During the last two months they have taken everything he had and left him so poor he can hardly live."

"At the station of La Ventura there lives a man by the name of Constancio Acosta. He is a one-legged man and has to keep himself and five in family on 1 peso per day, which he gets by looking after the railroad pump. With the help of his wife and small children he planted some wheat, and about the time it was grown a bunch of several hundred came along, turned their horses in on it, with the result that next morning there was no wheat. He had nine cows and of those gave seven of them for some wheat that was cut and in bundles. Before he could thrash it another bunch came along, threw the wheat to their horses, leaving him with nothing but two cows and his peso per day."

"During the last few months three trains were burned near Saltillo, on the Coahuila & Zacatecas Railroad, a line 65 miles long, and since that time about a dozen bridges have been burned on the same line.

"In order to show what poverty exists outside of the mining camps I will cite two cases that came under personal observation: I was at a little ranch about 10 miles south of here by the name of ———. We rode up to two little houses (jacals) and called for some water. The women answered that they had some water, but had no clothes and could not bring it out to us. During the same trip we saw a dozen people waiting around a sick cow until she died, and the owner skinned her, then they cut up and ate the meat. I asked them if they were not afraid to eat it, and they answered that they had as well to die from bad meat as to starve to death. The people away from mining camps eat lizzards, toads, burro meat, and anything they can get.

"The railroad officials are robbing the roads of about one-half the fares. For instance, the ticket agents will sell about half the berths on the Pullmans, then tell the passengers there are no more. This was done with me, then after the train leaves the conductor sends his aide into the day coaches, picks out his friends, brings them back, and sells them berths. Then he and the agent that had no more divides 50-50. The greater portion of passengers will buy a ticket to the first or second station, which gets them through the gates, then the conductor will carry them through for half fare and pockets the whole.

"It is known that there are 180 bandit heads in the Republic and no question there are more. Every State has some general for governor, and he is seeing to it that he does not go hungry.

"Formerly there were millions of horses and cattle, now it is a rare thing to see one. Every property owner lives in some garrisoned city and never leaves to see his property. Every man who has anything at all is afraid to leave the town.

"I am sending you several clippings taken from Mexican papers. Among them is an account of the murder of Adam Scheffer, an American. I see the governor has advised the Federal Government that the bandit head, Albino Gaitan, was killed. I was informed by a Mexican by the name of ———, to-day that Gaitan was at this moment camped about 25 miles west of ———, that he saw him last night. No doubt but that you have seen the account of the death of Villa and Martin Lopez several times. Yes; well this is about the way they all turn out. The account of the death was evidently sent out for certain effects.

"Mexico is a very rich country, and if it could have an honest government, honestly governed, it could soon recuperate, but, it has not and I don't think ever will through these people. So many bandits all over the country, if they are bandits, and the heads of the country acting like they are, how are they to ever put it in good shape? See if you can work it out; I can't.

"Remember also that I am here, and it might be unpleasant to have my name exposed."

The following statement was made by Mr. Barnes at the time he left his property in 1914, and he has not been able to return to the farm since because of the dangers to life and property in that vicinity.

U. S. S. "DES MOINES," April 30, 1914.

By R. E. BARNES,
Merriam, Kans:

Two hundred acres of land in Atascador colony, District of Valles, San Luis Potosi, and 15 miles north of Rodriguez station, valued at $40 per acre; household goods; farm implements and wagon; 4 head of mules (taken at station at Ebano); 1 wagon and contents (taken at station at Ebano); 8 acres of sugar cane, at $200 per acre; cane mill and evaporator.

R. E. BARNES.

He states that about April 23, 1914, he and his neighbor Mr. L. M. Moorehead, and sons of the latter, were en route to Panuco from their farms on the Atascador, in wagons, and Mr. Barnes had four mules and a wagon, Mr. Moorehead had eight mules and a wagon—all intending to work on the new railway under construction at Panuco. When they entered the town of Ebano, the Huertista commander there took their teams, wagons, and harness, camping outfit, etc., from them and they came to Tampico on a troop train and were advised by the American consul to leave the country which they did in company with many other Americans.

Mr. K. relates the following story:

"Writing my experiences especially during the revolution here in Mexico, I am glad to do so if it possibly can help to untangle things. I have lived in Mexico 20 years.

"During the first year you could call it revolution, but soon it grew to fire, murder of innocent people in order to rob.

"We had a nice foreign colony, mostly Americans, in San Dieguito and also in Rasco, Micos, Crucitos, and San Mateo, and stations on the railroad between Tampico and San Luis Potosi, about 200 kilometers southwest from first-named city. Horses and cattle were taken away from us, fences broken down time and again, and crops destroyed.

"As soon as a crop of corn was ready it was taken away from us. All these things commenced after Carranza got in power, because little groups of so-called solders sprung up everywhere, not being contented with the new boss, and papers given us by generals and other officials were not respected at all.

"One afternoon, year 1914, just after dinner as I was still sitting round the table with my family, suddenly appeared four armed men and entered the house and demanded from me $1,000, arms, etc. Money I did not have more than about $100 which, of course, I gave, likewise a shot gun, pistol, three or four dozen new yute sacks 'machetes,' etc., and if it had not been because I manage the language good, I was saved from further trouble.

"When the Americans entered Vera Cruz, all the Americans in Micos were gathered up like cattle, even ladies, and shut up in the American grocery store for three days and insulted in various ways, and the next day they all left on horseback, except me, as my wife was sick. Some of them got through to Tampico in three days after many hardships, and two men were stopped, Mr. Speedy, English, and Cavan, American, to be shot, but happened to escape. This was all done by Carranzistas.

"A little while after this one Sunday afternoon, I was sitting in my house with my family, when up came a Carranza captain with four soldiers, took a horse I had tied up and commenced to insult me for Gringo, etc., one of them, a youth about 14 years old, pointing his rifle against me. They were all drunk. I had a part of a bottle of Mexican brandy in the house and I told the captain to step inside, offered him a chair and a drink, another, and talking to him until he got reasonable and left, and even told the soldiers to tie up the horse where it was before. It was not the first time that a drink saved a life here in Mexico.

"During all this time everything was taken away little by little until nothing was left, no animals to work with, etc.

"Three years ago in month of January, I was woke up one night at 10 o'clock. In came a bunch of armed men, about 20 of them. They demanded $1,000, rifles, etc., and when I told them that I did not have it, the captain told one of his men to get a rope and string me up.

"Again I talked him out of it when I told him he could have the corn, about 40 bushels, which I had on the second story.

"While we were up loading, some of the men had cleaned up my bedroom, as I had only put on a pair of pants when I left bed, sheets, pillows, stockings, boots, blankets, shirts, and coal. All I got back was my boots, pants, and an undershirt. I did not like to see a rope so near a second time.

"Afterwards they burned the house.

"For the last four years or five, not a month, sometimes not a week, has passed without wrecking a train, robbing the passengers, and carrying the young girls away.

"Where you before could not travel on a train or horseback, you would not now even an old burro, dog, or a chicken. People in the ranches live hidden in the mountains, their houses being burnt down by Government soldiers, this being especially true in the oil fields, even big towns gone."

The following is the statement of Mr. M. L. McCrocklen, now deceased:

"This is to advise you that on the morning of November 15, 1913, at my hacienda 'Espiritu Santo,' Micos, Mexico, about 5 o'clock of said morning, I was surrounded by a Mexican Army consisting of Gens. Carranza and Villa forces, to number of 200 well-armed soldiers, while I was working at my sugar mill. They demanded me to proceed to the house at once, which I did at the point of Winchesters. They then, on reaching the house, demanded 3,000 pesos of me. I was unable to produce more than 600, which they took, and immediately calling for a rope and tying it around my neck and hanging me to a tree and began torturing me, my toes just touching the ground. I begged permission to allow my foreman and clerk to witness the execution so that they could tell my family what had become of me. They granted the request, explaining that they would execute all of the Americans immediately after my death. As a last resort I plead with them that I was an old man, being 71 years old at the time, and had only a few more years to live, and had always been good to their people, and asked them to call my employees up and carefully ask them, which they did, and after conferring with all of my captains, they granted my pleadings, provided I would place in the hands of the leader 3,000 pesos at a lonely spot designated in the mountains, and said that if this amount was not deposited in the place designated at the stated time they would return and burn my entire hacienda and kill me. After promising to meet their demands they finally released me, taking me to my house again, together with my other American employees, at the point of their guns, and held us for five hours while they were looting and sacking my house, store, and bodegas of their entire contents. After loading the same and carrying it all away, together with all my mules, horses, and saddles, then they robbed my foreman and clerk of all clothing and personal effects. I fled for my life to a seaport and remained at Tampico. Sometime in December, 1913, I met Hon. John Lind, United States representative of President Wilson, and discussed the whole matter with him, and he directed that I should file a claim for my loss, but should make every effort to save my crop of sugar cane, and if I succeeded in saving it, should send in a credit of same to Washington, D. C., to be indorsed on my claim. He did not think I should go on the hacienda, but might remain along the railway and watch it, but this finally became of no use and the crop was a total loss."

The following is the statement of Mr. Hiram Catron, related to me on October 25, 1919:

"My name is Hiram Catron, American citizen, born in Hawkins County, Tenn., March 9, 1850. Came to Tampico, Mexico, January 28, 1907. Located on my ranch at Las Palmas February 1, 1907, and have resided there until August 1, 1919, when conditions became so bad that I left and have been staying in Tampico or vicinity since, because there is reason to believe that I would be murdered if I remained on my property owing to the fact that my son, Peter Catron, was assassinated June 7, 1919.

"My ranch of about 1,400 acres is named hacienda Las Puenteas, near the station of Las Palmas, San Luis Potosi, and I resided there continuously until the 1st of August, 1919, with the exception of 40 days—from June 24, 1916, until August, 1916—during which time myself and family took refuge in the mountains to escape a marauding band of Carranzista soldiers, who were terrorizing that part of the country in which I lived. My son and myself returned to the ranch from our hiding place in the mountains, and were fired upon by the Carranzista soldiers, when we again took refuge in the mountains until notified by friendly Mexicans that the Carranzista soldiers had left the vicinity of my ranch. The Carranzista soldiers had looted my ranch during my absence of 32,000 pesos (Mexican paper money) and $100 (American money), 10,000 pesos worth of sugar, 800 pesos worth of coffee, 4,000 pesos worth of corn, 10,000 pesos worth of household goods, 40 head of cattle, 3 mules and 1 mare, 7 sets of harness, 1 farm wagon, and several plows. This was the total loss during this one raid of June 24, 1916, and since returning to my ranch August 5, 1916, up to the time of my leaving it, August 1, 1919, I lost about 350 head of cattle, 10 head of horses, and 6 head of mules.

On June 7, 1919, my son, Peter Catron, had taken a small canoe from the ranch house to the Tamesi River about noon, and about 8 p. m. the team returned without any driver. Search was at once begun and continued until the second day, when my son's body was found floating in the river, the wounds in his body showing that he had been murdered. One shot from a 30-30 rifle had entered the back of his neck and come out under his chin, causing instant death. Subsequent investigation has developed the fact that two Mexican cattle thieves, one by name of Isabel Valderis and Elenzo Zeura had committed the murder. This was told by an eye witness by name of Luterio Cedillo, who lives near the scene of the murder and who had followed the Mexicans and saw them shoot Peter Catron. The reason for the murder was that these two Mexicans had been stealing cattle from my ranch, as well as from other Americans in the country, and my son Peter had caught them in the act and had complained to the authorities, which resulted in their being arrested and placed in jail charged with stealing cattle. Owing to the influence of Gen. Manuel Laraga, who is a Carranzista general at Guerrero, and who exerted his influence in behalf of these two thieves, they were given their liberty; and in order to intimidate other Americans, they committed this cold-blooded murder.

My son, Peter Catron, who was murdered as aforesaid, was born in Berry County, Mo., December 19, 1881, and came to Mexico in March, 1908. He lived with me on my ranch until the time of his murder, being sober and industrious, and well liked by both Americans and Mexicans. He was my principal help in managing my ranch as he spoke Spanish very fluently, and for the reason that I was so dependent on him I deemed it unsafe for me to stay there on the ranch after his murder.

"My losses and the mistreatment I have received have been caused by Carranzista soldiers or bandits operating under their protection, as is evidenced by the following incidents:

"During the year 1913, I had 300 bushels of corn taken by the troops of Gen. Manuel Laraga; and in February, 1914, Gen. Nafarrate camped with about 1,500 soldiers on my ranch. They destroyed about 6,000 pesos worth of sugar and corn, besides cutting down 60 acres of sugar cane, which was a total loss for two years following. Sugar cane produced about 200 pesos worth of sugar per acre each year, so that my loss for the 60 acres was in the neighborhood of 24,000 pesos.

"The colonists have been systematically robbed and some of them murdered for the sole purpose of intimidating those who remained, and to compel them to desert their property, which is then confiscated or destroyed by the Mexicans under the protection of the Carrancista troops. All of the territory in the vicinity of my ranch is controlled by Carrancista troops under Gen. Manuel Larraga, whose brother, Leopoldo Larraga, has purchased many head of live stock at a fraction of their value from the thieves operating in that territory. The ranch of Gen. Manuel Larraga at Guerro is stocked with the best cattle selected from the former colonists of the Atascador and other colonies on the San Luis Potosi Railway. Also a number of the farm implements in use on his ranch are known to be those stolen from American colonists, who have been driven from their homes, and whose farms are now either grown up in brush or occupied by Mexican squatters.

"It is in vain that appeal has been made to the Government of the United States through the medium of its consular representatives, as they have invariably taken the matter up through the State Department at Washington with the Mexican Government, who in turn report the matter to the local authorities and the American who has so complained to his own Government has then been much worse abused than before."

The following is the translated testimony of two eye witnesses to the murder of Peter Catron as taken from the Primary Court, City of Valles, State of San Luis Potosi, Mexico:

Statement of Virginia Villasana: August 25, 1919, having been summoned, Virginia Villasana appeared. She was informed of the penalty for false testimony, and having been questioned regarding herself, she said: "My name is as written, 38 years of age, a widow, a native of Tula, Tamaulipas, and living on the ranch Las Puertes, in the municipality of Villa de Guerrero." On due examination she replied: "On the 7th of July, which was Monday, and about 12 o'clock, Eleno Zequera, Isabel and Pedro Balderas, and a boy about 12 years of age, a brother of the Balderas, came to my house which is at La Cuaya, and which belongs to the ranch Las Puertes, the property of the Americans, Monty and Pedro H. Catron, situated in the municipality of Villa de Guerrero, my house being about 50 paces from the river. Said parties were a little intoxicated, Isabel Balderas being more so than the others, as he laid down to go to sleep and the others stayed there, Zequera carrying a gun, the others not having arms, for, as I knew, they were going to stay in the country. About 1 in the afternoon Don Pedro Catron came, alone and on foot and unarmed, to get a hammer, a hatchet, and a bottle of whiskey, telling me that he was going to put a boat in the river to fish, and after he had left the house with those things, and was a short distance away, Eleno Zequera talked to him, regarding some cattle which Zequera had on the Las Puertes ranch, and said: 'Listen, Don Pedro, you told me to take the cattle away.' Don Pedro replied: 'Yes, take it away.' Then Eleno said to him: 'No; why should I take it away, and now that I think of it I won't take it away.' Don Pedro replied: 'Yes, man; take it away.' Eleno then said: 'Now, another thing. I know that you say that I take away cattle, that I am a cow thief; that I even steal cattle from my employer.' Don Pedro replied: 'Yes, man, why not?' Eleno asked him if he had proofs of this, to which Don Pedro replied that he had proofs."

"To this Zequera asked what proofs he had. And then Zequera said: 'Prove it,' and immediately fired a shot from a gun on the saddle, in the direction of Don Pedro, and without raising it to take aim he fired, the shot taking effect in his throat or neck and came out behind at the nape of the neck, and at a distance of about 2 meters. Immediately Don Pedro fell dead, without making a motion. Then Zequera tried to carry the body of Don Pedro to throw it into the river, and demanded the assistance of Pedro and Isabel Balderas, and as the latter was asleep he was awakened by Pedro to help Zequera to throw the body, and as these refused to help Zequera threatened them with the firearm, making them help him, and the Balderas, Zequera, and the boy who was with them, threw the body into the river, Zequera telling everybody in the house that they should not say anything about what had happened or the same would happen to them as to Don Pedro. In my house at that time were my two daughters, Francisca Sanchez and Eustacia Cedillo, and my nephew Eleuterio Cedillo, who witnessed the deeds which I have narrated, as they happened at a short distance from the house and on the nearby highway. I want to state that the disagreement which arose between Zequera and Catron was because of the matter of the cattle which Zequera had on Catron estate, for which he did not pay pasturage, and because he stole cattle from Catron, as shown in the conversation which they had, and which was the cause of his death. Afterwards, and only once, and while I was away from the house, Zequera came and asked if I had said anything about what had happened, and when I said I had not been threatened to harm them if they should do so, promised to pay their living expenses. He asked if anyone had been searching for him, and hoped that they would, and that Monty would come that he could kill him also." The above has been read, was certified to, and was not signed, as she could not write.

Statement of Francisca Sanchez: In the City of Valles, on the 12th day of the month of September, 1919, after being summoned, Francisca Sanchez appeared; she swore to tell the truth, and on being questioned regarding her history said: "My name is as written; am 19 years of age, unmarried, a native Estacion de Las Palmas, and live at the ranch La Cuaya in the municipality of the Villa de Guerrero." Having been examined in accordance with the summons she replied: "It is true that on the 7th day of July last, in the morning, and before 12 o'clock, Eleno Zequera, Isabel, and Pedro Balderas, and Amancio Balderas, their brother, about 12 years old, came to the house, Eleno being armed with a gun, the Balderas not carrying arms, and all on horseback. I do not know why they came to the house, where my mother, Virginia Villasana, Eustacia Cedillo, my mother's niece, and Eleuterio of the same name, a brother of the former and I live, and as Isabel Balderas was a little drunk he laid down to sleep in the kitchen of the house. Shortly afterwards the North American, Pedro H. Catron, arrived, to get a bottle of whisky and an axe to take to some place where he had a wagon; I did not see any arms on his person. After he left the house Eleno Zequera caught up with him a short distance down the road, and I could not hear what they were talking about because of the distance, but from the signs they were making it was seen they were disputing, but my mother, Virginia, who was near, must have heard. They were talking in this way when Eleno Zequera, who had gone after Catron on horseback, fired a shot from the gun he was carrying. Don Pedro falling dead immediately. Just at that moment Eustacia went to awaken Isabel Balderas, who was asleep, and then Eleno Zequera threatened my mother and us not to tell what had happened, and made Pedro and Isabel Balderas help him to carry the body of Don Pedro to throw it in the river, and Isabel Balderas hit Pedro with the handle of an axe, telling him to go to the road and see if anyone was coming. Amancio afterwards going away with a horse, and I, having seen the body of Don Pedro, saw that he had a bullet hole in his throat. After this Zequera as well as the Balderas went away, the former alone, taking the road to Santa Elena, and the others toward the ranch where they live. About 15 days afterwards Eleno Zequera came back to the house in company with Guacalupe del Angel and a boy called Eleuterio whose family name I do not know, on horseback and armed; they remained only a short time, and only asked about the other Americans, and then went away." She certified to the foregoing after it had been read, and did not sign, as she can not write. I attest.

Mr. L. told me the following story:

"On or about November 27, 1917, Mr. L. L. Wieder, an American citizen, one of the colonists of the Atascador, went to the town of Guerrero, S. L. P., Mexico, to complain to Gen. Manuel Larraga, who was at that time, and still is, a Carrancista officer in charge of Government troops in that district, his complaint being that cattle thieves had robbed him and other Americans in that settlement. On his way returning when about 2 miles from his home, he was shot and killed by Mexicans whose names are Alalio Nava, Domacio Nava, Inez Barron, Camilo Martinez, and another whose first name is Nicholas. After robbing him his body was left lying in the public road. He received one shot in the heart, two through the head, and one through the leg and one through the hand. The above-named murderers are now living on the Atascador and have never been tried for their crime for the reason that Gen. Larraga controls the court absolutely and prevents their giving justice as has been demonstrated in other cases.

"Shortly after the murder of Mr. Wieder, 275 head of his cattle were taken by the above-named murderers and Cecilio Roque, Antonio Castillo, Emilio Sanchez, Nieves Barron (a brother of the Inez Barron mentioned), and Juan Cruz to the town of Guerrero and sold to Col. Leopoldo Larraga, brother of Gen. Manuel Larraga, for the sum of $11 per head. His household goods, the sheet-iron roof of his house, his farm wagons and plows were also taken to Guerrero and sold to the same party. The farm wagons and plows were sold by Julian Reyes and Alberto Rodriguez. The wagons are in use in Guerrero to-day and can be identified. All fences and buildings on the farm belonging to Mr. Wieder have been carried away or destroyed.

"Another American colonist of the Atascador had 300 head of Durham cattle taken by Camilio Martinez, Inez Barron, Alberto Rodriguez, Alalio and Domacio Nava, Antonio Castillo, Cecilio Roque, and Nicholas —, and sold to Col. Leopoldo Larraga and Maj. Pedro Zamudio—one team of American mules, one Percheron mare, wagons, horses, farm implements, and other movable property were taken and the buildings and fences all destroyed or taken away. One of the thieves, Camilio Martinez, now lives on the Harnback farm, which is called La Providencia.

"From Mr. E. S. Dunn the same band of thieves took 50 head of very fine dairy cattle, household goods, implements, etc.; all fences and buildings are gone, and the purchasers were the same two men, Col. Larraga and Pedro Zamudio; the latter is now mayor of the town of Guerrero.

"From Mrs. D. E. Duff 40 head of fine dairy cattle were taken, as well as all farm implements, buildings, and fences destroyed or stolen, by the same band of thieves named above, and by orders of Maj. Pedro Zamudio.

"At the present time there is not one American settler left in the Atascador colony, nor is there one American house left except in ruins.

"It is useless and it would be foolish to ask any further redress of the courts or Mexican authorities, as their lives as well as their positions are absolutely dependent upon the military authorities, and these last mentioned are aiding and abetting in the crimes of murder, robbery, and terrorism which has been systematically carried out to dispossess the Americans of their property.

"A very creditable witness told me yesterday, October 25, 1919, that within the last month he had seen one of the Jersey cows stolen from Mrs. D. E. Duff in the possession of Gen. Manuel Larraga, at his home, which trifling bit of evidence goes to prove that he was interested in getting the best of the loot.

"Therefore it is worse than useless to look toward the Carranza officials as they are constituted at present, for redress. It will merely put them on guard and they get their henchmen together and nicely whitewash all of the black spots in their records.

"Protest is hereby made against the confiscatory decree of article 27, constitution of 1917, which attempts to confiscate the subsoil rights of our property. Protest also is made against the abridgment of our rights to sell our properties to anyone but Mexicans, unless the purchasers agree to consider themselves Mexicans with respect to such properties, and therefore not to invoke the aid or protection of their governments in connection therewith. (Art. 27, clause 1, Constitution of 1917.)

"When the Americans began to colonize the tract known as Atascador it was entirely unpopulated, and semiwild long-horned cattle roamed over it; the opportunity to purchase was open then and had been for years, but the Mexicans had not developed 1 acre of the rich farming land there. But when the Americans had cleared and developed the land from jungle to well improved farms, they are murdered, robbed, their women ravished, and a general campaign of terrorism inaugurated for the sole purpose of enriching a few Carrancista officials who coveted the fruit of the labor of the American colonist."

Mr. N. makes the following statement:

"For 25 years I have lived in one community in the State of Tamaulipas on a plantation purchased and developed by myself from its virgin condition of young-timber land. Sixteen of these years were passed under the administration of Porfirio Diaz and the different governors of the State during that period, with all of whom I had the most intimate relations, and received from them every consideration and kindness, as well as from the local authorities. During all that time I had but one legal controversy with anyone. I was received as a friend by all of the Mexican people with whom I came in contact and the same consideration that they extended to all the other foreigners who show a disposition to help them develop their country by working their lands or mines upon modern lines without any special effort to exploit them. These years were uneventful, the most of my time being devoted to the improvement of the property.

"The year 1913 was the first year of revolutionary activity that we felt in this section of Mexico. On April 18 of that year I was awakened at about 12 o'clock at night by a summons from some armed men accompanied by my mayordomo, who, after I had admitted them, said that they were scouts of the forces of Lieut. Col. Nafarrete, a revolutionary chief who had revolted against the Huerta régime near the City of Mexico and had come overland from the city toward Victoria, Tamaulipas, with the intention of executing vengeance on the people of Victoria for a rather summary dismissal that they had received from these people.

"The message that these scouts brought to me was that they had taken the town of Llera that afternoon at 4 o'clock and proposed to make me a visit within a day or two, assuring me that they were familiar with my kindness to the people of that district, and would therefore give me all protection. I, of course, realized that this visit meant something besides that and I asked them what it was that they really wanted. They replied that they wanted a can of coal oil and a bucket of crude petroleum, which I immediately ordered the mayordomo to deliver to them and then dismissed them.

"During the next few days this revolutionary party went recruiting among the people of the municipality, and on the 20th they called upon me in force, being introduced by an old friend of mine who had been the candidate for the Maderista party for the year before for president municipal, but had been defeated by the efforts of the clergy and landowners, the ticket representing them being victorious, as alleged by their opponents, fraudulently.

"Lieut. Col. Nafarate and Maj. Navarrete were the leaders of about 75 veterans of the Madero revolution, who had made this long trip of approximately 700 miles from Mexico City in 20 days. They assured me that they required nothing of me, but would appreciate it if I would give them the rifles and ammunition which they knew that I had. I thought it the better part of discretion to surrender the arms, as they had respected all of my other property. They immediately passed on to my neighbor's hacienda, where they spent the night, the owners having fled at their approach. They occupied the main dwelling, obliging the foreman to surrender 20 or 30 horses and otherwise disposing of the property as though they were the owners.

"During the two days that this force had held the town of Llera, capturing the municipal officers who were alleged to have been fraudulently seated, and made them sign an agreement not to exercise the duties of their offices any further, and left other officers of their own choosing who were principally those officers who had been defeated at the preceding election. Early in the morning of the 22d of April this force, after traveling 45 miles during the day of the 21st, appeared before Victoria, the capital of Tamaulipas, and demanded the surrender of the town, which was refused by the then governor, Matias Guerra. The town was garrisoned by a detachment of the Tenth Regiment of Rurales under Capt. Navor Torres, assisted by the Defensa Social, a voluntary organization of citizens. The rebels were defeated and by evening were in flight in the direction of Matamores.

"I was afterwards told by friends in Victoria that the rifles which the rebels received from me were really the only arms they had that caused any dangerous situation, as the other arms they had were not important.

"Within a few days the former officials of the municipality of Llera, who had signed under duress the agreement not to exercise the duties of their offices again, returned to their offices—were in daily discharge of their duties. Nothing further was heard from Lieut. Col. Nafarate and his band until May 13 of the same year, when he surprised two freight trains and a passenger train at a switch near San Francisco, 30 miles due south of Victoria, on the Monterey and Gulf division of the National Lines of Mexico. They caused the passengers to alight, taking prisoner two of them, a Spaniard named Lucas Haces and a Mexican named Barberena, who were at once accused of being enemies of the revolution and sentenced to death. Barberena was finally reprieved by some powerful friends of the revolution who happened to be on the train, but Lucas Haces, accused of being a foreigner and taking part in the recent fight at Victoria, was taken a short distance below Forlon Station and executed. His body remained there exposed several days and was literally devoured by wild animals.

"The leader of this band of revolutionists was Col. Jesus Augustine Castro, afterwards subsecretary of war for two years under the Carranza administration. His record has been a notable one. From being a conductor on the electric line between Gomez Palacio and Torreon at the beginning of the Madero revolution, he had organized what was called the Twenty-first Regiment of Rurales, and it was a remnant of these rurales with their Maj. Navarrete, who had attacked Victoria, and after being defeated had gone to receive more arms and ammunition from across the Texas border, and had returned. On this occasion they numbered with their new recruits some 200 well armed and well mounted men.

"Upon receiving advice of the affair of the shooting of the Spaniard near our station at Forlon, 3 miles from our plantation, and the presence of Col. Castro's troops at said station, I drove over there with a clerk, and for the first time became acquainted with Col. Castro and renewed my acquaintance with Maj. Navarrete. I found the colonel affable, and he assured me that his desire was to protect all foreigners against molestation by his troops.

"He then left the railroad, proceeding to Xicontencatl, where he continued his propaganda, and of course received daily acquisitions of recruits to his troops. He made a wide detour toward the west to the mountains and then returned to the railway station, passing our plantation at 5 o'clock in the evening of the 16th of May, where he paid his troops from money obtained from merchants of the towns passed, having surprised the old officials of the town of Llera performing the duties of their offices, which they had agreed not to, and executed two of them and pardoned the presidente, Alberto Muniz, on account of his son-in-law having joined his forces, after giving him a good beating.

"Having paid off his troops at our plantation, Castro proceeded to another hacienda for the night and early in the morning his scouts were surprised by running upon Federal scouts protecting the flank of the Federal forces repairing the railroad at Yeasi Station, which were going north to meet another force coming south from Victoria also repairing the railroad. During the morning Castro captured an unfortunate lineman, who was coming ahead of the Federal troops repairing the telegraph wires and hung him. He organized his forces at Forlon Station and during the day gave battle first to one of the forces going south and then to the force coming north, retreating at nightfall with about 300 men. During the night he buried his dead, and bright and early in the morning he retreated westward toward the mountains.

"In the meantime the conductor of the passenger train that had been captured by Castro had found refuge at my house. Upon the retreat of Castro toward the mountains, this conductor made his way to join the Federal forces and gave the officers all the information they required to put them on their guard.

"On the 18th of May the Federal forces reappeared under command of Capt. Torres, and I went to meet them. I was immediately accused of being in league with the revolutionists, but after some discussion, in which I proved that it would be impossible to take any other stand than what I took, I was released and advised to be very discreet in any relations I might have with them, as I was under suspicion of being one of their sympathizers. The railroad was fully repaired the next day and Sunday, which was the 20th of May, I was surprised by a Federal force of cavalry and infantry at my plantation, who commenced impressing my laborers into the service of the Federals. After demonstrating my entire sympathy with the Diaz government, my men were finally released, the Federals going on their way to Victoria. Nothing further happened in the immediate neighborhood until the combined attack against Victoria on the 16th of November of the same year. They were successful after two days' fighting, the Federals retreating southwestward through the mountains toward the railroad from Tampico to San Luis Potosi. During this attack the rebel forces under command of Col. Sartos came to our station, burned that station, and destroyed a car of corn that I had loaded the day before, visiting me shortly afterwards at the plantation, where he obliged me to give him food for his men and horses, remaining in that vicinity about four days, during which time he informed me that his orders were not explicit, but he thought he would destroy the pumping station and water tank, and fuel oil deposit and pump at Yeasi Station, which I begged him not to do, showing him that if his party was successful they would need all of these supplies and machinery. He agreed that I was right, and finally returned to Victoria.

"On November 25 Col. Viviano Saldivar came through from Victoria with 150 men, arriving at dusk. I met him upon his arrival, and he assured me that his chief, Gen. Luis Caballero, had sent him in advance to assure me that he was friendly to foreigners and would give me all protection, both to me personally and to my property; but having outstripped his commissary train, he would appreciate it if I would give him corn and fodder for his stock, as well as two fat cows with which to feed his troops, promising me to return the same in the morning upon the arrival of his commissary train, which he did.

"He spent the next five days scouting around the country, taking possession of the stocks of goods of the merchants and the cattle and horses of the ranchers who were known enemies of the revolutionists, returning to Victoria with a large quantity of loot which he had thus obtained. This officer always treated me with the greatest of kindness and consideration.

"Within a few days the advance upon Tampico began. Several hundred troops passed during the week, all of whom I was obliged to feed without recompense; however, in some cases I obtained receipts.

"The attack upon Tampico occurred December 5, and lasted two days, the revolutionists being defeated. A permanent force was left at Los Esteros Station, 28 miles north of Tampico under the command of Col. E. P. Nafareta. He remained there with occasional skirmishes with the Federal troops stationed at Altamira, 15 miles north of Tampico, through the winter.

"I was obliged to transport my vegetables for export to the United States through the lines of both the rebels and Federals, and my relations with both continued friendly during all that time, but especially with the revolutionary leaders, who were at that time very desirous of being recognized by the United States. On May 13, 1914, after driving in the Federal outposts, a determined attack was made on Tampico by the rebels under Gen. Pablo Gonzalez, and the town was taken. The Federals under Gen. Morelos Zaragoza went in the direction of Mexico City.

"Previous to this in April an acute crisis occurred for foreigners, when the United States forces attacked and captured Vera Cruz. During that period I consulted Gen. Caballero, in charge of the forces besieging Tampico at the request of several American colonists, and asked him what would be his attitude toward foreigners should the rebels and Federals unite against the American forces. He assured us of his protection, and said that in case of hostilities he would send us under safe conduct to the nearest United States forces.

"The casualties of the rebels in attacking Tampico at the different times during the winter of 1913-14 were approximately 1,000, as I was informed by the adjutant of Gen. Caballero's brigade. At no time were foreigners seriously molested during this period. Their losses consisted principally in having to feed large numbers of rebel troops who happened to be in their neighborhood.

"About this time I joined an American, who was manager of another hacienda, in a telegram to President Wilson, urging him to recognize the Carranza revolutionists as being the faction of the revolutionists most numerous and homogeneous. We received no direct reply.

"One of the instances of the capture of Victoria in November, 1913, by the revolutionists' troops was the capture of the president of Llera and various other local authorities, who were immediately hung. In fact, within a few months not one of the nine members of the municipality survived. Since then a strange mortality has overtaken almost every successive municipal administration of Llera. At least three presidents have been executed by first one side and then the other, the fourth having been saved by me upon his plea to me to furnish a payment to the Villista commander of 1,000 pesos, which I did, and which, by the way, still remains unpaid. The history of this municipality, I think, is typical of those of a great many others in Mexico during the past six years.

"First one partido would come along and find some incriminating evidence against officials or civilians, and they would be arrested and sooner or later executed. For instance, the town of Xicotencatl in 1915 was occupied by the Villistas, who obliged several of the prominent citizens to contribute to their cause. When they were driven out by the Carranza forces, these lists of contributions by these citizens were found, and they were immediately arrested by Gen. Luis Caballero and placed in the penitentiary in Victoria, with instructions to the commandant that should the Villistas be on the point of victory these political prisoners should be executed. The signal for the execution should be an explosion at the Government palace. The explosion occurred, but it was a machine gun and not what the jailer supposed it was, a signal for the execution of these unfortunate people. He immediately executed them by firing on them through the bars of their cage. Thus the best citizens of southern Tamaulipas were executed and buried in one common grave. Only one escaped. Being well supplied with funds, he bought his way out. However, personally, I have no complaint to offer concerning my treatment by the revolutionary leaders.

"They never looted or destroyed my property, but they did occasionally take horses, mules, and saddles. I have fed thousands of them and their horses, of which I have little record. I have receipts for some, but oftener they refused to sign receipts, and I, of course, was glad to get off so cheaply in comparison to my Mexican neighbors, against whom the revolution was really directed.

"They have not lived on their properties for six years, and these are in a very lamentably ruined condition, producing hardly 50 per cent of their prerevolutionary production.

"I have never left our property for more than a few weeks or a month at a time, and then it was only once a year for a visit to the United States. Even when the danger of armed intervention by the United States was most acute I refused to leave our home at the command of the United States Government, preferring to take chances of personal danger to abandoning my home, which meant ruin after so many years of hard work.

"Aside from the feeding of so many troops and their horses, my real losses would not exceed $7,500 in value of corn burned at station and work animals taken and cattle and hogs killed for meat. A rough estimate of the feed consumed would add $10,000 to this estimate.

"It was not until April 9 of this year that a band of bandits, who have been hovering around the valley in the western mountains 20 or 40 miles away, made a raid on our property during the temporary absence of the garrison. On this day, being in the store, I heard shots and cries in our village of laborers' houses, and on looking out I saw a bunch of armed men riding toward us firing as they came. I took protection from the bullets. Firing soon ceased, and I was the first prisoner taken. The man who captured me took me at once to the leader, Elario Medina, who received me rather coldly. He had formerly been one of my employees, but committing some petty crime had fled to the mountains and gathered a bunch of thieves and assassins. They had killed all of our elected municipal officials one after another for three years, so I hardly knew what to expect. But I protested against the looting of my store and house and the houses of my employees.

"They said they were Peleasistas, a real revolutionist of the oil country south of us. They had adopted this leadership in order to get rifles and ammunition, but they were simply bandits.

"They treated me well personally, but exacted a written promise from me to pay them 300 pesos monthly under the veiled threat of taking me with them to the mountains for ransom.

"The losses on account of this raid were approximately 7,000 pesos in merchandise and money and work animals taken from my store and 2,000 pesos in clothes and money taken from tenant farmers, who were left in a very pitiable condition, although none of them were personally abused.

"I reported the facts to the governor, who expressed his regret and promised protection. But, on May 9, just 30 days after the first raid, the bandits came again to collect the monthly tribute, and took value of two and a half months' tribute, or 750 pesos. I have not made any effort to locate them to pay them the balance due to date.

"I again protested to the governor in person and have had a strong garrison of troops ever since. The expense of feeding the horses of these troops devolves upon us, which, besides their everlasting thieving, make a heavy charge on me.

"The present situation in northwestern Mexico, bounded by the Rio Grande on the north, the Gulf of Mexico on the east, to Tampico on the south, the railroad line to San Louis, and north to Laredo, is that production in a great measure has ceased, except in the large towns or plantations that are garrisoned. Outside of these limited numbers, those who are actually working have to pay tribute in one form or another to roving bands of bandits, some of them having more or less revolutionary titles, but the effect being the same.

"The railroad situation is typical. The administration of the railroads has suffered such losses on account of the burning of trains, both cars and engines, that the rolling stock is not sufficient to take care of the freight, so that officials sell the cars for the trip at prices ranging from 100 to 150 pesos per car, all freight being at the regular express rates for car lots, which makes it a heavy charge on low-valued freight. Local freight in less than carload lots is unknown. There is at present, piled up in the freight warehouses at Victoria, freight that has been there for the last five months. Where that freight is corn or semiperishable stuff, it is, of course, now worthless.

"The military situation is another terrible scandal. I am assured by friends of mine who hold commissions in the Carranza Army that the captains are allowed to pad their pay rolls, sometimes to the extent of 50 per cent, receiving of course the corresponding pay of 1.25 pesos per man per day, plus the feed for his horse, which is 40 cents per day. All cavalry commanders receive this item of forage for their horses. This forage comes from the farmers where they are billeted, but the farmer gets not 1 cent of pay for it.

"I have been required by different commanders to make invoices for feed furnished, even receipting them, but have never received a cent.

"In return the captain must pay his regimental commander an average of 500 pesos per month. The regimental commander pays his brigade commander correspondingly, etc. It is fair to say that at least one-half of the Federal army budget is graft.

"The condition of the poorer people outside of the towns as a result of the bandit activities is pitiable. In most instances they have lost their blankets and other articles of clothing to such an extent that they are suffering severely in the winter weather, and I feel that I am rendering them a great assistance in stating these facts with the hope that some remedy may be found for such a terrible situation. In fact, my neighbors constantly appeal to me, asking how long can this situation last."

Mr. O. made the following statement to me:

"This information concerned my abuses and property losses at the hands of the various classes of Mexican bandits: All these people who carry arms are bandits and in this section of country it is controlled by the Carrancistas. Just a little south the country is controlled by Manuel Pelaez. But it will be noticed that 80 or 90 per cent of the robbing has been done in territory controlled by the Carrancistas and in a majority of the cases there was absolutely no attempt to punish the guilty parties; therefore it became useless to make any complaint to the authorities.

"My first loss was one horse stolen in June, 1913, by thieves. Next in May, 1914, the American people in my settlement were advised to pack our traps and go; this advice came to me from a captain on an English man-of-war lying in Tampico; I sent my wife out, she went out on the Connecticut, and five days later I received a notice from a Mexican judge, delivered to me by two American negroes, who had agreed to help fight the Gringos; this notice informed me that I must surrender all my guns and ammunition and horses and myself to him (the judge) at once. I refused to surrender and went to see some more Americans who lived near me and found that one had already fallen into the hands of the Mexicans (Federals). Well, I, together with the others, provided ourselves with some grub and guns and ammunition and made our way through the brush to Tampico, or rather the mouth of the Panuco River: there we were picked up by a launch from an English gun boat the same day. The same English people picked up about 125 other American people; they fed us that night and next day they took us to sea and put us aboard the S. S. Cyclops and took us to New Orleans. I came back to Mexico in August, three months after we had been driven away, only to find that I had lost eight head of work horses worth $1,200, United States currency, and one stallion worth $500, and three large hogs worth $225, and 190 chickens worth $50, and household goods and guns and carpenter tools worth $500, and four head of American cattle worth $200, and growing crops worth $1,000. At this time I had 21 acres planted to citrus fruits, just commencing to bear. At once I set about to buy horses to get my land cultivated, but only succeeded temporarily, for in June in 1916 we had to beat it again and was away three months, again returning October 1, 1916, and immediately commenced to cultivate my land again. But ever since I have not been able to keep stock sufficient to keep my land cultivated, so therefore, I have lost 75 per cent of my fruit grove, worth $5,000. In March, 1916, on one occasion, I was beaten and punched in the stomach with guns by Carrancistas. In May, 1917, my wife was at my home with a Mexican servant woman and two Mexican workmen; there came three bandits at midnight and robbed the house of everything of value, clothing and bedding and $35 cash. In June, 1917, the thieves took three American cows worth $300. At the time they robbed my house my wife escaped and went into the woods and stayed the rest of the night. They abused the servant woman trying to make her tell where more money was hid.

"In October, 1918, there came to my house at night a Mexican who lived near me but believed him to be my friend. He commenced to break the windows and when I opened the door to see who it was, I simply poked my face against the muzzle of a large American pistol. Of course I did not lose any time getting my head back, but none too soon, for at the same time there was a blast from the pistol almost burned my eyes, the ball tearing splinters from the door just past my head. Well, of course, I reported the case to the judge at Pueblo Vieo. He had the man to appear before him, and I also appeared as witness and gave the judge the facts and the judge assured me that I might go home, rest at ease, as he, the judge, would send the man away where he could not give me any more trouble. When I got home the man was already there, waiting for me, armed with a nice letter from the judge telling me the man was a good man but had only been drinking bad whiskey and if I would only be kind and nice to the man he thought the man would let me alone.

"Please notice that in telling this I only wish to make it clear that the American people can not get any protection from the authorities. At another time a Mexican who was known to be in with the Villistas and Tampico, although being occupied with Carrancistas and this man, wanting to get on good terms with this Carrancista colonel, stole from me a very fine American mare worth $200 and made the Carrancista colonel a present of the mare. At another time in April, 1918, I had bought seven head of work horses, and my wife was living at my home and I was working 11 miles away from home. The Villistas came to my house and took six head of horses. My wife and I walked 18 miles trying to get our horses back, and Gen. Valducero told us that if he had not needed the horses he would not have taken them. Three days later, as soon as the Villistas were well gone, the Carrancistas from Tampico went to my house looking for the Villistas and got the one mule the Villistas had left. At another time some bandits stole one of my cows, and my Mexican man who was working for me reported to the judge at Tampico Alto, and the judge went and got part of the meat and hide of the cow, but made no attempt to punish the thieves.

"At another time some thieves stole five head of my cows and had butchered one. I was away from home; a Mexican told my wife where she could find her cow's hide in a tanning vat. She went to the judge at Tampico Alto and asked the judge to arrest the man who killed the cow and get the hide from the tanning vat, and the judge refused to do anything for her.

"Please remember I am not trying to tell of my losses, but only wish to show that the American people can't get any protection from the authorities, and it is well to note that in a very great many cases where men representing different oil companies have been held up and relieved of pay rolls that the bandits always knew just how much money there was in the pay roll and demanded just that much, and there was absolutely no other way for that information to get through other than through the Carrancistas. At another time there was a bunch of bandits went into a camp of one of the oil companies and cleaned the camp of all jewelry and clothing and bedding and about $10,000 cash. Next day the Carrancistas came to this same camp looking for the bandits and immediately the Americans recognized the Carrancistas' horses as being the same horses the bandits rode the day before.

"Only a short time ago, just 11½ miles from here, the superintendent of the pipeline department of the Mexican Pete Co., together with another American and one Mexican, was shot, not held up (but shot first), and then robbed of a pay roll of 18,000 pesos.
